But on the other hand, it can hardly be denied, that he meant to take advantage of this favourable juncture, to eſtabliſh his ſovereignty over Scotland; and ſo to accompliſh the project formed, but never fully executed, by his anceſtors. It is difficult to judge, whether he himſelf believed he had a lawful right; or, conſidering the circumſtances of Scotland, was willing to embrace the opportunity to eſtabliſh a new one. The laſt ſeems moſt likely, though Men but too frequently ſuffer themſelves to be prepoſſeſſed, in favour of what is for their intereſt. And indeed, to fetch proofs from hiſtories compiled by Engliſhmen, to ſhew that Scotland was dependent on England, was a plain confeſſion he had no better to produce. Certainly a homage like this ought to have been evinced by more authentick proofs. One can hardly believe, if the kingdom of Scotland had been immemorially dependent on England, without any interruption, as he pretended to prove, there could be found in the Sovereign's archives but one ſingle homage in form, done by the Kings of Scotland. Probably therefore, without being thoroughly convinced of his right, he had a mind, in order to eſtabliſh it fully, to improve the advantage which the preſent circumſtances of Scotland afforded him, well knowing there could be no oppoſition, ſince the two leading Men had ſo much reaſon to cultivate his friendſhip. But I queſtion, whether the acquieſcence of the Scots was ſufficient to acquire him a new right. I leave this to be determined by thoſe, who are verſed in theſe matters. However, methinks there is no juſtifying this Prince, who, by an ill-grounded ambition, kindled between the two nations of Great-Britain a war, which cauſed torrents of blood to be ſpilt on both ſides. And if the event is of any account in affairs of this nature, the ſequel of this hiſtory will ſhew, that though at firſt God favoured Edward's deſigns, he permitted the projects of the Engliſh to come to nothing at laſt. Perhaps I ſhall draw upon me the cenſure of ſome people, fond of this ancient ſovereignty of England over Scotland, or of the perfections of Edward I. They will fancy, no doubt, what I have been ſaying is injurious to the glory of that Prince, or the grandeur of England; but I hope, they who are leſs prejudiced will do me more juſtice. It is time now to return to the hiſtory, and ſhew the fatal effects of Edward's ambition to both kingdoms. 1292.

1293. If the deſire of reigning had cauſed Baliol to act contrary to the intereſt of Scotland, Edward's eagerneſs to eſtabliſh his ſovereignty over that kingdom, made him commit errors, deſtructive of his own real intereſts, as well as of thoſe of England. On much the ſame occaſion Pope Innocent III was very careful, not to let the Engliſh feel too ſoon the weight of his ſovereignty, acquired by King John's reſignation. He inured them to his yoke by degrees, and inſenſibly, for fear of alarming them too much. But Edward took a quite contrary courſe with the Scots. Hardly was he poſſeſſed of his ſo much deſired ſovereignty, but he made his Vaſſals feel the whole weight of it; and this rigor produced not the effect he expected. Far from conducing to keep that nation in ſubjection, it ſerved only to excite their endeavours to free themſelves from it (3). Edward's haughty behaviour towards the new King of Scotland.

Before Edward left Newcaſtle, an opportunity offered to exerciſe his new right, which he failed not to embrace. A townſman of Berwick complaining to him of an injury done him, as he pretended, by ſome Engliſh commiſſioners ſent into Scotland, Edward ordered the affair to be tried in England, by his Judges. The council of Scotland, looking upon this proceeding as a breach of the King of England's promiſes, ſent ſome of their members to repreſent to him, that he had engaged, that the pleas of things done in the kingdom ſhould not be drawn out of it. Edward thought this remonſtrance very unreaſonable. He replied, That the affair was of ſuch a nature, that he could not permit it to be tried any where but in his own courts; ſince it belonged not to Vaſſals, to puniſh the miſdemeanors of thoſe that repreſented the perſon of the Sovereign. If he had ſtopped there, the Scots might have flattered themſelves, that this particular caſe would not be brought into precedent. But the King's intention was otherwiſe. To prevent the like complaints for the future, he ſent to the council of Scotland the following declaration: That if, during the vacancy of the throne, he had made the Scots any ſuch temporary promiſes, he had punctually obſerved them; but did not intend to be reſtrained by ſuch promiſes, now there was a King in Scotland; and would admit and hear all complaints, and all buſineſs concerning that kingdom, where and when he pleaſed. He repeated this declaration, ſome days after, in his own chamber, before Baliol, and a great number of Lords of both nations: Adding, He would call the King of Scotland himſelf to appear in England, whenever he thought convenient. The warmth wherewith he ſpoke, ſtopped the mouth of Baliol, who, being in his power, thought it not proper to make any anſwer. But he did not come off ſo. Two days after he was forced to renounce, by Letters Patents, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, all the promiſes, conceſſions, and ratifications made by the King of England, during the vacancy of the throne of Scotland; and to approve whatever Edward had done during that time. In return for this renunciation, Edward gave him a writing, whereby he acknowledged, he had no other right to the kingdom of Scotland but that of homage. Moreover, he promiſed for himſelf and ſucceſſors, not to claim the wardſhip and marriage of young Nobles.

This firſt ſtep of Edward was ſufficient to convince the Scots, of his reſolution to ſtretch his prerogative to the utmoſt. But it was not long before he gave them more ſubſtantial proofs. A merchant of Gaſcogne (4) preſented a petition to him ſetting forth, that Alexander III, late King of Scotland, was indebted to him in a certain Sum (5), ſtill due to him, notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations to the new King for payment: That therefore he applied to him, as ſovereign of the King of p. 605.

1293. Scotland, for juſtice. Edward eagerly embracing this opportunity of exerciſing his right, ſummoned the King of Scotland to appear at Weſtminſter the morrow after Aſcenſion-day, to anſwer in perſon the complaints brought againſt him by the merchant. This firſt ſummons bears date the 8th of March (1), about two months after Edward's departure from Newcaſtle.

First Summons. Act. Pub. II. p. 605.

Second Summons. p. 605.

Eight days after, he ſent a ſecond ſummons to Baliol, upon the following occaſion. Whilſt he was ſtill at Berwick, he had ordered the Regents of Scotland to put Macduff Earl of Fife, in poſſeſſion of certain Lands claimed by that Earl (2). Theſe orders had been executed before Baliol's coronation, whilſt Edward was ſtill maſter of Scotland. In the firſt Parliament held by the new King at Scone, the Earl of Fife was accuſed of unjuſtly taking poſſeſſion of theſe Lands, the cuſtody whereof belonged to the King. This was properly accuſing him of an affected over-haſtineſs, in applying to the King of England, and of not ſtaying till there was a King on the throne of Scotland. Upon this charge, the Parliament ordered him to be impriſoned. Some time after, the Earl being releaſed, carried his complaints to Edward; and thereupon the King of Scotland was again ſummoned to appear before Edward, wherever he ſhould be, the day after Trinity-Sunday.

Third Summons. p. 608.

The 15th of June following, the King took a freſh occaſion to ſummon Baliol upon another account. Whilſt he was at Newcaſtle, he had ordered (3) Walter de Huntercombe, governor of the Iſle of Man, to put Baliol in poſſeſſion of the Iſle, which was accordingly done. Shortly after, a Lady named Auſtrica, claiming that Iſle, demanded it of the King of Scotland; and her demand being rejected, ſhe complained to Edward. Upon her complaint, Baliol was again ſummoned to appear in perſon, fifteen days after Michaelmas, in whatever place (4) the King ſhould then be. Moreover, Edward ordered the Sheriff of Northumberland to notify this ſummons to the King of Scotland himſelf, before witneſs.

Fourth Summons. Ibid.

Fifth Summons. p. 615.

A few months after Baliol received another ſummons, the occaſion whereof was this. David King of Scotland had formerly granted to the Monaſtery of Reading, in England, a certain Priory (5), held of the Biſhoprick of St. Andrews. Afterwards this Priory was alienated by the Abbot of Reading, to the Biſhop of St. Andrews. The ſucceſſor of this Abbot, willing to recover the Priory, pretended, the alienation was made againſt the conſent of the majority of the Monks, and thereupon preſented a petition to the King. The Biſhop being informed of it, appealed to the Pope, and his appeal was admitted by the Court of Scotland. Upon the complaints made to Edward by the Abbot of Reading, about admitting the appeal, Baliol was again ſummoned to appear in perſon, fifteen days after the Feaſt of St. Martin.

Sixth Summons, in 1294. p. 632.

A year after, Edward took occaſion to treat this Prince in the ſame haughty manner, by commanding him to appear before him to anſwer for himſelf, for denying juſtice to the Biſhop of Durham, in an affair concerning his Dioceſe (6).

Baliol appears before the Parliament of England. Ryley's Placita. p. 154, &c. l. viii.

So many different ſummons, upon ſuch ſlight occaſions, and upon the bare complaints of private perſons, made the new King of Scotland perceive, that he was become rather the Slave than Vaſſal of the King of England. However, as he had taken no meaſures to throw off the yoke, he durſt not but appear, to anſwer to theſe ſeveral accuſations. Buchanan pretends, it was by accident that Baliol happened to be preſent in the Parliament of England (7), when the Earl of Fife brought his complaints againſt him: but others affirm, it was in obedience to the ſummons. Be this as it will, he was accuſed before the Parliament, of denying juſtice to and impriſoning the Earl of Fife. He would have anſwered by a Proctor, but was not permitted, and ſo was obliged to ſtand at the bar like a private perſon. This was a great mortification for a crowned head; but Edward was bent upon humbling him, and making the Scots feel the whole weight of their dependence. Baliol being thus conſtrained to anſwer in perſon, alledged, as the accuſation entered againſt him concerned his crown, he could not anſwer to it, without firſt adviſing with his Subjects. His excuſe not being deemed valid, the Parliament ordered, that three of his principal Caſtles ſhould be ſeized into the King's hands, till he gave full ſatisfaction. The Engliſh authors affirm, that before this ſentence was pronounced, Baliol preſented a petition, acknowledging the ſovereignty of the King of England over Scotland, and praying Edward to allow him time to conſult his Parliament. As ſoon as he had ſtooped ſo low as to petition, his demand was granted, and a certain day (8) was aſſigned him to appear. He withdrew, incenſed to the laſt degree at the affront he had received, and bent upon trying all means to free himſelf from ſo intolerable a yoke (9).

The war which broke out at the ſame time, between France and England, put Baliol in hopes of a favourable juncture to free himſelf from the ſubjection he was under. And indeed it was likely, he would have leiſure to take all neceſſary meaſures to compaſs his ends, whilſt Edward was employed in that war. A private quarrel between ſome Engliſh and French mariners, was the occaſion of this rupture. At the ſame time, it gave the King of France a pretence to ſummon Edward before the court of Peers, and an opportunity to ſeize Guienne by a ſtratagem, the particulars whereof will be ſeen hereafter. Before the war was proclaimed, Edward endeavoured by way of negotiation, to recover that Duchy from the King of France (10). But Philip, who was not ignorant of the King of Scotland's deſigns, prolonged matters till that Prince declared his intentions. During the negotiation, Baliol ſent ambaſſadors (11) to France, on pretence of renewing the ancient alliance between the two nations: But his real deſign was to enter into a ſtrict union with Philip, by the marriage of his Son Edward with a Daughter of the Earl of Valois, Brother to that Monarch. How privately ſoever this negotiation was carried on, Edward had intelligence that ſome plot was contriving againſt him at Paris. Accordingly, to prevent the King of Scotland's deſigns, he demanded of him the Caſtles of Berwick, Jedburgh, and Roxborough (12), promiſing to reſtore them as ſoon as matters were adjuſted with France. But without rejecting entirely this demand, Baliol found means to gain time (13), whilſt he continued to take meaſures to throw off the yoke of the Engliſh. When his ambaſſadors had concluded with France the propoſed League, he thought it time to declare. He was ſtrongly ſollicited to it by Philip, who, knowing Edward was preparing for war, was deſirous to raiſe him troubles at home, that might hinder him from thinking on means to recover Guienne. Baliol had been long in ſuſpence, on account of his oath to the King of England. But to remove this ſcruple, Philip procured him the Pope's diſpenſation. So finding himſelf ſecure from the Church's cenſures, which were then very formidable, and having no further uneaſineſs on account of his oath, he thought nothing ſhould any longer retard him. Edward, ſurpriſed at this reſolution, which quickly came to his knowledge, formed the deſign of relinquiſhing his affairs in France, and employing his preparations againſt Scotland. He conſidered that Baliol's revolt gave him a plauſible pretence to make himſelf maſter of that kingdom, the conqueſt whereof would be of much greater importance than Guienne. Inſtead therefore of embarking his army for France, as he had intended, he marched directly for Scotland (1). Mean time, Baliol, who depended upon the assistance promised by the King of France, sent to the King of England the Superior of the Cordeliers of Roxborough, to deliver a letter into his own hand. In the letter he complained of the frequent injuries received from him; of the many summons issued upon very slight occasions, and upon the bare petitions of private persons; and in conclusion, declared, he would be no longer his Vassal (2). This letter served only to exasperate Edward still more, who, continuing his march towards Scotland, and seeing his affairs in France in a very ill situation, resolved to make a conquest of that kingdom, as the English historians confess on this occasion. Here may be fixed the beginning of the long war, that bred in the hearts of the English and Scots a mutual enmity, which time has not yet been able to extinguish (3).

1296. Edward attacks Scotland. Buchanan.

Edward was advanced as far as Newcastle, with intent to besiege Berwick, which was, as it were, the key of the two kingdoms, and for that reason of all places most liable to the sieges and surprizes of both Nations. For this purpose, he had sent a fleet to Sea, with strict orders to prevent any thing approaching the town he intended to besiege. But the fleet was surprized by the Scots, who burnt and sunk eighteen ships. At the same time, they gained another advantage over some English troops, who being advanced to seize a certain post, were cut in pieces, with the loss of above a thousand men. These successes, which incouraged the King of Scotland, served only to stir up Edward to a revenge, and oblige him to exert his utmost to subdue a people who appeared so resolute to shake off his yoke. There were in Scotland, as was before observed, two factions, one for Baliol, and the other for Bruce. Edward, well knowing the last had submitted only by force to the judgment pronounced in favour of the first, believed it might be of great service to him, could he persuade Robert Bruce to join with him. To that end, he offered him the crown, provided he declared against Baliol. Robert accepted the offer with joy, and strengthened Edward's party with a great number of friends, who had only out of fear taken the oath to Baliol.

He gains Bruce to his Side. Ibid.

He besieges Berwick, Ibid. M. West. Walsing. Knighton.

After taking these measures, Edward entered Scotland, and laid siege to Berwick. As this place was very strong and well-garrisoned, he was apprehensive of meeting a resistance which would give Baliol time to prepare, and the Scots in general an opportunity of uniting together, to free themselves from a danger that equally threatned them all. So nothing could be more to his advantage, than speedily to become master of Berwick, in order to advance into the heart of the kingdom, and break the measures of the Scots. This made him resolve to use stratagem, to compass his designs in less time. To that end, after assaulting the town several days, he suddenly raised the siege. At the same time, by means of some soldiers, who, pretending to desert, threw themselves into the town, he caused a rumour to be spread, that the King of Scotland's approach to their relief, obliged him to retire. This rumour was quickly followed by the false News of Baliol's being but a league off, ready to enter the town. Upon this false intelligence, the soldiers and townsmen sallied out in crowds to meet him, imagining Edward was now at a distance. This headless multitude, falling into an ambush, and endeavouring to retreat with precipitation, were so briskly pursued, that the English entered pell-mell into the town, and made a great slaughter. It is said above seven thousand (4) Scots perished on this occasion (5).

Baliol vanquished. Buchanan. M. West. Walsing.

Edward being thus master of Berwick, marched (6) to Dunbar with design to besiege it. He was scarce arrived before the town, when he heard of Baliol's approach at the head of a numerous army. Though he did not expect the Scots could be ready so soon, he gladly received the news, in hopes of obtaining a victory that would render him master of the whole kingdom. Baliol advanced on his part with equal ardor, bent upon deciding by one battle, whether he should be free or a Slave. The two armies ingaging, fought a good while with great bravery, though not with the same fortune. The Scots were at length forced to give ground, after losing the best part of their troops. Their loss in this action is said to amount to above twenty thousand men, a loss so great and astonishing, that they were not able for a long while to oppose the progress of the Conquerors. After this great victory, Edward immediately returned to Dunbar, whose gates were opened to him. Then, without giving his enemies time to breathe, he marched to Roxborough, of which he became master with the same ease. Presently after he approached Edinborough, the castle whereof was surrendered in eight days. From thence he went and seized Sterling, Perth, and all the considerable places in general. In a word, before the end of the campaign, he was so much master of all Scotland, that Baliol and the whole nation had no other remedy but to submit to his mercy. And upon that condition he granted them peace. The King of Scotland came to him at Kincardin (7), and appeared before him with a White Rod in his hand, resigned his kingdom to him, to be disposed of according to his pleasure. This resignation was drawn up in form, and signed by Baliol, and the greatest part of the Barons of Scotland, and sealed with the Great Seal of the kingdom.

1296. Edward's great Progress. Buchanan. M. West. Knighton. Walsing.

Baliol resigns his kingdom. Act. Pub. II. p. 718. M. West. Walsing.

To confirm this new acquisition, Edward ordered the States of Scotland to assemble at Berwick, where all the nobility, and officers of the kingdom, swore fealty to him; and delivered up all the castles and places they were still in possession of. Among the Scotch Nobles, William Dowglas was the only person, that could never resolve to swear to a Prince, who had no right to Scotland, but what force gave him. This refusal drew on him the indignation of Edward, who commanding him to be conducted to England, kept him in close confinement, where he ended his days, without his misfortunes being ever able to bring him to acknowledge Edward for his sovereign. Baliol was likewise sent into England, and confined at first in the Tower of London; but was afterwards removed to Oxford, where he founded the College, which bears his name (8). Other Scotch Lords, whom Edward judged necessary to secure, were shut up in several prisons in England; and if he left some their liberty, it was on condition they should keep in the southern parts, without ever passing the Trent, on pain of death. He might easily have been crowned King of Scotland; but his intention was not, that the two kingdoms should remain any longer divided. He had a mind to unite Scotland to England, as he had done Wales, and make but one kingdom of the whole Island of Britain. This evidently appeared from his removing into England the crown and sceptre of Scotland, with all the rest of the Regalia, and every thing that shewed the least sign of the liberty hitherto enjoyed by the Scots. But it was not so easy to blot out of their minds, the remembrance of their dear liberty. He did not forget to cause the famous Stone, on which the inauguration of their Kings was performed, to be conveyed from Scone. The people of Scotland had all along placed in that Stone a kind of fatality. They fancied, that whilst it remained in the country, their State would be unshaken, but the moment it should be elsewhere removed, great revolutions would ensue. For this reason, Edward carried it away, to create in the Scots a belief, that the time of the dissolution of their Monarchy was come, and to lessen the hopes of recovering their liberty (9). But how much soever they were attached to this fatal Stone, they had a

It had been brought out of Spain into Ireland by Simon Breccus, afterwards out of Ireland into Argyle, and King Edward caused it to be conveyed to Weſtminſter. Beſides theſe precautions, Edward took care to ſecure his conqueſt, by placing Engliſh garriſons and governors in all the Caſtles; and leaving John Warren, Earl of Surrey and Suſſex (2), to command in Scotland, returned in triumph to England.

Edward's Affairs with France.

After ſeeing the firſt war with Scotland ended, by the conqueſt of the kingdom, it is time to conſider what was doing in France, where Edward's affairs were upon a very different foot. But firſt it will be neceſſary to relate the occaſion of the rupture, between the two crowns of France and England. Since the treaty between St. Lewis and Henry III, the two nations had lived in good underſtanding, when a quarrel between two perſons of little conſideration, gave occaſion to the two Monarchs to take arms. A Norman Pilot, and an Engliſh Mariner, quarrelling in a port of Guienne, where they were landed, the Pilot chanced to be killed. Whether the magiſtrates of the port neglected to bring the murderer to juſtice, or he was not in their power, the Normans finding, that the murder of their countryman was left unpuniſhed, reſolved to be revenged. To that end, ſurprizing an Engliſh veſſel, they hung up the Pilot at the yard-arm. Theſe repriſals occaſioned others on both ſides, ſo that the Engliſh (3) and Normans made fierce war upon each other, wherever they met, even to the plundering one another's ſhips, when it was in their power. For ſome time, it was only a private war, in which the two Kings were not concerned. But ſome Engliſh ſhips happening to meet a Norman fleet laden with wine, carried them to England. The Owners complaining to the King of France, he demanded reſtitution of the ſhips and goods, and immediate ſatisfaction for the outrage. Edward not returning a ſpeedy anſwer, Philip the Fair, who was of an extreme haughty temper, ſummoned him to appear in perſon before the court of Peers (4), to anſwer to the complaints brought againſt him. This ſummons was iſſued in 1294 (5), about the ſame time Edward cited the King of Scotland, for very trifling matters, as we have ſeen. The French hiſtorians ſay, Edward not appearing, but only ſending his Brother Edmund in his ſtead, Philip, not ſatisfied therewith, diſpatched the conſtable de Neſle into Guienne, where he ſeized Bourdeaux, with all the reſt of the province. Certainly, it muſt be ſuprizing, that ſuch a conqueſt ſhould coſt France ſo little. Was it poſſible for that General to become maſter of Guienne, without forming a ſiege, or fighting a battle; as if it had been an open country, deſtitute of caſtles and troops for its defence? This makes me believe, either the French hiſtorians were ignorant of what paſſed on this occaſion, or did not think proper to mention it. But what does not appear in their hiſtories, is fully cleared in the Collection of the Publick Acts, lately printed in England, and which I have ſo often quoted. And therefore I hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the particulars (6).

Philip acts fraudulently with Edward. Act. Pub. II. p. 620.

Edward being ſummoned before the Peers, as was ſaid, did not think proper to appear in perſon. He ſent Prince Edmund his Brother to Paris, to anſwer for him; with orders to avoid, as much as poſſible, engaging him in a war with France. Accordingly, the Prince was fully impowered, to give the King of France all the ſatisfaction he could reaſonably deſire (7). Edmund found the French Monarch extremely incenſed, and full of threats. After ſeveral inſtances to enter into treaty, his negotiation ſeeming to him entirely fruitleſs, he reſolved to return home. Juſt as he was ready to depart, the two Queens, namely, Mary of Brabant, Widow of Philip the Hardy, and Joanna of Navarre, Wife of the preſent King, intreated him to renew the negotiation with them. The great deſire they expreſſed of procuring a firm peace between the two Kings, and Edmund's inſtructions from the King his Brother, eaſily induced him to conſent to the propoſal. The two Queens repreſented to him, that Philip was extremely offended at the affronts received from Edward's ſubjects, and particularly from certain perſons of Guienne, againſt whom he was incenſed to the laſt degree: That therefore it was impoſſible to come to a good agreement, unleſs a reaſonable ſatisfaction was given him. They added, as the King's honour was concerned in the affair, there was no other way to appeaſe him, but by Edward's making him a publick reparation, to ſhew the world, that he diſclaimed what was done by his ſubjects. To that end, they propoſed that Xaintes, Talmond, Turenne, Puymirol, Penne, and Monſlauguin, together with the perſons complained of, ſhould be delivered to Philip. But as this ſatisfaction ſeemed unreaſonable, they intimated to Edmund, that it was only for form ſake, and Philip would engage to reſtore the towns and perſons, upon their own requeſt. Moreover they promiſed, that as ſoon as the King's honour was ſafe by this reparation, he ſhould revoke the ſummons, and give Edward a ſafe-conduct to come to him at Amiens, where he would receive his homage. Edmund conſented to all theſe propoſals, provided the two Queens would ſign them in writing, and promiſe with an oath, that the particulars agreed upon ſhould be punctually performed. This treaty, which was ſigned by the two Queens, and for the King of France's honour was to be kept ſecret, was ſent to Edward, who ſeemed very well ſatisfied. He was chiefly intent upon what concerned Scotland, and in all likelihood his many ſummons to Baliol on trifling occaſions, were intended only to cauſe him to rebel, in order to have an opportunity to puniſh him. Beſides, whilſt this affair was negotiating at Paris, he made himſelf maſter of Scotland. So that, as a war with France, at ſuch a juncture, could not but greatly embarraſs him, he was very glad to give Philip a ſeeming reparation, which in the main was no prejudice to him. Finding therefore, the French King was contented with an appearance of reparation, he reſolved to give it him more fully than was even deſired, in order to be more ſure of a peace with France, ſo neceſſary for him. To that end, he gave Edmund power to deliver to the King of France all Guienne, with its metropolis; and ſent poſitive orders to the Seneſchal to obey the Prince's command, without any exception. Edmund acquainting the King of France with the orders he had received, declared he was ready to execute them; but on condition that, in the preſence of creditable witneſſes, the King would promiſe with his own mouth, to perform the articles ſigned by the two Queens. Philip was very willing to give him that ſatisfaction, and going into a certain room, attended by the Duke of Burgundy, gave his royal word, before the ſame Duke, the two Queens, Blanch of Navarre, Wife of Edmund, and the Engliſh ambaſſadors, to perform that treaty. At the ſame time, he revoked with his own mouth Edward's ſummons, and ordered the revocation to be publiſhed in open Hall, by the Biſhop of Orleans. Edmund thinking himſelf ſecure on that ſide, ordered the Seneſchal of Guienne (8), to deliver the dukedom to the perſon that ſhould be impowered by the King of France. Ralph de Neſle, conſtable of France, was commiſſioned to take poſſeſſion of Guienne in Philip's name. The Seneſchal would have proceeded with caution, and not deliver up the Province, but on the terms of the treaty, of which Edmund had informed him. But the conſtable refuſed to be tied to any conditions, alledging he knew nothing of the treaties between the two Kings, and was ordered only to take poſſeſſion of Guienne in his Maſter's name. Then he demanded the perſons agreed upon, and ſent them to Paris.

Guienne is delivered to the King of France. Ibid. p. 620.

All the articles being more than performed on the part of England, Edmund demanded the reſtitution of Guienne, and the perſons ſtipulated in the ſecret treaty. To which it was anſwered, that his demand ſhould be examined in the King's council. At the ſame time Philip ſent him word, not to be ſurprized, if he gave him a harſh anſwer before the council, on account of ſome Members who were not in the ſecret; but as ſoon as they ſhould be gone, he would give him entire ſatisfaction. Edmund relying upon his word, appeared before the council, where Philip was preſent, and demanded the reſtitution of Guienne, to which that Monarch roughly replied, He would not reſtore it. This anſwer not ſurprizing the Prince, who expected it, he withdrew into the next room, waiting for the performance of the King's promiſe, and was left there ſome time, without any other anſwer. At length the Biſhops of Orleans and Tournay came and told him, it was in vain to wait

Some days after, Philip came to the Parliament, without acquainting Edmund, and ordered the King of England to be publickly cited, to appear and anſwer to the Articles exhibited in the Summons. Edmund not being then in the Palace, Hugh de Vere, and John de Lacy, Edward's Ambaſſadors, entered, and ſaid, they could not have imagined this Affair would be decided by way of Juſtice, but according to the Treaty, eſpecially as the Summons was revoked. This Excuſe not being admitted, they were diſmiſſed; and though they deſired only till the next day, to conſult with the King's Brother, they could not obtain that Delay. So the Court decreed the Confiſcation of Guienne to the King of France (1).

Act. Pub. II. p. 634. M. Weſt. p. 421. M. Weſt.

This is the ſubſtance of a Memorial in the Collection of the Publick Acts, where Prince Edmund himſelf gives an account of this Affair, and the manner it was tranſacted, from the beginning of his Negotiation. It may indeed be objected, that it comes from one of the Parties, and conſequently his Teſtimony is not to be credited. But, beſides the Simplicity and Plainneſs of the Memorial, the Conqueſt of Guienne, without Sieges and Battles, makes the Relation very probable. Moreover, we find in the Collection above-mentioned, ſeveral of Edward's Letters, complaining of being deceived by the King of France. There is one, among the reſt, directed to the Prelates and Barons of Guienne, wherein he excuſes himſelf from making a Treaty with France, without their advice; and tells them, he is deceived as much or more than themſelves (2). This is further evident from the diſclaiming of the Homage he had done to Philip, in the following Words:

p. 620. &c. Act. Pub. II. p. 637, 639, 641, 642, 647, &c. p. 644.

Recantation of the Homage done by Edward to Philip. Ib. p. 650.

Our Ambaſſadors ſhall ſay to the King of France theſe Words:

Sire, Our Lord the King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitain, did you Homage conditionally; namely, according to the Form of the Peace made between your Anceſtors and his, which you have not kept. Moreover, that all Differences between your Subjects and his might be ended, a ſecret Treaty was made between you and my Lord Edmund his Brother, as you may remember, containing certain Articles which you have not performed, though he has done more than was promiſed on his part. After that, he required you twice by his ſaid Brother, and a third time by the Peers of France, and other Great Men of your Kingdom, to reſtore him his Land of Guienne, and to deliver thoſe of his Subjects whom you detain in Priſon, which you have refuſed. And therefore it ſeems to him, that you no longer count him your Vaſſal; and accordingly he refuſes to be ſo for the future (3).

War of Guienne of little Importance. Ib. p. 651.

How great ſoever Edward's Vexation might be, to ſee himſelf thus cheated by Philip, he choſe rather to leave Guienne in the hands of that Prince, than relinquiſh the War with Scotland, which to him ſeemed of greater importance. Beſides, he was ſenſible, before he ingaged in a War with France, it would be neceſſary to prevent the Diverſion, the Scots might make on the Frontiers of the North. For this reaſon he was contented with ſending his Brother Edmund into Guienne, with few Troops (4), his ſole Aim being to keep Philip employed in thoſe Parts, for fear of his aſſiſting the Scots. Edward not intending a vigorous proſecution of the War in Guienne, where he had only Bayonne, and ſome neighbouring Places, it may well be thought what paſſed in thoſe Parts cannot be very conſiderable. And yet, the French boaſt of gaining two Battles, one under the Earl of Valois, and the other under the Earl of Artois. But theſe Actions could not be very important, conſidering the ſmall Number of Edmund's Forces. The truth is, France was obliged to keep there a conſiderable Army, becauſe ſhe had to oppoſe, not only the Engliſh, but the Revolts of the Natives, who were extremely diſpleaſed with having a new Maſter. The Superiority of the Earl of Valois's Forces, obliged Edmund to ſhut himſelf up in Bayonne, where he died in 1296 (5). The Earl of Lincoln (6), who took the Command of the Engliſh Troops, beſieging Dax, was forced to make a haſty Retreat, upon the approach of the Earl of Artois, who was advancing to raiſe the Siege. Perhaps he received on this occaſion ſome little loſs, which the French call a Battle (7). However, I do not think it neceſſary to dwell any longer on the War of Guienne, ſince it produced no remarkable Event (8).

Edward gains the Earl of Flanders to his ſide.

It was not in Gaſcogne that Edward intended to exert his utmoſt againſt France. He perceived it very difficult to recover a Province ſo remote from England, and where he had no other Place but Bayonne. His Deſign was to attack Philip in Flanders, where the ſituation of Affairs ſeemed to promiſe him better Succeſs. The Earl of Flanders's Circumſtances obliged him to ſeek for Protection againſt France; and he could find none ſo near or ſo ready as that of the King of England, who burned with deſire to be revenged. The occaſion of the Earl's Difference with Philip was this.

Affairs of Flanders.

In the Year 1284, Guy, ſo the Earl was called, quarrelled with the Men of Ghent, on account of the Government of their City, which they pretended he had nothing to do with. In the Reign of Philip the Hardy, this Affair was brought before the Parliament of Paris, who paſſed Sentence in favour of the Earl, and fined the Magiſtrates. Guy took this occaſion to be as troubleſome as poſſible to the Inhabitants of that large City, which they highly reſented. When Philip the Fair aſcended the Throne, things had another face. Philip perceiving, the Quarrel between the Earl of Flanders and the People of Ghent offered him a favorable opportunity to make an advantage of their Diſcord, was unwilling to neglect it. Wherefore, he privately ſent word to the Magiſtrates of Ghent, that if they would renew their Proceſs againſt the Earl, he was ready to do them Juſtice. This was ſufficient to ingage the City of Ghent to renew the Quarrel. The Affair being once more brought before the Parliment of Paris, the Authority of the thirty nine Magiſtrates or Governors, aboliſhed by the former Decree, was re-eſtabliſhed in Ghent. The Earl was extremely offended, that Philip ſhould make it his buſineſs to plague him, by reſtoring to the City a Power, which to him was ſo odious. He durſt not however ſhew his Reſentment; but reſolved to take meaſures to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt him, regarding him as an Enemy, whoſe Deſigns he ought to try to prevent. Some time after, he ſet Robert de Bethun his Son to work, who, by ſecret Inſinuations, perſuaded the Cities of Flanders to fortify certain Places, contrary to the Tenor of the Treaties with France; aſſuring them, they would meet with no oppoſition from the Earl his Father. Guy's Aim was to ſet the Cities at variance with France, leſt Philip ſhould excite them againſt him. Philip was informed of the ſhare the Earl had in this Affair; but, as he was then otherwiſe employed, did not think proper to diſcover his Reſentment, either againſt the Cities which had violated the Treaties, or againſt their Adviſer. Mean while his very Silence made the Earl ſenſible, he was to expect an attack ſome other time. Things continued thus for ſome Years. Philip diſſembled his Anger, and Guy continually thought of means to prevent its Effects.

M. Weſt. p. 429. Walſing. Act. Pub. II. p. 741, &c.

During theſe Tranſactions, the Rupture between France and England happened to break out. Though Edward uſed all poſſible means to avoid a War, by the Negotiation at Paris, he believed that whatever fell out, he ought to ſecure the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Flanders, whoſe Diſcontent was no ſecret to him. To that end, he demanded his eldeſt Daughter in marriage for Prince Edward his Son, judging it an infallible means to bind him ſtrongly to his Intereſts. This Negotiation, though ſecret, came to Philip's knowledge, and gave him great Uneaſineſs. But he concealed it, leſt by ſhewing it he ſhould deprive himſelf of the means to prevent an Alliance ſo prejudicial to France. To compaſs his ends, he pretended Ignorance, and upon ſome Pretence drawing Guy and his Counteſs to Paris, kept them Priſoners. It was a ſort of Favour that he gave them their Liberty, on condition they delivered their Daughter in Hoſtage, and promiſed to break their Alliance with Edward, on pain of Excommunication.

1296. Guy was no ſooner in his Dominions but he tried all ſorts of ways to recover his Daughter from Philip. But it was not poſſible to ſucceed. Philip was too apprehenſive of the Earl's Union with England, voluntarily to let go the Pledge he had in his power.

1297. Edward forms a League againſt France.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the Affairs of Scotland, which wholly employed Edward, afforded him neither Leiſure nor Opportunity to think of his projected War againſt Philip. But as ſoon as matters were as he wiſhed them, he turned all his thoughts to Revenge. Philip's fraudulent Proceeding, being an Injury not to be eaſily forgotten, he had put a great Reſtraint on himſelf, in delaying thus long to make him repent of it. However as he was going to deal with a potent Adverſary, it was neceſſary to have a powerful Army, which England alone was not able to ſupply. Wherefore he ſought means to form beyond Sea a ſtrong League againſt France, and though it ſeemed a difficult matter, failed not to accompliſh it. Beſides the Earl of Flanders whom he gained without trouble, Adolphus of Naſſau, newly elected Emperor, Albert Duke of Auſtria, the Archbiſhop of Cologn, and ſeveral other Princes of Germany, the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Holland, Juliers, and Luxemburgh were engaged in the League, by the great Sums Edward was to furniſh them with (1). All theſe Princes, proud of their Number and Strength, ſent Cartels of Defiance to Philip, of whom he was offended with none ſo much as the Earl of Flanders; who being his Vaſſal, boldly told him, he would no longer acknowledge him for a Sovereign.

Edward checks the Pride of the Clergy. Walſing. M. Weſt. T. Wikes.

Whilſt Philip was preparing to repulſe this Attack, Edward was uſing all poſſible endeavours, to procure the Money he wanted extremely, on account of his Engagements with the confederate Princes. To that end he aſſembled the Parliament at St. Edmundsbury (2), and obtained an Aid of the eighth Part of the Moveables (3) of the Cities and Burroughs, and a twelfth of the reſt of the Laity. This Example could not influence the Clergy. They pretended they were exempted from giving Aids to the King, by virtue of a Bull ſent the laſt Year by Boniface VIII. to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, which he had kept without making publick. By this Bull all Eccleſiaſticks were expreſsly forbid to pay any Tax to ſecular Princes, without the Conſent of the Holy See. The Clergy's Refuſal extremely provoked the King. Nevertheleſs before he proceeded to violent Methods (4), he cauſed it to be repreſented to the principal Members, That ſince they poſſeſſed Fees in the Kingdom, and enjoyed the Protection of the Laws, as well as the reſt of his Subjects, it was but reaſonable they ſhould contribute to the publick Expences. But theſe Remonſtrances were ineffectual. When he found he could not prevail, he commanded all the Lay-Fees poſſeſſed by the Clergy to be ſeized, and their whole Body to be thrown out of the Protection of the Laws; expreſsly forbidding his Judges to do them Juſtice, in any caſe whatever. So bold a Step aſtoniſhed the Clergy, who, ſince the beginning of the Monarchy, had never experienced the like Reſolution, in any King of England. If Edward had been like his Father or Grandfather, perhaps that powerful Body would have found, in the People's Diſcontent, means to make the King repent of his Boldneſs. But as they perceived it would be difficult to ſtir up the People, they did not think proper to exert their Endeavours, which probably would be to no purpoſe. So that ſome ſpeedily compounding with the King for the fifth Part of their Goods, their Example drew in the reſt. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury was treated more ſeverely, as he was not only the firſt Adviſer of the Clergy's Refuſal, but perſiſted in it more obſtinately than the others (5). The King ordered all his Eſtates to be ſeized, with the Revenues of the Monaſteries of his Dioceſe, and committed the management of them to Officers, who left the Monks no more than was abſolutely neceſſary for their Subſiſtence. In all appearance, this was to puniſh them, for too warmly adhering to their Archbiſhop. The King's Reſolution at length made that Prelate ſtoop, who to recover his Sovereign's Favour, gave him a fourth Part (6) of his Goods. Thus the Clergy when they meet with vigorous Princes, are as ſubmiſſive, as they are haughty, when they have to deal with thoſe that are ſcrupulous and weak.

1297. Edward is oppoſed by the Barons. M. Weſt. Walſing.

Shortly after, on much the ſame occaſion, the Lay-Lords ſhewed more Steddineſs than the Prelates, though againſt the ſame Prince. To execute his grand Projects, he aſſembled the Nobility at Salisbury (7), on purpoſe to ſee exactly what Troops each Baron could furniſh him with (8). His Intention was to make a powerful Diverſion in Guienne, whilſt he preſſed the Enemy on the ſide of Flanders. But it was difficult to find Lords that would ſerve, but where he commanded in Perſon. Every one deſir'd to be excuſed ſerving in Guienne, though they were willing to furniſh the Troops. Edward, not ſatisfied with their Excuſes, threatned to give their Lands to ſuch as would be more obedient. Theſe Menaces raiſed great Commotions among the Nobles. They were far from thinking their Lands at the King's diſpoſal. Humphrey Bohun High-Conſtable, and Hugh Bigod Earl of Norfolk and Marſhall of England, more bold than the reſt, plainly told the King, they were ready to follow him where he commanded in Perſon, and not otherwiſe. The Marſhall added, he was willing to lead the Van-Guard under the King, as his Office obliged him, but would not ſerve under any other, to which none had a Right to compel him. The King anſwered in a great Paſſion, he would make him go. To which the other replied, he ſhould not. By the eternal God, ſaid the King then, in great Rage, You ſhall march or be hanged. By the eternal God, replied the Earl, I will neither march nor be hanged; and immediately withdrew without returning to Court any more.

Boldneſs of two Earls. Knighton. Col. 2493. Walſing. T. Abington.

Edward had ſeen, in the King his Father's Reign, frequent and fatal Inſtances of the Inſolence of the Barons. He knew too well their great Union in the defence of their Privileges, to hazard his Reputation and Quiet in a War againſt them. A Quarrel of that nature muſt have been very prejudicial to him, as well as to the whole Kingdom. The leaſt Inconvenience that could happen, was, loſing the opportunity of being revenged of the King of France. As the Barons ſtood diſpoſed, it was ſcarce to be doubted, but they would have all joined againſt him, if he had undertaken openly to chaſtiſe the Inſolence of thoſe that dared to withſtand him to his Face. He had ſtill farther Reaſon to be confirmed in this belief, when he heard that, dreading his Reſentment, they began to raiſe Troops in their Defence, in caſe he deſigned to attack them (9). Without much penetration it was eaſy to ſee, they were ſupported. Theſe Conſiderations induced the King to hide his Reſentment till he could ſhew it effectually. Beſides, he was unwilling to loſe the opportunity of going into Flanders, where the Wants of the Earl his Ally inceſſantly called him. However, it was not long before he found a favorable Juncture to correct the Boldneſs of the two Earls, by turning them out of their Poſts, becauſe they refuſed to do ſomething belonging to their Offices, for fear of falling into his hands. He was very near repenting what he had done. Juſt as he was going to embark, he received from the Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and Commons of the Realm, a long Remonſtrance, containing a Liſt of the Grievances of the Nation, and ſeveral Violations of the Great Charter. This Proceeding made him ſenſible, he was to act with deliberation, for fear of provoking a Nation, which ſeemed ready to take Fire upon the firſt occaſion. He returned therefore a very gracious Anſwer to the Remonſtrance, and promiſed upon his Honour, to redreſs, at his return, all the Abuſes complained of. He deſired the Nobles to be quiet during his Abſence, aſſuring them, he would give them entire Satisfaction. As it was no leſs neceſſary to appeaſe the People, exaſperated by the ſecret Practices of the two Earls, he publiſhed a Proclamation to juſtify his Conduct, and ſhew his Reaſons for turning out theſe two great Officers. Amongſt other things, he ſaid in this Proclamation he was informed his People were made to believe, that he refuſed to receive Remonſtrances, tending to the Good of the Publick, which he affirmed to be falſe. He expreſſed likewiſe great Sorrow for having put his Subjects to vaſt Expences for the maintenance of

The Prince his Son, whom he left Regent (2), assembling the Parliament (3), and obtaining a large Subsidy (4), confirmed King John's two Charters, by an authentick Act, signed in Flanders by the King himself, and sealed with the Great Seal which he had carried with him (5). We may observe in the History of England several of the like Instances. I mean, that the Kings, who have dealt gently with their Subjects, and answered with moderation to their Complaints, have seldom failed to appease them, provided they have not, like Henry III, affected continually to deceive them and break their Word. On the contrary, such as have acted too haughtily, have generally brought themselves into great Trouble; of which we have seen very remarkable Examples in some of the foregoing Reigns.

Philip prepares for his Defence.

Whilst Edward was employed at home in making Preparations to support the League formed against France, Philip was no less careful to provide against the impending Assault. He strengthened himself by Alliances, with the Kings of Castile and Arragon, and raised a powerful Army, whilst Joan Queen of Navarre his Wife, assembled her own Forces to assist him. Champagne, which belonged to that Princess, was first attacked, by the Earl of Bar one of Edward's Allies, who ravaged that Province from one end to the other. But the Sequel of this Undertaking was as fatal to the Earl, as the beginning was prosperous. Upon the Queen's Approach, who was advancing to defend her Country, the Earl, seized with Fear, and unable to fight, or retreat, was forced to surrender to that Princess, who sent him Prisoner to Paris.

and besieges Lisle.

Mean while, the confederate Princes made no haste to send their Troops into Flanders. Adolphus of Nassau, detained by Troubles which Philip had raised him in Germany, or as some affirm, by Presents, could not, or would not perform what he had promised. The Duke of Austria was bribed by the same means, and the Dukes of Brabant and Luxemburgh, the Earls of Guelders and Beaumont, followed their Example. Philip improving this Advantage, entered Flanders at the head of threescore thousand Men, and immediately sat down before Lisle. Guy, who impatiently waited for the English Supplies, was not able to withstand the King of France, not having half the Forces he was made to expect. All he could do was to try to break Philip's measures by a Diversion, under the Conduct of the Duke of Juliers.

The Duke of Juliers defeated by the French.

When the King of France heard, this General had taken the Field, he detached the Earl of Artois, who meeting him near Furnes, gave him Battle, and put his Army to rout. The Duke of Juliers was slain in the Fight, and the Earl of Artois lost his eldest Son. This Defeat caused Guy not to stir from Ghent and Bruges, where he expected Edward. Besides he was in great Perplexity by reason of the Divisions in his Country. There were two Parties in Flanders; one, called Porte-lys, was in the Interests of France, and the other for the Earl.

Edward arrives in Flanders. T. Wikes. Walsing. Knighton.

Factions there prejudicial to his Interest.

Edward arrived at last (6), after having been long expected, but with Forces little proportioned to the great Undertaking (7); because he depended upon the Allies, who were not so good as their Word. At his entry into Bruges, he found the whole City in Confusion, by reason of the Animosity of the two forementioned Factions. It was with difficulty, that he at length appeased the Commotions of the City, by granting the Inhabitants certain Privileges, concerning their Commerce with England. After that he came to Ghent, where he found the same Divisions. So that, as on his part, he brought not with him all the Forces he had promised, he himself saw with vexation how little able the Earl of Flanders was, to supply the Troops he had been made to expect. The Flemings were divided concerning the War. Some approved it, whilst others maintained it to be destructive to their Country, and undertaken by their Prince for his own, or the King of England's, Interests. Whilst Edward was employed in composing these Differences, so prejudicial to his Affairs, Philip, after a three Months Siege, made himself master of Lisle. When he was in possession of this Place, he easily reduced Douay, Courtray, and some other Towns in the neighbourhood. Then he marched to Bruges, which surrendered without resistance. He had formed the Project of burning the English Fleet, which lay at Anchor at Dam. But the Earl of Valois, who had taken this Expedition upon him, not being secret enough in his Preparations, found the English Ships sailed. 1297.

Lisle taken by Philip, who makes other Conquests.

All Edward's measures were broken, by the Treachery of his chief Allies, who forsook him after taking his Money. The Supplies he could expect from the Earl of Flanders, were uncertain and inconsiderable, by reason of the Porte-lys Faction, which opposed all Resolves any way detrimental to France. His own Troops were too few to enable him to withstand his Enemy's Forces. Besides, fresh Commotions in Scotland, rendered his Presence necessary in his Kingdom, where too he was not without Fear, that his Absence might occasion some Troubles. All these Considerations together, induced him to seek some Expedient to get off, without being obliged to abandon the Earl of Flanders, whom he had ingaged in his Quarrel. He found no better than to desire a Truce, which was granted him solely upon the account of the King of Sicily, and the Earl of Savoy; who used their Interest for him. By this Truce, (which was to last but till the Epiphany for Guienne, and till St. Andrew's Day (8), only for Flanders,) Philip continued in possession of the Places he had taken. Probably, this Condition served to prolong the Truce for two Years; Philip being very well pleased peaceably to enjoy his Conquests. How hasty soever Edward might be to settle matters in Scotland, he spent the rest of the Winter at Ghent, to try to unite the Inhabitants of that powerful City. He hoped by that means to have a considerable Assistance from thence, when the Truce was expired. During his stay, he was in danger of his Life, by a Sedition of the Citizens, who were resolved to murder all the English. It is said he owed his Life to the Generosity of a Flemish Knight, of the Porte-lys Faction, who by his Pains and Intreaties stopped the Fury of the mutinous People. His danger giving him reason to dread some fresh Insult, he relinquished his Undertaking and returned to his Dominions.

Such was the Success of Edward's Expedition into Flanders. The powerful League, which seemed ready to swallow up France, served only to drain the Treasure of the Projector; and convince him, how difficult it would be to recover by Force the Country lost by his Imprudence. To be disappointed in his Projects, was not much: That is a misfortune to which the greatest Men are sometimes liable. But here was more: He could not extricate himself out of the Difficulties he had run into, without greatly injuring his Honour. Notwithstanding his promise to protect the Earl of Flanders to the end, he deserted him however, as will be seen hereafter. Let us return now to Scotland, which is to be the chief Subject of the rest of this Reign.

Affairs of Scotland.

Man

1297. William Wallace ſtirs up the Scots to a Revolt. Buchanan. Walſing. Knighton.

Man of no illuſtrious Family, and of a ſtill meaner Fortune, but of a very great Genius (1). This generous Scot, though of little Authority among his Countrymen, took upon him to raiſe his Country out of the Gulph of Miſery wherein it was plunged; whilſt the Perſons of the higheſt Rank, divided by Factions, or adhering to the Conqueror, were ſtriving who ſhould moſt perpetuate its Slavery. The Scotch Writers give this famous Man a Character, which equals him to the greateſt Heroes, and are at a loſs for Words lofty enough to expreſs his Merit. Wallace then, though ſcarce known in Scotland, reſolving to retrieve the Liberty of his Country, aſſembled a ſmall number of Troops for that purpoſe. How inconſiderable ſoever this Body was, of which he had the Command, he made ſo wonderful a Progreſs, that one does not know which to admire moſt, either the Boldneſs, or the firſt Succeſs, of his Enterprize. All that longed for Liberty, finding there was a Man hardy enough to head them, liſted in Crowds under his Banner, and quickly formed a conſiderable Army. With this Aid, Wallace attacked the Places poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, and whoſe Garriſons were weak, becauſe Edward had wanted his Troops in Flanders. By his Severity to thoſe that fell into his hands, he ſtruck ſuch Terror into the reſt, that ſcarce any Place held out to Extremity, for fear of being liable to the ſame Treament. By this means he recovered in a very ſhort Space, all the Towns taken by the Engliſh, and left them only the ſingle Town of Berwick (2). Theſe proſperous Succeſſes bred in his Army ſo great Admiration for his Bravery, that, without ſtanding upon the uſual Formalities, he was declared Regent of the Kingdom. Edward, who was then in Flanders, hearing of Wallace's Progreſs (3), haſtened the Concluſion of the Treaty abovementioned, and returned into England (4), bent upon ſeverely puniſhing the Revolt of the Scots.

He drives the Engliſh out of Scotland.

Philip and Edward chooſe the Pope for Umpire. Act. Pub. II. p. 808, &c. Walſing.

Before he undertook this Expedition, it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſettle two Affairs of equal Importance. The firſt was, to find ſome way to make Peace with France, leſt Philip ſhould aſſiſt the Scots. The ſecond, to give ſome Satisfaction to the People, as he had promiſed to do after his Return. He found no better method to accompliſh his firſt Aim, than by getting Philip to agree to refer their Difference to Boniface VIII, who was not yet at variance with that Prince as he was afterwards. Philip cloſing with this Propoſal, the two Monarchs left their Conteſts to the Pope's Arbitration, not as Head of the Church, but as a private Perſon under the Name of Benedict Cajetan.

Act. Pub. II. p. 817.

Edward confirms the Great Charter. Walſing. Knighton. M. Weſt.

This Affair being like to ſucceed, the ſecond was to be thought of. In order to gain the Affection of his Subjects, Edward called a Parliament (5), and, of his own accord, confirmed the Great Charter (6). It is true, he inſiſted very much upon having this Clauſe inſerted in this Confirmation, Saving the Prerogatives of the Crown. But finding the Parliament oppoſed it with great warmth, he choſe to deſiſt, which had a very good Effect upon the People.

1298. He marches into Scotland, Walſing. Knighton.

Edward being thus freed from the Uneaſineſs theſe two Affairs gave him, put himſelf at the head of a powerful Army, and advancing into the middle of Scotland, met his Enemies at Falkirk. The two Armies were encamped ſo near together, that the Engliſh hearing a great Shout in the Enemies Camp, ran to their Arms in the utmoſt hurry, believing they were going to be attacked. The King alſo would mount his Horſe; but as he was putting his Foot in the Stirrup, the Horſe, frighted by the Noiſe that was made, threw him on the ground, and with a Kick broke two of his Ribs. This ſad Accident hindered him not from being in the Battle which quickly enſued, and commanding with the ſame preſence of Mind as if he had been unhurt. The Battle proved bloody, and withal very fatal to the Scots; who, according to ſome Writers, loſt threeſcore thouſand Men: But this is not very likely. Others who reduce the Number to ten thouſand, are perhaps as wide of the truth (7). Be this as it will, the Loſs of the Scots was ſo great, that for a long while they were not able to hold up their Head. Wallace with the Remains of his Army, retired behind the northern Fens, where it was not poſſible to follow him. Mean time, Edward improving his Victory, retook all the Places of Strength, with the ſame eaſe he had loſt them. So he may be ſaid on this occaſion to conquer Scotland a ſecond time. After neceſſary Orders for the Preſervation of the Kingdom, he marched back into England, where he was called by important Affairs. 1298.

and defeats the Scots at Falkirk. Buchanan. Walſing. M. Weſt.

Wallace was not then in a condition to take advantage of Edward's Abſence. He had not only loſt his Army, but moreover plainly perceived the Jealouſy of the Scotch Lords was one of the principal Cauſes of his Defeat. His Virtues, inſtead of filling them with Emulation, made them apprehenſive of his aſpiring to the Crown. In this belief, they choſe rather, that their Country ſhould groan under perpetual Bondage, than ſee themſelves reduced to do Homage to one of ſo inferiour a Birth. Theſe Suſpicions muſt needs have been ſpread among the Nobility, ſince Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, Son of the Candidate to the Crown, upbraided Wallace upon that account. This Earl, who ſerved in Edward's Army, being on the day of the Battle of Falkirk, in purſuit of Wallace who was retreating, and ſtopped by a little River, which the Scots had juſt paſſed, ſent to deſire him to come and ſpeak with him on the oppoſite Bank. Wallace conſenting to it, Robert repreſented to him, "That he was ruining "himſelf by his Ambition. That there was no likelihood of his reſiſting the Forces of the King of England; and though he might flatter himſelf with ſuch "Hopes, the great Men of the Kingdom would never "be brought to own him for King." Wallace replied, "That in taking up Arms, he was not in the leaſt ſwayed by Ambition: That he acknowledged himſelf too "unworthy of the Throne, to dare to look ſo high; "but that his only Aim was to free his Country, which "the great Men of the Realm ſuffered to periſh by their "Cowardice." It is ſaid this Reply made ſuch an Impreſſion on Bruce's mind, that he burſt out into Tears. It is further added, that he reſolved from that very moment, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to free Scotland from the Slavery ſhe groaned under.

The Scotch Lords are jealous of Wallace. Buchanan.

His Conference with Bruce. Buchanan.

Mean time, Wallace, knowing how much the great Men's Jealouſy of him was prejudicial to the Intereſts of the Kingdom, reſigned the Regency, and acted only as a private Perſon. He ceaſed not however, to the utmoſt of his power, and upon all occaſions, to endeavour to ſet his Country free. Some time after Edward left Scotland, they who had any remains of Affection for their Country, choſe Comyn for Regent. But this Regency was of little conſequence, ſince it gave him Authority only over a ſmall Part of the Kingdom, and a few confuſed Troops, eſcaped from the late Battle.

Wallace laid down the Regency. Buchanan.

Comyn choſen in his Place. Id.

Upon Edward's return into England (8), he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to promote the Negotiation, now in the hands of the Pope, for the Reſtitution of Guienne (9). Since he deſpaired of regaining that Province by Arms, the Alliance of the Earl of Flanders was a Burden to him; the Protection he had promiſed him, being a perpetual Obſtacle to the Concluſion of the Peace. He reſolved therefore to abandon his Ally, and from thenceforward all Difficulties began to vaniſh. The unfortunate Earl, forſaken by the King of England, and on the other ſide, preſſed by the Earl of Valois, who commanded the French Army in Flanders, knew not which way to turn himſelf. In this wretched ſituation, he was perſuaded at length to deliver himſelf up to that Prince, who promiſed to con-

He retired therefore through the Foreſt of Selkirk towards England, taking by the way the Caſtles of Ayer and Loughmaben in Anandale: And from thence came to Carliſle, and afterwards to Durham, where he held a great Council in the beginning of September, and beſtowed on ſeveral great Men of England and Scotland, the Eſtates of ſuch Scottiſh Noblemen as had of late revolted from him. The two Years Truce between France and England being about to expire, the Ambaſſadors of the two Kings met at Montreuil upon the Sea, where the Pope ſent them his Sentence of Arbitration, the Subſtance whereof was as follows: That Edward ſhould again take poſſeſſion of Guienne, and, to reſtore Union between the two Kings, ſhould marry Margaret Siſter of Philip (2); and that Iſabella Daughter (3) of the ſame Philip, ſhould be given to the Prince of Wales, Son of Edward. It was ſaid alſo in the Sentence, that John Baliol, formerly King of Scotland, ſhould be delivered into the hands of the Pope's Nuntio, to be kept where he ſhould think proper. The Plenipotentiaries of the two Crowns ſigned this Sentence: But as there were ſeveral things to be adjuſted in order to put it in execution, they agreed upon a Truce, which afterwards was frequently prolonged before the Treaty of Peace was ſigned. Mean while, Baliol was delivered to the Biſhop of Vincentia, the Pope's Nuntio, who committed him to the Cuſtody of ſome French Biſhops.

Truce granted to Scotland. Act. Pub. II. p. 868, &c. Buchanan.

When the new Regent of Scotland heard, that a Treaty was negotiating at Montreuil between France and England, he ſent Deputies to Philip to intreat him to cauſe Scotland to be included. The Juncture appeared favorable: Edward earneſtly wiſhed to recover Guienne by a Treaty, not thinking himſelf in condition to regain it any other way. Probably, therefore, he would, upon that conſideration, grant Scotland tolerable Terms, if the King of France would ſeriouſly endeavour to obtain them. And indeed, Philip tried at firſt to perſuade Edward to leave Scotland in quiet. But the moment he propoſed it, he found it impoſſible to procure any thing, but ſome little Advantages, which too they would be obliged to purchaſe, by a formal Acknowledgment of the Power that held them in Slavery. Edward was in poſſeſſion of Scotland, where he ſcarce met with any farther Oppoſition. So that, to propoſe his granting a Peace to that Kingdom, was in effect to deſire him to relinquiſh his Conqueſt. On the other hand, he could not grant a ſeparate Peace to the Regent and his Adherents, without leaving in Scotland a Power independent of his own. All therefore that Philip could obtain was a ſeven Months Truce, for ſuch as could not think of bearing his Yoke. If we believe the Scotch Hiſtorians, this Truce was ill-kept by England. But it may be, this is only to juſtify Comyn's Reſolution to break it. However that be, the Regent aſſembled the Lords whom he knew to be well-affected to their Country, and repreſented to them the ſad Condition it was reduced to. He told them, if they gave Edward time to ſecure his Conqueſt, he would take ſuch meaſures, as would render ineffectual all future Endeavours for the Recovery of their Liberty. That as ſoon as the few Remains of the Scots which ſtill reſiſted, were ſubdued, he would entirely reduce the miſerable Kingdom to a perfect Slavery. That this Deſign would now have been executed, had it not been retarded by the Truces procured them by France. That there was therefore no time to loſe, and it was neceſſary ſpeedily to reſolve to make a generous Effort for the Recovery of their Liberty, or to leave their Country in perpetual Slavery. Then he ſhewed them with what Eaſe they might free themſelves from the Yoke, whilſt Edward depended on their Weakneſs, and the Winter Seaſon offered them Advantages, which they could never more expect when once it was paſſed. Theſe Remonſtrances produced the Effect he promiſed himſelf. The Lords, fond of Liberty and impatient of their Servitude, reſolved with one accord to riſe in Arms, and every one laboured to inſpire the People with the ſame Reſolution. It was not difficult to ſucceed, for the meaner ſort were ſtill more exaſperated againſt the Engliſh than the Nobles, becauſe they were worſe treated. In a ſhort time, the whole Kingdom riſe, and it was not poſſible for the Engliſh Garriſons to put a Stop to ſo general a Revolt. All the Inhabitants of the Towns as well as of the Country taking Arms the ſame Day and Hour, the Garriſons found themſelves attacked all at once, both within and without, with ſuch Rage and Fury, that there was no poſſibility of reſiſting. In a word, they were reduced to the neceſſity of deſiring leave to depart the Kingdom, otherwiſe they could not avoid being cut in Pieces.

Edward, inraged that there was no end of theſe things, raiſed an Army with all poſſible ſpeed, and as ſoon as the Seaſon would permit, entered a third time (4), Sword in hand, that unfortunate Kingdom. The Scotch Army, which conſiſted only of ill-armed and undiſciplined Militia, not being able to ſtand againſt Edward, would have retired upon his Approach. But he followed them ſo briskly, that being at length overtaken and obliged to engage, they were entirely routed. Hiſtorians affirm, that the Fate of Scotland would have been determined that day, if the Engliſh could have purſued their Enemies through the Fens, which were known to the Natives, but which the Conquerors durſt not venture to paſs (5).

He defeats the Scots. M. Weſt.

The Scots upon this Deſeat, deſpairing of making any farther Reſiſtance, had recourſe to Intreaties and Submiſſions. They humbly deſired the King to give them leave to redeem their Lands with Money, and to reſtore their King on what Conditions he pleaſed. But he refuſed both theſe Requeſts. This Cruelty cauſed them to ſeek means to eaſe their Miſery, by putting themſelves under the Pope's Protection, to whom they ſent Ambaſſadors with an Offer of the Sovereignty of their Country. Boniface VIII, whoſe Ambition is well known, immediately accepted the Offer. He had been uſed to proceed very haughtily with Chriſtian Princes, imagining they were implicitly to ſubmit to his Will, and that his Authority reached to Temporals as well as Spirituals. In this belief, his bare Letter was ſufficient to cauſe Edward to quit all his Pretenſions to Scotland. In the beginning of this Brief, which was as follows, the Pope took for granted a thing that had never been heard of.

The Pope's Bull to Edward. Act. Pub. II. p. 844. Walſing. M. Weſt. Knighton.

BONIFACE, Servant of Servants, &c. To our beloved Son Edward, illuſtrious King of England, Greeting and Apoſtolical Benediction.

We know, Dear Son, and Experience has often convinced us, how great your devout Affection is for the Church of Rome, who upholds you in the Bowels of Love. We know, I ſay, your ardent Zeal and Reverence for her, and your Readineſs to obey her Orders. This gives us a firm Hope and entire Confidence that your Royal Highneſs will receive our Words in good part, diligently liſten to them, and effectually put them in execution. Your Royal Highneſs may have heard, and we doubt not but you remember that of old, the Kingdom of Scotland did, and does ſtill, belong to the Church of Rome, as all the World knows, and, as we have been informed, was never held, either of your ſelf, or Predeceſſors, &c.

The reſt of the Brief, which is too long to be inſerted at length, contains moſt of the Objections before-mentioned, againſt the Pretenſions of the Kings of England to the Sovereignty of Scotland. As in all appearance the Pope had been inſtructed by the Scotch Ambaſſadors, it is to be preſumed, that, if during the Aſſembly at Norham, the States of Scotland returned no Anſwer to what Edward alledged, it was not for want of Proofs, but from quite another Motive. The Pope likewiſe upbraided Edward for all the Violences committed in the Scotch War, and particularly for the Impriſonment of ſeveral Biſhops. In fine, he made himſelf Judge of the Controverſy between the Engliſh and Scots, and ordered the King to ſend Ambaſſadors to Rome with all neceſſary Inſtructions, within ſix Months at fartheſt, after which he would pronounce a final Sentence.

Edward threatens to deſtroy Scotland. Walſing. p. 78.

This haughty proceeding was by no means proper to cauſe Edward to lay down his Arms. He was ſo offended at it, that, inſtead of regarding the Pope's Pretenſions, he ſwore, if he heard any more of them, he

But before he left Scotland, he iſſued out his Writs, dated at Berwick, December 29, for the calling a Parliament to meet him at Weſtminſter, the ſecond Sunday in Lent; in which the Great Charter, and that of Foreſts, were renewed and confirmed; and a new Statute was made for the better explaining them, called Articuli ſuper Chartas, which you may ſee in Coke's ſecond Inſtitute, p. 537. *Fabian's Chron. They told him, he had ſtill a great deal to do before matters could be brought to that paſs; and there was not a Scotchman but what could ſpill the laſt drop of his Blood in the defence of his Country. But notwithſtanding his Reſolution, not to leave Scotland before it was entirely reduced, he durſt not refuſe the King of France a Truce which he demanded in behalf of the Scots (1).

1301. Anſwer to the Pope's Bull.

In the beginning of the next Year, the King ſummoned a Parliament at Loncoln (2), to conſult with them concerning the Pope's Pretenſions to Scotland, and what Anſwer ſhould be returned to his Brief. The Parliament being no leſs exaſperated at the Pope's Pretenſions and Haughtineſs than the King himſelf, it was reſolved, that a Letter ſhould be ſent to the Pope on this occaſion, ſigned by all the Barons of the Realm (3). In this Letter, they plainly tell him the direct contrary to what he aſſerted in his Brief, namely, that the Crown of England had immemorially enjoyed the Right of Sovereignty over Scotland, and it was publickly known, that Scotland, as to Temporals, never belonged to the Church of Rome. That therefore the Parliament would never ſuffer the King's Prerogative to be called in queſtion, or Ambaſſadors to be ſent to Rome upon that account, though the King himſelf ſhould be willing to be ſo condeſcending to the Holy See. Finally, they deſired the Pope to leave the King and People of England in the enjoyment of their Rights, without giving them any Diſturbance (4).

Act. Pub. II. p. 873. M. Weſt.

The King ſends a Letter alſo. Ib. p. 883.

This Letter was followed, ſome months after, by another from the King himſelf, with a Memorial (5), like that drawn up during the Aſſembly at Norham, to juſtify that the Kingdom of Scotland had been always dependent on the Crown of England. But whereas, in the firſt he carries his Claim higher than Edward the Elder, in this, he derives it from Brutus, firſt fabulous King of the Iſle of Albion, tracing it through all the Reigns of the fictitious Kings mentioned in the Hiſtory, or rather the Romance of Geoffrey of Monmouth; which he did not venture to do in the Memorial drawn up for the Scots. But every thing was valid to the Pope and Italians, who were not ſufficiently verſed in the Engliſh Hiſtory, to diſcern Truth from Falſhood. Beſides the King's Letter was very reſpectful, and contained no Expreſſions offenſive to his Holineſs. This Moderation on ſuch an occaſion, when he was highly provoked at the Pope's Pretenſions, muſt be aſcribed to the Need he had of him, in the Affair concerning the Reſtitution of Guienne (6).

Edward returns into Scotland, and prolongs the Truce. Act. Pub. II. p. 892. M. Weſt.

The Truce with Scotland was no ſooner expired, but Edward returned, and ſpent the whole Winter in that Kingdom. But when he was preparing to renew the War, he was ſo ſtrongly ſollicited by the King of France, that he could not refuſe the Scots the prolonging of the Truce till November. One might wonder he ſhould have ſo much Complaiſance for Philip, if it was true, as ſome affirm, that he had made a Peace with France, at Montreuil, and taken poſſeſſion of Guienne. But it is certain, the Peace between the two Crowns was not fully concluded till 1303, and the Treaty of Montreuil was properly only the Pope's Arbitration, containing ſeveral Articles, the Performance whereof might meet with great Difficulties; though in general the two Kings were well enough ſatisfied with it. This makes Edward's deference for Philip not ſo ſtrange, ſince by a Refuſal, he might have retarded the Concluſion of a Peace, by which Guienne was to be reſtored.

The Truce with Scotland being about to expire, Edward ſent Segrave (7) into that Kingdom to renew the War. This general marched thither, not ſo much with deſign to fight the Scots, whom he thought unable to reſiſt him, as to deſtroy the Country. To that end, he divided his Army into three Bodies, which marched at ſome diſtance from one another, in order to include the more Ground. His Notion that there was no danger, cauſing him to march in a careleſs manner, and without vouchſafing to inform himſelf of the Poſture of his Enemies, he unexpectedly met them near Roſs (8), five Miles from Edinburgh. As he was too far advanced with the Body he commanded, to receive any Aſſiſtance from the others, the Scotch Army commanded by Comyn and Frazer, attacked him without loſs of time, and immediately put him to rout. The neareſt of the two other Bodies hearing the General was attacked, haſted to his Relief, but not being able to come time enough, were likewiſe defeated. Though the Scots were victorious in theſe two Engagements, it was not without Difficulty and Loſs. Their wounded being many, and their Troops much harraſſed, they were willing to take ſome reſt, when they ſaw the third Body of the Engliſh Army advancing to attack them. This Sight put them into ſuch Diſorder, that they would forthwith have taken to flight, if the Exhortations of their Generals had not revived their Courage. This laſt Battle was the ſharpeſt of the three (9). The Engliſh animated with a deſire of revenging their Countrymen, and the Scots encouraged by their two Victories, fought a good while with equal Animoſity; but the Scots had the Advantage at laſt, and routed their Enemies. The Engliſh Hiſtorians ſlightly paſs over theſe three Battles, and the Scots, on the contrary, take care to extol this triple Victory (10). It may be, the one ſays too much, and the others too little. Be this as it will, it cannot be denied that this loſs appeared of great Conſequence to Edward, ſince it made him reſolve to enter Scotland once more, with a greater Army than ever. It was not in his Power however, to execute his Deſign till the next Year, becauſe he could not help including the Scots in a Truce made with France till June (11).

Edward's pretended eternal Truce. Act. Pub. II. p. 913.

Before the Truce was expired, the Peace between the two Crowns was concluded at Paris, on the 20th of May 1303 (12). Philip reſtored Guienne to Edward, who promiſed on his part to do him full Homage, and without limitation, in the City of Amiens. As for the Allies of the two Kings, there was no mention of them in the Treaty. On the contrary, each Monarch obliged himſelf by Oath not to aſſiſt the other's Enemies. Thus the Scots and the Earl of Flanders were equally abandoned. This is one of the many remarkable Inſtances, how little petty Princes can rely upon their Alliances with more powerful Sovereigns. Though the firſt Article always runs, that neither Peace nor Truce ſhall be made without the Conſent of all Parties, it is uſually this that is firſt violated. Indeed, Philip perſuaded the Scots, that he would procure them a ſeparate Peace, at a future Interview with Edward; but nothing was farther from his thoughts. For he had left the Scots to the Mercy of the King of England, only to prevail with him to abandon the Flemings, who having taken up Arms againſt him, had now gained great Advantages. Baliol, from whom this Treaty had taken all hopes of being ever reſtored, lived upon his Eſtate in Normandy, and ſpent the reſidue of his days as a private Perſon (13).

Edward's fourth Expedition into Scotland. Buchanan. Walſing.

Edward having nothing more to fear from France, carried his Arms a fourth time into Scotland (2), with ſo numerous an Army, that he met with no Reſiſtance. He penetrated even to the utmoſt Bounds of the Iſland, ravaging the Country on all hands; the Scots being unable to oppoſe ſo formidable a Power. Wallace alone kept cloſe to him with ſome Troops, in order to harraſs him, and revenge the Scots upon the Engliſh Soldiers, that ventured to ſtir from the Body of the Army. How great ſoever Edward's Advantages were, he was not ſo ſevere to thoſe who voluntarily ſubmitted, as he was in his former Expedition. He had found, that by driving them to deſpair, he had himſelf induced them to revolt. For this reaſon he treated favorably ſuch as ſurrendred, and permitted them to redeem their Lands, which he had before refuſed them. This Gentleneſs produced ſo good an Effect, that all the great Men of the Kingdom, ſeeing no other Remedy, were willing to embrace it (3). Before he quitted the Kingdom, Edward ordered Sterling Caſtle to be aſſaulted, which held out the whole Winter. The vigorous Defence of the beſieged, obliged the King to be there in perſon as ſoon as the Weather permitted; and yet it was July (4) before he brought them to capitulate (5). Buchanan ſays, that, contrary to the Articles of the Capitulation, he committed to priſon the Governor and Officers of the Garriſon.

The taking of Sterling finiſhed Edward's fourth Expedition and third Conqueſt (6). But though Scotland may juſtly be ſaid to be conquered on this occaſion, there were ſtill in the Country, out of the reach of the Engliſh Arms, certain impenetrable Places, which afforded a Retreat and Sanctuary to thoſe who could not live in Slavery, and who greatly promoted the Reſtoration of the whole Kingdom to its ancient Liberty. This is what Edward himſelf in the midſt of his Succeſſes could not forbear dreading. The Rigour wherewith he treated the brave Wallace, who was baſely betrayed into his hands (7), is a clear Evidence, he did not think the Scots ſubdued, though he was Maſter of Scotland. To deter them by the Puniſhment of this great Man, whom he looked upon as the ſole Author of their Revolt, he cauſed him to be tried, condemned, and executed as guilty of High-Treaſon (8), and ordered his four Quarters to be hung up in four of the principal Towns in the Kingdom (9). This Sentence was pronounced by Engliſh Judges, tho' Wallace was a Scotchman, and one that never owned the Juriſdiction of Edward. To excuſe, in ſome meaſure, ſo extraordinary a Severity, there are Hiſtorians who endeavour to defame Wallace, and charge him with having committed exceſſive Cruelties. But neither theſe Accuſations, nor the manner of his Death, have been able to hinder Poſterity from doing him the Juſtice he deſerved; and unprejudiced People from ſtill deeming him a Hero worthy of a better Fate (10).

Tragical End of Wallace. Buchanan. M. Weſt. Walſing.

Edward having nothing more to do in Scotland, returned into England, where he immediately applied himſelf to cauſe his Authority to be reſpected, for which ſome among the Barons ſhewed but little Regard. Segrave (11) was firſt attacked on this account, to ſerve for Example to the reſt. This Lord being accuſed of ſome Miſdemeanour, in defence of his Innocency challenged his Accuſer to a Duel, according to the Cuſtom of thoſe Days (12). But the King not thinking fit to conſent to it, Segrave paſſed the Sea, in order to fight out of the Kingdom. Though his Diſobedience was in ſome meaſure ſoftened by his Regard for the King, in forbearing to fight in his Territories, Edward conſidered it as being of too great Conſequence to be left unpuniſhed. As ſoon as Segrave came back, he was taken into Cuſtody, and brought to his Trial. The Judges were at a loſs to paſs Sentence upon this Affair, concerning which there was apparently no Law to direct them. However, after three days Conſultation, they declared him worthy of Death, adding in their Sentence, that it ſhould be in the King's Power to pardon him. Edward was extremely offended at the Boldneſs of the Judges, who ſeemed to ſet Bounds to his Prerogative, as if he could not exerciſe his Clemency without their Permiſſion, and gave them a ſevere Reprimand. Nevertheleſs he pardoned Segrave, upon the Interceſſion of certain Lords, who offered to become Sureties for his good Behaviour (13).

1305. Edward's Severity towards Segrave. M. Weſt.

But this was not the only Inſtance of Severity given by Edward after his Return. He was informed that Juſtice was adminiſtered, throughout the whole Kingdom, with great Negligence and Partiality; that the Magiſtrates ſuffered themſelves to be bribed with Preſents, and the rich were ſcreened from the Rigour of the Laws, whilſt the Poor were expoſed to the Oppreſſion and Tyranny of the Great. So great a Diſorder calling for a ſpeedy and effectual Redreſs, he gave an extraordinary Commiſſion to Judges nominated by himſelf, to go into all the Counties and ſtrictly enquire concerning all Malefactors of what Rank ſoever they might be, and impowered them to execute their Sentence upon the ſpot. This Commiſſion was called Trail-Bâton (14), a Word whoſe Derivation is unknown, concenring which there are ſeveral Conjectures too long to be inſerted. It ſuffices to ſay, in order to give a Notion of this extraordinary Court, it was much the ſame with what is ſtiled in France, Grands Jours. This Severity was a Check to thoſe that thought to ſcreen themſelves from Juſtice by their Credit and Riches, and ſerved at the ſame time to fill the King's Coffers with the Mulcts and Fines of the Guilty (15).

Commiſſion of Trail-Bâton. Act. Pub. II. p. 960. M. Weſt. Walſing.

To theſe two Inſtances of Severity he added a third, very proper to ſhew his Intention that the Laws ſhould be obſerved, without regard to Birth or Dignity. Prince Edward his Son being perſuaded by Piers Gaveſton, one of his Favourites, to commit ſome Outrage againſt the Biſhop of Cheſter (16), he ordered him to be publicky impriſoned, not ſuffering his Rank to exempt him from Juſtice.

That Chronicle derives it from a certain Inſtrument anciently belonging to Shoemakers; wherewith they uſed to beat their Apprentices, called a Trayle-baſton. The King in his return out of Scotland was told this Story, concerning thoſe who then made it a Trade to take Money to beat other Men. A certain wicked Perſon, having hired ſome of thoſe Ruffians to beat another Man, whom he durſt not meddle with himſelf, they cudgeled him very ſeverely: But he happening to know one of them, found out who it was that had hired them; whereupon deſiring them to ſpare him, he promiſed them, if they would give as many Blows to him that ſet them on Work, he would reward them doubly; which they agreed to: Accordingly, in their return, they met with the Man that firſt employed them, who aſking them, whether they had done as he had ordered them? They anſwered, Yes, and that they were to receive as much more for the like Buſineſs; ſo one of them being a Shoemaker, crying out Trayle-baſton, they all fell upon him, and cudgeled him twice as much as they did the other. At which Story the King at firſt ſmiling, was reſolved to ſecure his People for the future from ſuch Malefactors; and therefore iſſued out the foreſaid Commiſſion. Tyrrell. p. 160. The Commiſſion itſelf is in Rymer's Fœd. T. II. p. 960. and dated at Weſtminſter the 6th Day of April.

(15) Theſe Juſtices were in a manner the ſame with the Juſtices in Eyre. Their Office was to make Inquiſition through the Realm, by the Verdict of ſubſtantial Juries, upon Mayors, Sheriffs, Bayliffs, Eſcheators and others, concerning Extortion, Bribery, and ſuch Grievances, as Intruſions into other Men's Lands, Barretors, and Breakers of the Peace, &c. For the Etymology of the Word Trail-baton, ſee Spelman's Gloſſary.

(16) There was no Biſhop of Cheſter till 1540. when that See was erected by King Henry VIII. The Perſon here meant, was Walter de Langton, Biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry. (M. Weſt. p. 434.) For Petrus, one of the Biſhops of this See, removing it to Cheſter in 1075, it hence came to paſs, that his Succeſſors were many times called Biſhops of Cheſter.——The Outrage committed by the Prince againſt the Biſhop, was, that he, together with Gaveſton, and other ill Companions, had broke down the Fences of the Biſhop's Park, and killed his Deer. Fabian.

the ſame Moderation and the ſame Regard for the People. Clement V, Native of Bourdeaux, ſucceeding Boniface VIII, Edward thought he ſhould improve his Intereſt with the new Pope, to obtain a Diſpenſation from the Oath he had taken, with regard to the two Charters of Liberties. The Pope made no Scruple to grant him that Favour. He ſuppoſed, as it appears in his Bull, that the King was forced to take that Oath; and that Suppoſition, falſe as it was, ſeemed to him a ſufficient Reaſon to abſolve him from the ſame. It is pretended Edward purchaſed this Diſpenſation by a Preſent of Gold Plate to the Pope. The Alarm cauſed by this Step in the Kingdom was not groundleſs, ſince it ſoon began to be perceived, that the King aſſumed a greater Authority, than was allowed by the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm. He even affected to diſcover his Intention, on an Occaſion where it could not be miſtaken. Clement V, granted him a Tenth upon the Clergy for three Years, reſerving one half to himſelf for the Occaſions of the Holy See (1). The Parliament not being able to bear this ſhameful Trade, which tended to impoveriſh the Clergy without any neceſſity, and to drain the Kingdom of Money, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and forbid the Collectors to levy the Tenth. Edward, regardleſs of the Parliament, removed the Prohibition by his own Authority, and permitted the Collectors to go on. This arbitrary Act coming immediately after the abovementioned Diſpenſation, made the Engliſh apprehenſive, the King had formed a Deſign upon their Liberties, and their Apprehenſions appeared but too well-grounded. But if Edward had any ſuch Intent, the Troubles which ſuddenly broke out a-freſh in Scotland, prevented the Execution, and rendered the Pope's Favour ineffectual.

1306. Affairs of Scotland. Major. Buchanan.

The Scots, though ſo often vanquiſhed, and as often conſtrained to ſwear Fealty to Edward, could not inure themſelves to his Yoke. Robert Bruce, Earl of Carric, was one of thoſe that thought they had moſt Reaſon to complain. Not only his Father Robert was excluded from the Crown, but moreover, Edward had now broke his Word with him. He promiſed to place him on the Throne, in the room of Baliol; but made not the leaſt Step towards the performance of his Promiſe. Nevertheleſs, Robert all along ſerved him faithfully, both before and after his Father's death, flattering himſelf perhaps, that he would one day accompliſh his Promiſe. But his diſcourſe with Wallace, on the day of the Battle of Falkirk, and the King's whole Behaviour, convincing him that Edward had only his own ends in view, he entertained the generous Deſign of exerting his Endeavours, to free his Country from the Servitude to which it was reduced. At the ſame time, he thought of procuring the Crown of Scotland for himſelf, to which he pretended to have a lawful Title, notwithſtanding the Sentence given againſt the Earl his Father. John Comyn, ſirnamed the Red, another Scotch Lord of great Diſtinction in Scotland, but however of leſs Credit than Bruce, was, or ſeemed to be, in the ſame ſentiments, and to have the Intereſt of his Country at Heart. This Conformity cauſed theſe two Lords to communicate their Thoughts to each other, after long ſounding one another, without daring to ſpeak their minds. At length, both growing bolder, they had ſeveral Conferences together, wherein they agreed upon means to accompliſh their Projects. Theſe Conferences ended in an Agreement, containing theſe two Articles. I. That they ſhould act in common to promote Robert Bruce to the Crown of Scotland. II. That in conſideration of Comyn's Services, Bruce ſhould make over to him all his private Patrimony, and appoint him his Lieutenant-General. Theſe meaſures being taken, Robert came to Edward's Court, where it was neceſſary to gain certain Scotch Lords, who were in the Intereſts of that Prince.

Bruce and Comyn contrive to free their Country. M. Weſt.

Mean time, whether Comyn repented of what he had done, or, as ſome affirm, had contrived this Plot on purpoſe to enſnare Robert, he diſcovered the whole Project to the King. It is ſaid, he even ſent him the original Agreement under both their Hands and Seals. The King immediately deſigned to apprehend Robert, but fearing thereby to miſs of his Accomplices, was contented with narrowly watching him. He hoped to make ſome freſh Diſcoveries by means of Comyn, to whom Robert communicated by Letters whatever he did at Court. The King's Deſign could not be ſo ſecret, but it was perceived by the Earl of Gomer (2), an old Friend of the Family of Bruce then at London. This Earl knowing Robert was narrowly watched, and not daring by word of Mouth to diſcover ſo important a Secret, ſent him a Pair of Spurs, with ſome pieces of Gold, as if he had borrowed them of him. Robert, who was endowed with great Penetration, preſently found there was ſome myſtery in this pretended Reſtitution of his Friend, and concluded, he meant by it to adviſe him to make his Eſcape. In this belief, he immediately came to a Reſolution, and executed it with ſuch addreſs and diligence, that it was impoſſible to prevent him, and much more to overtake him. As he had communicated his Thoughts only to Comyn, he did not doubt but he was betrayed by that treacherous Friend. Accordingly, as ſoon as he came into Scotland, he repaired to Dumfries, where Comyn then was, and meeting him in the Church of the Cordeliers, little expecting his coming, ſtabbed him with his own Hand (3). This bold Stroke, added to the Plot he had laid, expoſing him to the King's Reſentment, he ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of openly declaring himſelf, well knowing there was no Safety for him but in the Succeſs of his Deſigns. Whereupon, ſuch Numbers flocked to him, that he was quickly in condition to go well attended to Scone, where he was ſolemnly crowned (4). After which, all the People in general ſided with him.

It was with extreme Vexation that Edward perceived he was miſtaken, in imagining he had nothing more to do in Scotland. He would not however give over his firſt deſign. But to ſecure for the future the poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, he reſolved to reduce it to ſuch a ſtate, that there ſhould be no more danger of a Revolt. Purſuant to this Reſolution, he ſent Audemar of Valence, Earl of Pembroke (5), with an Army to prepare the way, whilſt he aſſembled all his Forces at Carliſle (6). To render his Expedition the more ſignal, he knighted three hundred young Gentlemen, who attended the Prince his Son, whom he was willing, on this occaſion, to initiate in the Art of War (7).

Mean time, Robert made great Progreſs in Scotland, and took ſeveral places. He would have carried his Conqueſts farther, if the Earl of Pembroke had not ſtopped his career. The Earl entering Scotland, marched directly to Robert, who, not thinking proper to retreat on this firſt occaſion, went himſelf to meet him. The two Armies coming to an Engagement, Robert's was put to the rout (8). But as his Loſs was not great, he was willing to venture a ſecond Battle (9), where he had no better Succeſs. Theſe two Defeats upon one another, obliging him to quit the Country, he withdrew to one of the Hebrides, where he lay concealed at a Relation's Houſe, in expectation of a more favorable Juncture. Shortly after, Edward entering the Kingdom with a numerous Army (10), found the Scots in Conſternation, and their Troops diſperſed. So having no Enemies to encounter, he ſent out Detachments on all ſides to ſeize Bruce's Adherents. Great Numbers were taken, who all felt that Prince's Severity (11). 1306. Edward's Age, and Vexation to ſee himſelf ſo often obliged to begin afreſh, rendered him ſo inexorable, that he hardly pardoned any one Perſon. The Biſhops of Glaſcow and St. Andrews, who were taken with their Coats of Mail over their Habits, would have fallen a Sacrifice to his Vengeance, had not his Fear of diſobliging the Pope ſaved their Lives. They were however ſent into England, and thrown into Priſon (1). The Earl of Athol, allied to Edward, and the Royal Family of Scotland, was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt, only by the heighth of the Gallows on which he was hanged. The Counteſs of Buquhan, who aſſiſted at Robert's Coronation (2), was put into a Wooden Cage, and placed as a ridiculous Sight to the People on the Walls of Berwick Caſtle. Mary her Siſter underwent the ſame Fate at Roxborough.

1307. After Edward had thus taken Vengeance on Robert's Adherents, who were ſo unfortunate as to fall into his hands, he ſpent the Winter at Carliſle, where he ſummoned the laſt Parliament of his Reign (3). The firſt Buſineſs of this Aſſembly, was about means to ſecure the poſſeſſion of Scotland, by uniting that Kingdom to England. Edward was reſolved to ſpare nothing to keep the Scots in awe, and even to uſe, for that purpoſe, the moſt rigorous Methods. But the Face of Affairs was much altered in that Country, before any fixed Reſolution was taken.

Edward would unite Scotland to England.

Parliament at Carliſle. M. Weſt. Walſing.

This Parliament applied themſelves alſo with great diligence, to prevent the Extortions of the Court of Rome, which were ſtill continued with the ſame Exceſs as before, notwithſtanding the Meaſures taken to ſuppreſs them. Nay, Statutes were made, which might have eaſed this Grievance, had they been well executed.

Statutes againſt the Court of Rome. M. Weſt. Walſing.

At this very time it was, that the Biſhop of Lichfield, High-Treaſurer, cauſing the King to obſerve the Aſcendant, Piers Gaveſton, a young Man of a very debauched Life, had over the Prince his Son, and the pernicious Conſequences that might ſpring from ſo great a Familiarity, Edward reſolved to apply an immediate Remedy. To that end, with the Advice of the Parliament ſtill aſſembled, Gaveſton was baniſhed the Realm, as a Corrupter of the young Prince (4). Moreover the King was pleaſed, that his Son ſhould promiſe with an Oath, never to recall him, and that Gaveſton ſhould ſwear likewiſe never more to ſet foot in England. Upon that condition he allowed him a Penſion of a hundred Marks, to be paid out of the Revenues of Guienne (5).

Piers Gaveſton baniſhed the Kingdom. Act. Pub. II. p. 1043. M Weſt. Walſing.

Notwithſtanding Edward's Reſolution to diſable Scotland from ever recovering, the Time of that Kingdom's Deliverance was at hand. God, who was pleaſed to chaſtiſe the Scots, had not decreed the utter Deſtruction of that Nation, which was reduced to the laſt Extremity. Edward leaving Scotland, Robert Bruce ſallied out of his Retreat, and effectually made uſe of the King's Abſence, and the Sharpneſs of the Winter, which hindered the Engliſh Troops from acting. He aſſembled the Remains of his diſperſed Army, and reinforced them with freſh Supplies, which the Scotch Lords, exaſperated at Edward's Severity, brought him from all Quarters. With theſe Troops he attacked the Earl of Pembroke, who commanded in Scotland, and obtained over him a ſignal Victory (6), wherein the Engliſh General was made Priſoner. Then he marched againſt the Earl of Gloceſter, who was at the head of another Body, and obliged him to retreat to the Caſtle of Aire, which he beſieged, though without Succeſs. As he was maſter of the Field, and had none to oppoſe him, he eaſily took ſeveral Places, and cauſed them to be diſmantled; as well not to be obliged to leave Garriſons, as to prevent the Engliſh from fortifying them hereafter.

Edward, ſurprized at this unexpected Revolution, and implacably exaſperated againſt the Scots, reſolved to be ſignally revenged of that Nation. To that end, he ſummoned all the Vaſſals of the Crown without exception, to meet him at Carliſle about the middle of the Summer, on pain of forfeiting their Fees. His Intention was to march into the Heart of Scotland, and deſtroy that Kingdom from Sea to Sea, as he had often threatned. But God permitted him not to execute ſo barbarous a Purpoſe. He was hardly arrived at Carliſle, where he had drawn together the fineſt Army England had ever ſeen, when he was ſeized by a Diſtemper, which put an end to his Days, and all his Projects. As ſoon as he found himſelf ill, he knew he ſhould die; and whilſt his Mind was ſound, he ſent for Prince Edward his eldeſt Son (7), and earneſtly recommended to him three things: The firſt was, vigorouſly to proſecute the War with Scotland, till he had entirely ſubdued the Scots. For that purpoſe, he adviſed him, to carry along with him his Bones at the Head of the Army, not at all queſtioning but that Object would daunt the Courage of the Enemies he had ſo often vanquiſhed. The ſecond thing he recommended, was to ſend his Heart to the Holy-Land, with thirty two thouſand Pounds Sterling, he had provided for the Support of the Holy Sepulchre. The third was, never to recall Gaveſton. After theſe his laſt Orders to his Son, he cauſed himſelf to be carried by eaſy Journeys into Scotland, being deſirous to die in a Country he had thrice conquered. In this manner he advanced as far as the little Town of Burgh (8), where his Sickneſs being increaſed by a Dyſentery, which came upon him, he reſigned his laſt Breath on the 7th of July, 1307, in the ſixty-eighth Year of his Age, having reigned thirty-four Years, ſeven Months, and twenty Days. His Corps was carried to Waltham, and from thence to Weſtminſter-Abbey, where it was done over with Wax, and laid by Henry his Father (9).

His laſt Words to his Son. Walſing. M. Weſt.

Dies at Burgh. Act. Pub. II. p. 1059. M. Weſt. Walſing.

Thus lived and died Edward the firſt of that Name ſince the Norman Conqueſt, and the fourth ſince Egbert. This Prince had, doubtleſs, very noble Qualities, and particularly great Valour and Prudence. He knew how to maſter his Paſſions, and return to the right way when he had ſtrayed from it; a Quality never to be ſufficiently commended in a Sovereign. When we compare him with his Father, his Grandfather and his own Son, his Succeſſor, we find he far excelled them all. This Compariſon, which one can hardly help making, has been ſo much to his Advantage, that the Engliſh Hiſtorians have uſed the ſtrongeſt Expreſſions in his Encomium, and would have him paſs for the greateſt Prince of his Age. A famous Writer has not ſcrupled to ſay, That God had pitched his Tabernacle in the Breaſt of that Monarch. But his whole Conduct, with regard to Scotland, does not give of him ſo advantagious an Idea. However, without examining too cloſely the Expreſſions uſed by the Hiſtorians in his Praiſe, it may be ſaid, he was a great King, and that England received conſiderable Advantages from his Adminiſtration. The Kingdom, weakened by the ill Management of the two preceding Kings, was reſtored to its former Splendor, by the Abilities of this Prince, who knew how to make himſelf beloved and reſpected by his Subjects, as well as dreaded by his Neighbours. The Conqueſt of Wales, in vain attempted by his Predeceſſors, added a great Luſtre to his Reign, and was very beneficial to his Kingdom. That of Scotland would no doubt have gained him more Honour, had it been entirely finiſhed, ſince the Scotch Hiſtorians would have ſpoken of him in different Terms from what they have done, if at the time of their writing they had been Engliſh.

His Encomiam and Character.

Camden in Cumberland.

He was very perſonable, and taller than the generality of Men by the Head. His Hair was black, and curled naturally, and his Eyes of the ſame Colour, ſparkled with uncommon Vivacity. He would have been perfectly well ſhaped, if his Legs, which were a little too long, had been in proportion to the reſt of his Body. Hence he had the Sirname of Long-Shanks. He joined to his bodily Perfections a ſolid Judgment, a great Penetration, and a prudent Conduct, which very rarely ſuffered him to make a falſe Step. Beſides this he had Principles of Juſtice, Series of Parliaments ſince his Reign. Stat. de Tallagio non conc.

We have an uninterrupted Series of all the Parliaments held in England, from the 22d Year of this Reign (8). The Conſtitution of theſe Aſſemblies, ſuch as it is at this Day, was ſo well ſettled in this ſame Reign, that there was an additional Law made to the Great Charter, whereby it was enacted, That no Tax ſhould be levied upon the People without the Conſent of the Commons (9).

The Title of Baron limited.

It may be further obſerved, that in this Reign the Title of Baron, which was common to all that held Lands of the Crown, was confined to thoſe whom the King ſummoned to Parliament.

(1) Queen Eleanor died, as is related above, p. 381. Note (2), the 28th of November 1291, at Richard de Weſton's Houſe at Hardeby. At the Places where her Body reſted, were erected to her memory goodly Croſſes, namely, at Lincoln, Grantham, Stanford, Geddington, Northampton, Stony-Stratford, Dunſtable, St. Albans, Waltham, and Charing. Her Bowels were buried in the Cathedral at Lincoln, where the King erected a Cenotaph for her, on which is placed her Figure of gilt Copper, with an Inſcription. Her Body lies in Weſtminſter Abbey, at the Feet of Henry III, under a Tomb of gray Marble, having on the North Side the Arms of England and Leon and Ponthieu, with her Figure as large as the Life. It is obſervable, that Queen Eleanor bore quarterly, Gules, a Caſtle Or: And Argent, a Lion rampant Purple, which were the Arms of Ferdinand III, King of Caſtile and Leon her Father, and quartered by him, and were the firſt two Coats that were born quarterly in one Shield, which our King Edward III. next imitated, when he quartered France and England. Theſe Arms, with thoſe of Ponthieu, viz. Or, three Bentlets Azure, within a Border, Gules, are carved in Stone in ſeveral Places on the Croſs erected to her Memory near Northampton. Sandford's Geneal. p. 129.

(3) He was a Servant of her firſt Huſband. The Marriage being done, (in 1296,) without the Knowledge of her Father, this Ralph was committed to Priſon, and all thoſe Lands and Caſtles formerly made over to Earl Gilbert, and Counteſs Joanna, ſeized into the King's Hands. But by the Mediation of Anthony Bec Biſhop of Durham, Peace was made betwixt the King and his Daughter, and her new Huſband, and his Lands reſtored. Not long after Ralph was ſummoned to Parliament by the Title of Earl of Gloceſter and Hereford, which he enjoyed till his Son-in-law, Gilbert de Clare, came of Age. Afterwards in all Parliaments he was ſummoned as Lord Monthermer. By the ſaid Joanna he had two Sons, Thomas and Edward. Sir Thomas de Monthermer had an only Daughter Margaret, Wife of John Montague, by whom ſhe had John Montague Earl of Saliſbury, from whom the preſent Duke of Montague, the Earls of Mancheſter and Sandwich, and the Baron of Halifax derive their Original. Sandford's Geneal. p. 142.

The Reader is to obſerve, that the Hiſtory of the Royal Revenue in the foregoing Coin-Notes, is all Matter of Fact, taken from the Revenue-Rolls and other Records, and confirmed by numberleſs Inſtances by Mr. Madox, in his Hiſtory of the Exchequer. Theſe Rolls (which are kept in the Pipe-Office, and called the Great Rolls,) of all the Records in the Exchequer, juſtly challenge the Pre-eminence, not being inferior even to Domes-day itſelf. From the very firſt Eſtabliſhment of the Exchequer, it was uſual every Year to make a Great Roll, containing an exact Account of all the foregoing branches of the Royal Revenue, as ariſing in each County. The Great Rolls of moſt of the Years of Henry II, Richard I, and John, are in being, and as appears by Madox, might be of admirable uſe to the Engliſh Hiſtorian and Antiquary. The moſt Antient of theſe Records is the Great Roll, (commonly ſaid to be) of the fifth Year of King Stephen. A famous Monument of Antiquity, (ſays Madox,) whether we conſider the Hand-writing, or the Contents. This Great Roll (or rather Bundle) conſiſts of ſixteen large Rolls, writ on both Sides, of about four foot long, (one with another, for they are not of an equal Length) and a foot broad. This Great Roll, Mr. Madox proves to belong to ſome Year of Henry I, Pryn ſays expreſly the Eighteenth. In order to ſee the Nature of theſe Rolls in general, I ſhall add here a few Inſtances, relating to the ſeveral Branches of the Royal Revenue. N. I ſhall proceed now to ſhow the State of the Exchequer, from the End of the Reign of King John, to the End of the Reign of King Edward II. called by Mr. Madox the ſecond Period; as from William the Conqueror, to King John's ſigning the Magna Charta, is by him, called the firſt Period. It may be obſerved, that at the beginning of this ſecond Period, and for ſome time afterwards, the Exchequer continued in much the ſame State it was in during the firſt; bating the Change made by the Separation of Common Pleas, from the King's Court, and it, (mentioned in a Note, p. 287.) It was as before, a great and ſolemn Court, frequented by the King's great Officers, and guided for the moſt part by the antient Rules, Aſſizes and Cuſtoms. But before the end of Henry III's Reign, it fell in great meaſure from its antient Grandeur, and from thenceforward, continued in a State of Declenſion; inſomuch that about the End of the ſecond Period, it was in many Reſpects different from what it had been in former Ages. This will appear, by comparing the State of the Exchequer, during the firſt Period, with the State of it, during the latter Part of the Second. In the King's Exchequer there ſtill remained the Diſtinction of the two notable Terms of the Year, called the Duo Scaccaria, (See Coin-Note, p. 199.) Beſides the principal Exchequer, there were ſeveral inferior Receipts or Treaſuries, that were called by that Name. There were Exchequers at Durham, Cheſter, Carliſle, Berwick, and Caernarvon, at which laſt, the King had his Chamberlain, and Treaſurer; and the Writ of Summonce was there uſed for levying the King's Debts, ariſing in thoſe Parts. The principal Exchequer, when mentioned with any of theſe, was diſtinguiſhed by Scaccarium de Londonia, Weſtmonaſterii, and with reference to the Exchequer of the Jews, Magnum Scaccarium. The principal times of Seſſion were the two Terms of Eaſter, and St. Michael. At which times the Proceſs that iſſued pro rege was returnable, and many Acts became neceſſary to be done there, in Conſequence thereof. The Exchequer was alſo holden during the other two Law-Terms of St. Hilary, and of the Trinity. But it ſeemeth, that the Treaſurer and Barons ſometimes ſat, if there was occaſion, at other times not compriſed within the four Terms, and ſometimes on Sundays. The Day of the Liberate was counted the Time of their riſing. In the Archive of Corpus Chriſti College in Cambridge, there is a Manuſcript Calendar for the uſe of the Auditores Compotorum, and others, reſiding at the Exchequer. It is in a Hand of about the Time of Ed. II. or III. Though the Exchequer was generally held at Weſtminſter, during this ſecond Period, yet it was ſometimes by the King's ſpecial Command held elſewhere. As in the firſt, ſo alſo in the ſecond Period, the King, if he pleaſed, ſat and acted in Perſon at the Exchequer, King Henry III. did ſo frequently. From the moſt antient Times, the Perſons employed at the King's Exchequer, enjoyed ſeveral Privileges. The Records of the firſt Period, relating to this Subject, are not ſo clear and full as thoſe of the Second. Theſe Records mention the Privilege of impleading, and being impleaded in the Exchequer only: Freedom from Toll, for things bought for their own Uſe: Freedom from Suit to County-Courts, Hundred-Courts, &c. and other Privileges. It is alſo to be underſtood, that ſeveral of the Reſidents at the Exchequer had Privileges for their Clerks and Men. There was alſo a ſort of Privilege allowed to Perſons, who were Suitors or Accomptants at the Exchequer; namely, if they were to appear in any inferior Court or Place, upon a certain Day, in caſe they were that Day attending at the Exchequer, they were not to be put in default Below. The Exchequer was a Court greatly concerned in the Conſervation of the Prerogatives, as well as the Revenue of the Crown. It was the care of the Treaſurer, and Barons, and the King's Council at the Exchequer, to ſee that the Rights of the Crown were not invaded by ſuch as claimed Liberties or Exemptions; and to allow, or diſallow, of ſuch Liberties as Reaſon and Juſtice ſhould require. It is true, this had ſome relation to the regal Revenue, inaſmuch as Men were wont to be puniſhed by Amercements, Seiſures, Fines, for undue Uſurpations of Liberties, and were obliged or induced to fine for Confirmation or Improvement of their Liberties, if they deſired the ſame. However, many Affairs of this Nature were wont to be examined and regulated at the Exchequer, and therein great care was taken to preſerve the Rights of the Crown inviolate. Upon this ground, probably, it became the uſual Method for Charters of Liberties to be read and inrolled at the Exchequer. So that commonly, when the King granted or confirmed Liberties by his Letters Patent, a cloſe Writ directed to the Treaſurer and Barons, was wont to iſſue, reciting the Subſtance of ſuch Grant or Confirmation, and commanding the Barons to allow thereof. In a word, the Authority and Dignity of the Court of Exchequer was eſteemed ſo great, that the Acts thereof were not to be examined or controlled in any other of the King's ordinary Courts of Juſtice. The Exchequer was a great Repoſitory of the King's Records. Thither the Records of the Court holden before the King, of the Court of Common Bench, and of the Juſtices in Eyre were brought, to be laid up in the Treaſury; where they ſtill remain, under the Cuſtody of the Treaſurer and Chamberlains of the Exchequer. Secondly, of the Perſons that ſat and acted in the Exchequer, during this ſecond Period. The King's chief Juſticiary continued at firſt to preſide and act as he had before uſed to do. Afterwards, when he ceaſed to preſide there, the Power of the Treaſurer increaſed. Then, the Affairs were guided by the Treaſurer and Barons of the Exchequer. To them may be added the King's Council, whom we often find acting both in the ſuperior Court, and in the Exchequer; and that Men were ſometimes ſummoned to appear before the King's Council there, on ſet Days. The next Perſon was the Treaſurer. King Henry III. by his Charter, granted his Treaſury of his Exchequer of England, to Walter Mauclerc, Biſhop of Carliſle, to hold during Life. Some Perſons have been inclined to think, the Office of the King's Treaſurer, (or as we now call it, Treaſurer of England,) and that of Treaſurer of the Exchequer, were two diſtinct Offices. But in numberleſs Inſtances, the Treaſurers during the Reigns of Henry III, Edward I, and II. are ſtiled ſometimes the King's Treaſurer, and ſometimes

EDWARDVS PRIMVS SCOTORVM MALLEVS HIC EST : 1308 PACTVM SERVA

Upon a Tablet this Epitaph [illegible] is in Latin and English.

Mors est morsu nimis, magnus qui jungit in imis.
Maxima mors minimis, conjungens ultima primis.
Nullus in orbe fuit homo vivens, nec valet esse.
Qui non morte ruit; est hinc exire necesse.
Nobilis et fortis, tibi tu confidere noli.
Omnia sunt mortis, sibi subdit singula soli.
Me mundi medio magnum mors impia movit.
Anglia pre tedio satis amris plangere novit;
Terruit EDWARDUS vario venerandus honore.
Rex nuper ut Nardus fragrans virtutis odore
Cede leopardus, invictus et oblique pavore,
Ad rivum tardus, discretus et ewbaris ore,
Viribus armorum quasi gigas ardua gessit,
Colla superborum prudens per prelia pressit,
Inter Flandrenses fortuna sibi bene lavit,
Alt quoque Wallenses & Scotos suppeditavit
Rex bonus absque pari strenue sua regna regebat
Quod natura dare potuit bonitatis habebat,
Actio justitie, per regni, sanctio legis,
Et fuga nequitie premunt precordia Regis:
Gloria tota ruit, Regem capit hec modo fossa:
Rex quandoque fuit, nunc nil nisi pulvis & ossa,
Filius ipse Dei quem corde colebat et ore,
Gaudia freit ei, nullo permista dolore,

Dum virit Rex & valuit sua magna potestas,
Fraus latuit, par magna fuit, regnavit honestas.

Death is too doleful which doth join
The highest Estate full low;
Which completh greatest Things with least,
And last with first also.
No Man hath been in World alive,
Nor any may there be,
Which can escape the Dint of Death.
Needs hence depart must We.
O Noble and Victorious Man,
Trust not unto thy Strength.
For all are subject unto Death,
And all must hence at length.
Most cruel Fate from Worldly Stage
Hath wrest a worthy Wight
For whom all England mourned loud
To see his doleful Plight.
Edward is dead, which was adorn'd
With divers Graces here.
A King, of fragrant Nardus Height,
A gracious Princely Peer.
In Heart the which was Leopard like,
Right puissant, void of Fear.
Most slow to bride, discreet and wise,
And gracious every where.
In Arms a Giant fierce and fell
Attempting famous Facts,
Most prudent, did subdue the Proud,
By Feat of Martial Acts:
In Flanders Fortune gave to him
By Lot right good Success.
In Wales he was the Scottish Rout
With Arms he did suppress.
This King without his like alive
Did firmly guide his Land.
And what good Nature could conceive
He had it plight at Hand.
He was in Justice, and in Peace,
Excelling: Laws took place,
Desire to Evils all Wicked Works
Did hold this King's good Grace.
He now doth lie intombed here,
Which forthered each good Thing.
Now nought he is but Dust and Bones,
Which was a worthy King.
The very Son of God, whom erst
This King did love right dear,
Hath given to him Immortal Bliss,
For his good living here.
Whilst liv'd this King, by him all Things
Were in mad goodly Plight:
And Honesty had Might.

Treaſurer of the Exchequer. It does not appear, what Appointment the Treaſurer in the moſt antient Times received of the King. In the Reign of Henry III. the yearly Salary was c Marks. The ſame Salary was paid to John Biſhop of Ely, Treaſurer 25 Ed. I. But at that time, the King uſed to make other Proviſion for the Treaſurers by ſome beneficial Grant, or Eccleſiaſtical Preferment; and ſo likewiſe for the Chancellors, and other Officers, who were Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. Sometimes there was at the Exchequer an Officer, called the Treaſurer's Lieutenant. He acted in the Treaſurer's Abſence, or if no Treaſurer, executed the Treaſurer's Office, and was in effect the Treaſurer's Deputy, or Vice-Treaſurer; Locum tenent, ſignifying a Deputy, or a Perſon that acts in another's ſtead. There were Lieutenants to ſeveral other Officers, as to the King's Chancellor, Earl Marſhal, Sheriffs, &c. After the Treaſurer, came the Chancellor, who ſeems to have been appointed to be a check upon the Treaſurer. He took an Oath upon entring into his Office to this effect: "That he would well and truly ſerve the King, in his Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer: That he would well and truly "do, what appertained to his Office: That he would diſpatch the King's Buſineſs before all other: And that he would ſeal with the Exchequer Seal, no "judicial Writ of any other Court, beſides the Exchequer; whilſt the Chancery, (or Chancellor) was within twenty Miles of the Place where the Ex-"chequer was holden." Lib. Rub. Scac. p. 14. The reſt of the Perſons that ſat in the Exchequer, were the Barons, who were appointed by the King in the following manner: "Rex omnibus ad quos, &c. Sciatis nos conceſſiſſe dilecto et fideli noſtro Magiſtro Alexandro de Swereford Theſau-"rario Sancti Pauli Londoniæ, Quadraginta Marcas ſingulis annis percipiendas ad Scaccarium noſtrum ad ſe ſuſtentandum in ſervitio noſtro ad Scaccarium "ubi reſidet per præceptum noſtrum, donec ei aliter providerimus. In cujus rei Teſtimonium, &c. Teſte Rege apud Weſtm. 21° die Octobris." Pat. 18 Hen. III. M. 2. Again, "Rex mandat Baronibus de Scaccario ſuo quod conſtituit dilectum et fidelem ſuum Johannem de Cobeham, Baronem ſuum "ejuſdem Scaccarii; ita quod officium Baronis ibidem exerceat quamdiu ſibi placuerit: Et ideo mandat eiſdem, quod ipſum Johannem in Baronem ejuſdem "Scaccarii ad hoc admittant in forma prædicta. T. Meipſo apud Weſtm. 8 die Junii, anno regni quarto." Trin. Com. 4 Ed. I. Rot. 8. b. The next Coin-Note, (which concludes this Subject) will treat of, 1. The Buſineſs. 2. The Accompts. 3. The Officers, of the Exchequer, during the ſecond Period.

E1.

Edward I. is ſuppoſed to be the firſt of our Kings that perfectly fixed the Standard of our Coin. In the third Year of his Reign, ſays an old Leiger Book of the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury, the Matter was thus ordered by Gregory Rockley, then Mayor of London, and Mint-Maſter: That in a Pound of Money there ſhould be eleven Ounces two-pence farthing, pure leaf Silver, and only ſeventeen-pence half-penny farthing Allay; and this Pound was to weigh twenty Shillings and three Pence in account, each Ounce, twenty Pence, and every Penny, twenty four Grains and a half. In 28 Edw. I. an indented Tryal-piece of the goodneſs of Old Sterling, was lodged in the Exchequer, and every Pound weight Troy of ſuch Silver was to be ſhorn at twenty Shillings three Pence, according to which the Value of the Silver in the Coin was one Shilling eight Pence farthing an Ounce. This King ſent for foreign Mint-Maſters, (namely, William de Furnemire and others from Marſeilles, and one Freſcobald, and his Companions from Florence,) in the eighteenth Year of his Reign, to inform him of the manner of making and forging Money, which is ſaid to be thus: Firſt, the Silver was caſt from the Melting-pot into long Barrs; thoſe Barrs were cut with Sheers into ſquare Pieces of exact Weights; then with the Tongs and Hammer they were forged into a round Shape, after which they were blanched or made white by boiling, and afterwards ſtamped with a Hammer to make them perfect Money. For the coining this Money, (as it is reported in the Additions to the Red Book of the Exchequer, which are not of equal Credit with the Book itſelf) the Mint-Maſters had thirty Furnaces at London, eight at Canterbury, (beſides three the Archbiſhop had there) twelve at Briſtol, twelve at York, and more in other great Towns, in all which Places the ſame hammered Money of Silver, ſupplied by the King's Changers, who according to certain Rates preſcribed them, took in the clipped, rounded, and counterfeited Moneys to be recoined, and bought Gold and Silver of the Merchants to be fabricated into new Monies; at the ſame time it was ordained, "Quod proclametur per totum Regnum quod nulla fiat tonſura de nova Moneta ſub "periculo Vitæ et membrorum, et amiſſionis omnium Terrarum et Tenementorum, &c." And this hammered Money continued through all the Reigns of ſucceeding Kings and Queens, till about the Year 1663. There are no Indentures with the Mint-Maſters, by which one can certainly judge of the Proportion of the Fineneſs and Allay, to be obſerved in the fabrication of the Moneys till the Reign of Edward III, as will be ſeen hereafter. The ſize of the Coin was not, probably, altered by Edward I, the Penny being ſuppoſed to have been the only current Money of England. This Prince was the firſt that uſed Dominus Hiberniæ conſtantly upon his Money, which was never wanting in his, nor in Edward II's, nor in Edward III's Coins, but was afterwards left out, nor is there any more mention of Ireland upon the Silver Money till Henry VIII. He likewiſe left out the Scepter, which appears no more upon the ſmall Money till Henry VIII, nor upon the large till Queen Elizabeth's Crown and half Crown, and the Name of the Mint-Maſter on the Reverſe, inſtead of which he put the Place of Mintage. He was likewiſe the firſt that forbid the uſe of broken Money. But it is difficult to diſtinguiſh the Money of this King from Edward II, becauſe the Face, Style, Weight and Reverſe, are alike. But a learned Antiquary, (the Archbiſhop of York) aſcribes thoſe with the three firſt Letters, E D W. to Edward I, becauſe of the Plenty thereof, for Edward I, is known to have coined much more Money than his Son, and alſo from the Mintage at Dublin, ſet up by this Edward, which has always EDW. From whence it is to be concluded, that all belong to him that have this Inſcription: E D W. R. A N G. D N S. H Y B. The King Full-faced, and crowned with an open Crown of three Fleurs-de-lis, with two Rays, or leſſer Flowers, not raiſed ſo high; the Croſs compoſed of a ſingle Line, pretty broad, and continued to the outer Rim; three Pellets in each Quarter, circumſcribed with the place of Coinage, viz. London, Canterbury, (See Fig. 1.) V I L L A. K I N G E S T O N, Durham, Newcaſtle, Berwick, Lincoln, Exeter, Briſtol, V I L L A. S C I. E D M U N D I. Likewiſe his Iriſh Money, the Head in a Triangle, C I V I T A S. D U B L I N I E. (See Fig. 2.) Alſo Waterford and Cork, which ſhows there was more than one Mint in Ireland. He is reported, (but ſays Nicolſon, falſely,) to have ordered the minting of Groats. J. Speed pretends to give a Cutt of one, but he is ſuppoſed to be miſtaken. The moſt remarkable Corruptions of the Coin are found in antient Records to be in this Reign, when there was imported a ſort of light Money, with a Mitre, another with a Lion, a third of Copper blanched, to reſemble the Money of England, a fourth like that of King Edward, a fifth plated, known by the Names of Crocards, Pollards, Staldings, Eagles, Leonines, and Steepings. And the Merchants to avoid the Search at Dover and Sandwich, concealed the Parcels in Bails of Cloth, and brought them in by other Ports. Les queux Choſes ſi elles fuiſſent long tems ſoefferts, (ſays the Red-Book,) elles mettereyent la Monye d' Anglitere a rienk. And the chiefeſt Remedies then applied were: 1. To cry down all Money that was not of England, Ireland, or Scotland. 2. That ſuch as arrived from beyond Seas, ſhould ſhow the Money they brought with them to the King's Officers. 3. And not to hide it in Fardels, upon pain of Forfeiture. 4. That the light and clipt Money, might be bored through without Contradiction. 5. And that the ſame ſhould be received and paid by Weight, at a certain Rate, and that the Perſons having ſuch Money, ſhould bring it to the King's Changers, who as well as the Maſters of the Mint, had ſeveral Offices erected in divers parts of the Kingdom, whoſe principal Buſineſs was to buy in the Silver of the bad Money, que les Pollards et Crockards et les autres mauvaiſes moneis contrefaits ſeront abatues. And there was a Writ, then directed to the Sheriffs, to prohibit the Importation of clipt or counterfeit Moneys, and the uſe thereof in Merchandizing or Negotiating, under ſevere Penalties, and commanding thoſe that had ſuch Money to bore it thorough, and to bring it to the King's Change to be new coined.

10. EDWARD II. Sirnamed of CAERNARVON.

THE Reign of Edward I. had been a glorious and triumphant Reign for England. The Principality of Wales was united to the Crown. Scotland, thrice ſubdued, was upon the Point of being conquered a fourth time, the Engliſh Army having now entered the Frontiers. There were no more Factions in the Kingdom. Diſcord was baniſhed, and a good Harmony was happily eſtabliſhed between the Sovereign and the People. All this ſeemed to make ample amends for the Loſſes ſuſtained by the Crown beyond Sea, in the Reigns of John and Henry III, not ſo much by the Weakneſs of the Engliſh as the Puſillanmity of thoſe two Princes. Edward of Caernarvon's Age, who, when he mounted the Throne, was in his twenty third Year, his noble Stature, good Mien, majeſtick Preſence, joined to the Advantage of being born of a Father ſo univerſally eſteemed, gave the Engliſh freſh Hopes. As never did Prince come to the Crown in more favourable Circumſtances, ſo never was Prince received with a more general Joy and greater Applauſe. It even ſeemed, that the extraordinary Satisfaction ſhown by the People on this occaſion, was ſomewhat injurious to the Glory of the deceaſed King (1).

The Engliſh prepoſſeſſed in Favour of Edward II.

Edward recalls Gaveſton, and loads him with Favours. Act. Pub. III. p. 1. Walſing.

This Prince's firſt Step, a few days after the Death of his Father, blaſted all theſe agreeable Hopes, and turned the Nation's Joy into mourning. He had not yet done the laſt Offices to the great Prince to whom he owed his Birth, when forgetting his Oath concerning Gaveſton, he recalled that Favourite. He did not ſo much as ſtay for his Return, to make him in an inſtant the richeſt Man in the Kingdom. In the very beginning of his Reign (2) he created him Earl of Cornwal, and gave him the Lands fallen to the Crown by the Death of the late Earl, Son of Richard King of the Romans (3). His Impatience to load with Favors a Man who had been juſt driven from him, as the Corrupter of his Youth, plainly diſcovered to what height his Paſſion was grown, and how much the Conſequences were to be feared. But this was not all the Effect it produced. The Engliſh began to have a diſadvantagious Idea of their new King, and at the ſame time to think of means to curb the impetuous Heat of a Prince, who gave ſo juſt occaſion of Fear. For, not content with beginning his Reign with the Breach of his late Oath to the King his Father, in recalling a Favorite deſpiſed by all the World, he had loaded him with Benefits, and immediately after his Return preſented him with the Iſle of Man. But this was not the only or chief Cauſe of the Diſcontent of the Engliſh Lords. They could not ſee, without extreme Grief, ſuch a one as Gaveſton diſpoſe at pleaſure of all the Offices of the Kingdom, and become abſolute Maſter of the Adminiſtration of Affairs, which the King wholly left to his Management. It ſeemed that Edward deſired to be King, only to have it in his Power to ſhower down his Favours on Gaveſton. Wholly intent upon pleaſing him, as a Lover his Miſtreſs, he concerned himſelf with nothing, but to deviſe every day new Ways to procure him Satisfaction. In ſhort, giving himſelf up intirely to his Guidance, he let him act as King, whilſt himſelf gloried in being his Subject or Slave. A more exceſſive Paſſion was never known. Accordingly People ſcrupled not to ſay publickly, the King was bewitched.

Deſcription and Character of Gaveſton. J. Trokelow. Walſing. Knighton, Sir Thomas de la Moor.

If a Woman had been thus enamoured of Gaveſton, it would not have been thought very ſtrange, ſince he wanted no Qualification to recommend him to the Favour of the Fair Sex. He had a beautiful Face without any defect. His Shape fine and eaſy, his Air noble and grand, in all the Exerciſes of the Body he was diſtinguiſhed for his extraordinary Addreſs. One could not help admiring his Wit, and thoſe ſharp and quick Repartees, peculiar to the Gaſcons, among whom he was born. To all this ſome add an uncommon Valour. If he had been leſs beloved by the King, he would have made a more laſting, though not ſo conſiderable, a fortune; But the Affection of his Prince inſpired him with a Pride which proved his Deſtruction. He would govern the State with an abſolute Sway, without ſharing his Power with any Perſon whatever; hardly vouchſafing ſo much as to uſe the King's Name. His external Accompliſhments, which ſhone with great Luſtre, rendered him ſo proud and inſolent, that he thought himſelf above all the Great Men, though by his Vices and Debaucheries he degraded himſelf below the very meaneſt. The chief means he uſed to gain Edward's Affection, was a blind Condeſcenſion to his Deſires, without examining whether they were virtuous or vicious. When once he came to have an abſolute Influence over him, his only Care was to indulge him in his Pleaſures, to which that Prince was too much addicted. What then could be expected from the ſtrict Union of two ſuch Perſons, but a ſcandalous Licentiouſneſs at Court, and an entire Decay of the publick Affairs? An unexperienced and mean-ſpirited Miniſter, who minded nothing but Trifles, Diverſions, Balls, Banquets, and ſome ſtill leſs innocent Pleaſures, was little capable of governing ſo large a Kingdom. It was not long before the Nation experienced the fatal Effects of ſo ill a Choice. 1307.

The Biſhop of Lichfield impriſoned. Act. Pub. III. p. 11. Walſing.

Gaveſton's Return was immediately followed by the Diſgrace of Langton Biſhop of Lichfield (4) and High-Treaſurer. Edward hated that Prelate mortally, for having been the principal Promoter of Gaveſton's Baniſhment. As ſoon as he came to the Crown, he confined him in Wallingford Caſtle, and would not ſuffer any Perſon to ſpeak in his Favour. It was not but upon the preſſing Inſtances or rather Threats of the Pope, that he ſet him at Liberty again after a long Confinement. To this Violence he added the Removal of all his Father's Officers and Domeſticks, without vouchſafing to adviſe with his Council (5).

1308. The King's Marriage. Act. Pub. III. p. 56. Walſing.

The beginnings of this Reign being very unpromiſing, the chief Lords thought betimes of means to ſtop the Impetuoſity of their Prince, and curb his capricious Temper. But theſe thoughts were interrupted by the Celebration of his Nuptials. The King his Father had contracted him to Iſabella of France, Daughter of Philip the Fair, and had ſtrongly charged him, when dying, to conſummate the Marriage as ſoon as poſſible. This was the only thing wherein he made haſte to obey him. Neglecting therefore the War with Scotland, which was no leſs neceſſary, he repaired to Boulogne, where the King of France ſtayed for him, to deliver his Daughter into his hands. Never was Wedding more magnificent. There were preſent four Kings and four Queens, beſides a great Number of Princes and Princeſſes, Lords and Ladies, who made the moſt numerous Aſſembly of Nobles that had been ſeen a great while (6).

Though Edward's Voyage was very ſhort, it failed not to produce ill Effects. Upon leaving England, he was ſo weak as to appoint his Favorite Guardian of the Realm, with power to diſpoſe of all vacant Places and Beneſices,

1308. Wardſhips of young Nobles, and in ſhort, to act in all things with an unlimited Authority (1). So many Favors added to the great Preſents he had made him before his Departure into Guienne his Country (2), rouzed the Jealouſy of the Barons. They carried their Reſentment ſo far, that they combined together to hinder the King's Coronation, the Day whereof was now fixed. Edward not being able to break ſo powerful a League, where almoſt all the Lords of the Realm were concerned, choſe to prevent the Conſequences by fair means. He gave his word to the Barons, that in the next Parliament he would grant whatever they could reaſonably deſire. This Promiſe ſatisfied them. But they were extremely troubled, to ſee Gaveſton commiſſioned to carry the Crown of St. Edward, with which the King was to be crowned; an Honour that, by antient Cuſtom, belonged to the Princes of the Blood. This Preference provoked the Lords to the laſt degree againſt the Favorite, and withal filled them with Indignation againſt the King, who ſeemed to glory in his Fondneſs for a Man odious to the whole Nation. The Coronation however was ſolemnized (3) without oppoſition; the Biſhop of Wincheſter performing this Ceremony, by Order of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was out of the Kingdom. The Form of the Coronation-Oath was as follows:

Barons league againſt the King.

Edward promiſes to ſatisfy them. Walſing. Act. Pub. III. p. 63.

Act. Pub. Ibid.

The Coronation-Oath.

Biſhop of Wincheſter. Sir, Will you keep and confirm by your Oath to the People of England, the Laws eſtabliſhed by the pious Kings your Predeceſſors, and particularly, the Laws, Cuſtoms, Liberties, granted to the Clergy and People by the glorious St. Edward your Predeceſſor?

King. I will and promiſe it.

Biſhop. Sir, Will you preſerve to God, to Holy Church, to the Clergy and People, the Peace of God, fully and to the utmoſt of your power?

King. I will.

Biſhop. Sir, Will you cauſe to be obſerved in all your Judgments, Right and Juſtice with diſcretion, in Mercy, and in Truth, as far as you are able?

King. I will.

Biſhop. Sir, Will you promiſe to keep and cauſe to be kept the Laws and Statutes that the Community of your Kingdom ſhall judge fit to enact, and will you defend and protect them to the utmoſt of your Power?

King. I do promiſe it.

As this is the firſt perfect Copy of a Coronation-Oath to be met with in the Engliſh Hiſtory, it will not be foreign to the purpoſe, to take notice of the Advantage gained by the People upon the Royal Prerogatives, ſince the Eſtabliſhment of Magna Charta. It manifeſtly appears by this Oath, that, far from ſuppoſing the Great Charter to be the Original Title of the Privileges, granted by King John to the People of England, it was conſidered only as a Confirmation of the antient Liberties of the Nation. Upon this ſuppoſition, Edward II was made to ſwear, he would obſerve the Laws of St. Edward, which were no other than thoſe of the Anglo-Saxons; leſt by cauſing him to ſwear to keep the Great Charter, there might be room to imagine, the Privileges of the People were founded on the Conceſſions of the Kings. I do not know whether Edward I took the ſame Oath, or it was firſt introduced at the Coronation of Edward II.

The King forgets his Promiſe.

Gaveſton's imprudent Conduct. J. Trokel. w.

The Solemnity was no ſooner over, but Edward forgot his Promiſe to the Lords. He ſtill continued his Favour to Gaveſton, and left him, as before, abſolute maſter of his own and the Kingdom's Affairs. Gaveſton for his part, far from endeavouring to allay the impending Storm, affected to govern with an arbitrary Power, without vouchſafing to ask any Man's Advice. He uſed his Influence over his Maſter, to divert him from the thoughts of proſecuting the War with Scotland, which the King his Father had ſo earneſtly enjoined him, and whereof his Subjects impatiently waited the Iſſue, in order to be eaſed of the Burden. Inſtead of inſpiring the King with the Love of Glory and Virtue, he filled the Court with Libertines, Buffoons, and Paraſites, and the like pernicious Inſtruments, proper to corrupt his Inclinations, though they had been naturally as good as they were bad. To this he added the ridiculous Vanity of affecting to wear the King's Jewels, and the Crown itſelf, which Edward freely permitted. The King's Weakneſs grew to that height, that he was heard to ſay, if his Power was equal to his Affection, he would ſet the Crown on Gaveſton's head. As that was not practicable, he would at leaſt raiſe him as near the Throne as poſſible, by giving him his Niece (4), Siſter of the Earl of Gloceſter, in Marriage.

Walſing.

Every freſh Favour granted to Gaveſton by the King, increaſed the Hatred of the Lords. Hardly would an Engliſhman, raiſed to ſo high a Station, have been endured, much leſs a private Gaſcon Gentleman, in whom they diſcovered no other Merit, than a handſome Face, an eaſy Shape, and a quick Wit, very agreeable in Converſation, but little proper to govern a State. They plainly ſaw, it was in vain to preſs the King to part with this Favorite, and that he would never conſent to their Requeſt, unleſs he was forced. In this belief, inſtead of amuſing themſelves with perſuading Edward by reaſons, which would have been ineffectual, they laboured to draw into their League (5), the Members of the Parliament which was to meet, and accordingly did meet in May 1308. By the management of the Lords, Gaveſton's Baniſhment became the chief, or rather the ſole Buſineſs of the Seſſion. The two Houſes being united in the ſame Deſign, demanded of the King, in ſo ſtrong and poſitive a manner, that Gaveſton ſhould be baniſhed, that he durſt not oppoſe it. He was afraid his Refuſal would deprive him of the Aids he expected, for the Continuation of the War with Scotland, and perhaps dreaded ſomething worſe. Therefore, without any fruitleſs Diſputes, he ordered Letters Patents (6) to be drawn up, promiſing to cauſe Gaveſton to depart the Realm before St. John Baptiſt's day next enſuing. Mean time, inſtead of acting ſo as to give room to believe he deſigned to perform his Promiſe, he every day heaped new Favours on Gaveſton. Fifteen days after his Engagement, he made him a Grant of three thouſand Marks a year in Land (7). This Proceeding clearly ſhewing, he was by no means reſolved to part with his Favourite, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had entered into the Barons League, though he lay under great Obligations to the King, excommunicated Gaveſton, in caſe he did not leave the Realm by the time preſcribed him. Edward little regarding this Cenſure, only intreated the Pope to annul it. At the ſame time he wrote to the King of France his Brother-in-law, to deſire him to procure an Agreement between him and the Barons, and ſo to manage, as he might keep his Favourite (8).

Theſe meaſures were neither juſt nor early enough. The Lords finding the appointed time for Gaveſton's Departure drew nigh, were ſo urgent with the King to oblige him to keep his Word, that he durſt not but do it. However, in performing his Promiſe, he found means to give his Favourite a freſh Mark of his Affection, by making him Governor of Ireland, with a very extenſive Authority. This Removal, however honorable it was, failed not to give ſome Satisfaction to the Lords, who hoped to take advantage of his Abſence to ruin him. But he himſelf was not at all pleaſed. Beſides, that this Change of England for Ireland, appeared to him very diſadvantagious, he was ſenſible his Abſence from Court could not but prove fatal to him. As he was abſolute maſter of the King, hardly was he arrived in Ireland, when he cauſed himſelf to be recalled, under pretence of aſſiſting at a Tournament to be held at Wallingford. The Magnificence wherewith he appeared on this occaſion, and the great Number of Foreigners that attended him, and ſerved him for Guards, greatly increaſed the Jealouſy of the Lords, who ſaw themſelves thus braved. To this kind of Inſult he added the Indiſcretion of paſſing bitter Jeſts on the Earls of Lancaſter, Warwick, 1310. Addreſs of the Lords. Faults (1). The Lords ſeeing themſelves inſulted by the Favorite, and deceived by the King, met together to concert means to oblige Edward to keep his Word. Quickly after, they preſented a Petition to him (2), ſetting forth, that the State and his own Houſhold were ſo ill-managed, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to find means to prevent the Conſequences of this Diſorder.

They propoſe hard Terms. Brady's Appendix. Nr. 50. Walſing. They added, the only proper Method, as they thought, was, for the King to leave to certain Lords appointed by the Parliament, the Care of making a Regulation for the well-governing the Kingdom and his own domeſtick Affairs (3). Edward had already ſhewn great Signs of Weakneſs, in his regard for their former Demands. He had thereby made them ſenſible, that if, for the future, they ſhewed any Reſolution, he would not have the Courage to reſiſt them. They were not miſtaken in their Conjectures. This Prince, as timorous on certain occaſions, as he was proud and haughty on others, was uncapable of diſcerning when he ſhould give way, and when ſtand his ground. Accordingly, he took preciſely the contrary to what he ſhould have done. Inſtead of complying with the Barons, when they firſt petitioned for Gaveſton's Removal, he obſtinately perſiſted in retaining him againſt all the Rules of Policy. Afterwards, far from oppoſing to the utmoſt of his power, the Motion of placing the Government in other hands than his own, and inſtead of running all Hazards, rather than give his Conſent, he believed it expedient to yield to their Importunity. Without conſidering the conſequence of a Condeſcenſion ſo pernicious to his Authority and Quiet, he permitted the Parliament to chuſe ſeven Biſhops, eight Earls, and ſix Barons (4), to make the propoſed Regulation.

To which the King conſents. Act. Pub. III. p. 201, 204, 220.

The new Regulation of the Government. Act. Pub. III. p. 221. Brady's Appendix. No. 52. In conſequence of the King's Conſent, the Lords having finiſhed the Regulation, preſented the Plan to the King, who approved it, and gave them Power to cauſe it to be obſerved for one Year. It contained but ſix Articles, whereof the two principal were: That the King ſhould not diſpoſe of any part of his Revenues; which ſhould for the future be expended in paying his Debts, and maintaining his Houſhold, that he might live on his own Income, without taking any thing from others: That the Great Charter ſhould be punctually kept; and in caſe any Article ſhould be obſcure or doubtful, it ſhould belong to the Lords elected (who were ſtiled Ordainers) to explain it. There was nothing inſerted concerning Gaveſton's Baniſhment.

The King continues his Favours to Gaveſton. Act. Pub. III. p. 225, 226. Probably, the Barons were of Opinion, there was no danger from that Favorite, ſo long as the Government was in their hands. Nevertheleſs, when they afterwards ſaw the King continue to heap Favours on him, and, without asking their Advice, had made him Governor of Nottingham, and Warden of the Foreſts on this ſide the Trent, they drew up one and forty new Articles, to which the King was forced to aſſent. By one of theſe Articles, Gaveſton was expreſly ſentenced to perpetual Baniſhment.

Gaveſton is baniſhed. p. 278, 279, 295. Edward having thus ſuffered himſelf to be bound with Fetters which he could not ſhake off, reſolved, tho' with extreme Regret, to part with Gaveſton. However, to ſave him the ſhame of being baniſhed, he gave him an imaginary Commiſſion to levy Troops in Guienne, for the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Foix, who had been at variance with the Court of France, but the Diſpute was now at an end.

1312. The King recalls him. Act. Pub. III. p. 298. Gaveſton's Baniſhment was of no long continuance. Edward, who could not live without him, diſregarding the Articles he had lately ſigned, recalled him without acquainting the Ordainers. Shortly after he ſent circular Letters to the Sheriffs, to give them notice thereof, and to juſtify what he had done. He told them, that being bound by his Coronation Oath, to ſee the Laws of the Realm put in execution, there was no Authority that could abſolve him therefrom: That Gaveſton being baniſhed by a notorious Violence, and without a legal Sentence, he could not deprive him of the Benefit of the Law, to which all his Subjects were intitled: That therefore, he had cauſed him to return into the Kingdom, not with deſign to ſcreen him from Juſtice, but that he might be tried according to the uſual Form: That in the mean time, he conſidered him as a good and faithful Subject, and ordered them to publiſh this Declaration in their reſpective Juriſdictions. 1312.

The Barons ſtir up the People againſt the King. Walſing. The Lords were not much diſpleaſed that the King by this Proceeding, had furniſhed them with a pretence to complete the ruin of a Favorite, who could not be torn from him without violence. In order to open a way to their End, they endeavoured to gain the People by exclaiming againſt the King's Conduct. They ſaid publickly, there was no depending upon what was enacted by the Parliament, ſince the King diſregarded it. That it was eaſy to ſee, the King was aiming at an arbitrary Power, and the whole Nation was equally concerned to oppoſe the Growth of a deſpotick Power, which tended to render the Subjects ſo many Slaves. Theſe Diſcourſes, being ſupported by their Emiſſaries among the People, began to create an univerſal Diſcontent, of which the King had but too much Reaſon to dread the Conſequences. He imagined, he ſhould be able to prevent them by publiſhing a Proclamation, proteſting it was his Intention to obſerve the one and forty Articles. But as he had violated one of the principal in recalling his Favorite, his Proteſtation produced no effect.

Inſolent Behaviour of Gaveſton, particularly to the Queen. Walſing. Mean time, Gaveſton, ſtill more indiſcreet than his Maſter, inſtead of appeaſing his Enemies by his modeſt Behaviour, daily grew more proud and arrogant. He acted as if he had nothing to fear, or was ignorant of the Barons Deſigns. He had even the boldneſs to ſpeak inſolently to the Queen; who not being able to obtain any ſatisfaction, complained bitterly to the King her Father. She told him that Gaveſton was the ſole Cauſe of her Misfortunes, and the King her Husband's Fondneſs for that unworthy Favorite, alienated his Affections from her, and made him an entire Stranger to her Bed. This Complaint has made ſome ſuſpect, that the Familiarity between the King and Gaveſton was of a very criminal nature. But it may be their Suſpicions are carried too far.

The Earl of Lincoln's Advice to the Earl of Lancaſter. Walſing. An. 1312. p. 100. Mean while the Barons kept their firſt Deſign always in view. There were among them Perſons of great Abilities, who knew how dangerous it is, on theſe occaſions, to act by halves; and that if ſuch ſort of Enterprizes are not brought to an Iſſue, they ſeldom failed to ruin the Authors. The Earl of Lincoln (5) was one of the moſt conſiderable of the Party, as well for his Birth and high Offices, as for his Age and Experience. As he was confined to his Bed by a Fit of Sickneſs, which in all appearance would lay him in his Grave, he was apprehenſive, that after his Death the Confederates would give way, and was willing to endeavour to prevent that Accident, which would have occaſioned their Ruin. To that end, having ſent for his Son-in-law the Earl of Lancaſter, Grandſon of Henry III, "he conjured him in the ſtrongeſt Walſing. Ibid. "and moſt moving Terms, not to abandon the Church "and People of England to the Mercy of the Popes and "Kings. He told him, his Birth obliged him to endea-"vour to free the Kingdom from the Oppreſſions it un-"fortunately laboured under. He charged him to have "always a great regard for the King. But withal, he "added, that his Regard ought not to hinder him from "doing all that lay in his Power, to remove from the "King's Perſon the Foreign Miniſters and Favorites. "That Honour, Conſcience, the Publick Good, called "upon him to procure the Obſervance of the Great "Charter, the only Baſis of the Welfare and Peace of the "Kingdom. In concluſion, he adviſed him to join hear-Confederacy of the Lords. "tily with the Earl of Warwick (6), who among all the "Confederate Lords was beſt able to carry on the im-"portant Undertaking." It was not long before the Effects of this Advice were ſeen. The Earl of Lancaſter entering into a ſtrict Confederacy with the Earls of Warwick, Pembroke, Arundel, Hereford, Warren, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſeveral other Biſhops and Barons, they unanimouſly reſolved to take Arms, under the uſual Pretence of defending the Rights of the Church and State.

They chuſe the Earl of Lancaſter General. Walſing. The Earl of Lancaſter was choſen General of the intended Army, an Honour which could not be refuſed to his Merit, though no Regard had been had to his Quali-

Indolence of the King. Act. Pub. III. p. 304, 308, 310.

Inſtead of thinking of means to ſatisfy the incenſed Barons, or defend himſelf againſt their Inſults, he minded nothing but his Diverſions at York, where he was then with Gaveſton. His only care was to heap new Favours on his Minion, remaining in a ſurpriſing Indolence, whilſt he ſaw the whole Kingdom ready to riſe againſt him. He ſeemed to affect continually to act contrary to his real Intereſts, and to neglect to take ſuch meaſures, as a Perſon of an ordinary Underſtanding might have pointed out to him. At the very time that he ſaw the Barons in Arms, to compel him to obſerve the one and forty Articles, he wilfully violated one of the principal, in making the Biſhop of Lichfield High-Treaſurer without the Conſent of the Ordainers. (2) But this was not the only Error he committed on this occaſion. As if he had been in a condition to give Laws to the Barons, he would have reformed at the ſame time the regulation, on pretence he had reſerved to himſelf the Power of correcting, with the Advice of the Ordainers, ſome Articles prejudicial to his Prerogative. It was eaſy to ſee this was no proper Seaſon for that Work. And yet he nominated on his part Commiſſioners to ſet about the Alterations.

The Barons riſe, and the King retires to Scarborough with Gaveſton. Act. Pub. III. p. 327. Walſing.

The Barons had then other Deſigns. After drawing all their Forces together, they marched directly for York, thinking to ſurprize the King, whoſe Supineneſs gave them room to hope every thing. But upon the firſt notice of their Approach, he retired to Newcaſtle, where they followed him without loſs of time. That Town not ſeeming to him ſtrong enough, he left it and ſhut himſelf up in Scarborough Caſtle, which he deemed his beſt Fortreſs in the North. He began then to ſee his Error in deferring ſo long to prepare for his Defence: But it was too late to think of it. However, in ſpite of the improbability of ſucceeding, he reſolved to go into Warwickſhire; where he expected to raiſe an Army, upon the vain hopes, that the People would flock in Crowds to liſt under his Banner. But as he was under greater Concern for Gaveſton than himſelf, he left him behind at Scarborough, recommending him to the care of the Governor as a precious Truſt, and a ſure Pledge of the Confidence he placed in him.

The Barons ſeize the King's and Gaveſton's Equipage at Newcaſtle. Walſing.

Whilſt Edward was taking his too late meaſures, the Barons, who entered Newcaſtle the very day he departed, ſeized whatever was left there by the King and his Favorite, their haſte not permitting them to carry away any thing. In Gaveſton's Baggage were found many Jewels, belonging to the Crown, and of which an exact Inventory was taken, that an account might be given of them hereafter. And as ſoon as the Earl of Lancaſter was informed of the King's departure from Scarborough, and his leaving Gaveſton there, he ſent the Earls of Pembroke and Warren to beſiege that Caſtle. At the ſame time, he marched himſelf with the reſt of the Army towards the Center of the Kingdom, in order to have it more in his Power to oppoſe the Deſigns of the King. The two detached Earls advancing towards Scarborough without any oppoſition, formed the Siege, and carried it on with great vigour. (3) Though the Place was one of the ſtrongeſt in the Kingdom, it was ſo ill-provided with neceſſaries for its Defence, that in a few Days Gaveſton was under a neceſſity to deliver himſelf into the hands of his Enemies. (4) He obtained however, a ſort of Capitulation, whereby it was promiſed him that he ſhould ſpeak with the King, and be tried by his Peers according to the uſual Form.

Gaveſton. ſurrenders. Walſing.

The Earl of Pembroke takes upon him to carry Gaveſton to the King. Walſing.

As ſoon as Edward heard of his Favourite's being thus taken, he earneſtly ſolicited his Liberty, or that at leaſt, he might ſee and ſpeak with him according to promiſe. Above all, he conjured the confederate Lords to ſpare the Priſoner's Life, aſſuring them, on that Condition, he would give them entire Satisfaction concerning their Grievances. Moſt of the Barons were againſt carrying Gaveſton to the King, well knowing that his Requeſt tended only to get him out of their hands. But they conſented at laſt, upon the Earl of Pembroke's repreſenting, that having given his Word in the Name of all the Confederates, they were obliged to perform it: That if they would truſt him with conducting him, he would undertake to convey him to the King, and to reſtore him to them at a day and place appointed. 1312.

Pembroke deſigned to conduct his Priſoner to Wallingford Caſtle, where the King was to come and ſpeak with him. Accordingly, taking the Road to Oxfordſhire, he came to Deddington (5), where he left Gaveſton under a Guard, whilſt he himſelf went and lodged in a neighbouring Caſtle (6). He did not think it neceſſary to uſe greater Precaution in a Place where the King had no Troops, and where conſequently there was no danger from him: But he found he had taken his meaſures very ill. The Earl of Warwick, who was violently againſt this Interview of the King and Gaveſton, hearing how they quartered, came that night to the Houſe where Gaveſton lay, carried him away by force, and conducted him to Warwick. On the morrow, the ſame Earl with ſome others the moſt violent of the Party, after a quick Trial, ordered his Head to be cut off (7). A mad Action, if ever there was any, which in violating a Capitulation, trampled upon the Laws of the Land, and the reſpect due at all times from Subjects to their Sovereign. What would theſe ſame Lords have ſaid, if the King or Gaveſton had done the like?

The Barons march againſt the King. Act. Pub. III. p. 351. Walſing.

Though Edward was extremely incenſed at the Boldneſs of theſe Lords, it was not in his power to be revenged; and the Barons took no care to give him any Satisfaction for this Outrage. On the contrary, not content with being thus rid of the Object of their Hatred, they demanded more haughtily than ever, the Performance of the forty Articles, and a ſpeedy Redreſs of the Grievances of the State. At the ſame time, they marched to London, where the King was retired, bent upon obtaining by force, what they plainly ſaw he would never voluntarily grant them. Mean while, the King not daring to truſt the Londoners, was gone to Canterbury, where he was not much ſafer. In this extremity, he had recourſe to the Mediation of the Pope's Nuntio, and of Lewis Earl of Evreux the Queen's Uncle, then in England, and the Earl of Gloceſter (8) his Nephew, who had ſtood neuter. By means of theſe three Mediators, who laboured heartily in the Affair, certain Articles were agreed upon (9), with which every one ſeemed ſatisfied. The Lords promiſed to reſtore whatever was taken at Newcaſtle; publickly to ask the King's Pardon; and declare that without any deſign againſt his Perſon, their ſole Aim had been to redreſs what was amiſs in the Government. The King promiſed on his part, to grant a general Pardon to them and all their Adherents, reſerving a Power to grant the like to thoſe that favoured Gaveſton's Return.

A general Pardon promiſed.

The Barons punctually performed their Word, in reſtoring whatever was ſeized at Newcaſtle; but Edward was not ſo ſincere. He delayed publiſhing the General Pardon above a Year, and during that Space uſed all means to draw the Earl of Lancaſter to Court. But what Safe-Conducts ſoever he offered him, it was not poſſible to perſuade the Earl to put himſelf in his power, before the Pardon was proclaimed. At length, the Barons weary of all the Evaſions uſed by the King, began to take Arms again, when the King of France ſent the Earl of Evreux his Brother, accompanied with Enguerrand de Marigny, to try to adjuſt theſe Differences. The Queen likewiſe did all that lay in her Power. It was very difficult to accompliſh it, becauſe the King ſtill deferring to publiſh the promiſed Pardon, the Barons believed they had ſtill reaſon to fear he never deſigned it. During the Negotiation, the King went and conferred with his Father-in-law, and left Orders that the Parliament ſhould meet whilſt he was abſent (10). The Earl of Lancaſter and the Barons of his Party, made no Scruple to be preſent, being encouraged by the King's abſence. But hearing he was returned and landed at Sand-

He ordered therefore the two general Pardons to be drawn up, which were confirmed ſhortly after by the Parliament. Before the Parliament broke up, the Barons publickly begged the King's Pardon in Weſtminſter-Hall, before all the People. This was done in a very ſolemn manner. The Barons ſpeaking to the King, made uſe of the moſt humble and ſubmiſſive Terms, as if the Pardon he had granted them were the pure Effect of his Clemency. After this, they returned to their homes, ſatisfied in Appearance, but however without ceaſing to diſtruſt the King. They had too highly offended him, to hope he would ever forget it. The Death of the Earl of Warwick, which happened ſoon after, increaſed their Miſtruſt, every one believing he was poiſoned.

Affairs of Scotland.

Whilſt England endured violent Shocks by the Weakneſs and little Genius of the Governor, Scotland daily grew ſtronger, by the prudent Conduct of a couragious and vigilant King, who wiſely improved the Repoſe procured to them by the Death of Edward I. Robert Bruce, who may juſtly be called the Reſtorer of the Scotch Monarchy, politickly ſuppreſſed the Factions which divided his Subjects, and united them all in the deſign of ſhaking off the Yoke of Servitude. By this happy Union, he was in a condition not only to recover the beſt Part of his Country, but alſo to carry his Arms into England. I am now going to relate the particulars of the Scotch War, which I could not, without confuſion, intermix with the Relation of the domeſtick Troubles in England.

War with Scotland.

Edward I, reſolved utterly to deſtroy Scotland, and probably would have reduced the Kingdom to a wretched Condition, if Death had not ſnatched him out of the World very opportunely for the Scots. Robert Bruce was preparing to take advantage of the Conſternation of the Engliſh, occaſioned by the loſs of Edward: But a great Fit of Sickneſs ſeizing him at the ſame time, hindered his entering upon Action. Mean while, the Scots, who knew not yet the Character of Edward II, were in great perplexity, their King being very dangerouſly ill, and their Forces much inferior to thoſe of their Enemies. Edward II's ſudden Reſolution to return into England, after advancing as far as Dumfries, and ſtriking Terror into the whole Kingdom, gave them room to entertain better hopes. His Impatience to meet Gaveſton, to marry the Princeſs deſigned for him, and to be crowned, expelled all thoughts of War, to which he had no Inclination. So, leaving his Army under the Conduct of John Comyn a Scotch Lord, he returned into England (3). His abrupt departure cauſed great murmurs in the Army and Kingdom. People could not behold him without Aſtoniſhment, relinquiſhing the Conqueſt of Scotland, at a time when the Number and Ardor of his Troops, and King Robert's Illneſs, ſeemed to warrant him a glorious Campaign. His chuſing Comyn to command the Army was no leſs diſliked. This General was a Scot, and though of the oppoſite Party to Robert, and his particular Enemy, his being a Foreigner was alone ſufficient to offend the Engliſh, who thought themſelves diſhonoured by this Preference. What happened quickly after, ſhewed their Complaints were not groundleſs. Comyn willing to take advantage of Robert's Illneſs, whom he thought incapable of heading his Troops, advanced in order to attack the Scots. Though Robert ſtill found himſelf extremely weak, he believed he ought not to decline fighting. At ſuch a juncture, a Retreat might have diſheartned his Subjects, and occaſioned the Loſs of his whole Kingdom. In this Reſolution, having mounted his Horſe, ſupported by two Eſquires, he drew up his Army, and expected the Enemies, with a Steddineſs that produced a wonderful Effect. The Engliſh imagined, this little Army would never dare to ſtand before them. But when by the good Poſture of the Scots, they found themſelves diſappointed, their Courage began ſo to cool, that hardly could they be brought to begin the fight. So weak an Attack, and ſo ill ſeconded, inſpiring the Scots with freſh Courage, they fell with great Fury upon their Enemies, and put them entirely to rout. This Defeat was the more diſhonourable to the Engliſh, as, beſides their being ſuperior in Number, they were the ſame Troops that had ſo frequently vanquiſhed the Scots, and now ſuffered themſelves to be beaten by an Army levied in haſte, and conſiſting of undiſciplined Soldiers. Comyn retiring into England after his Defeat, Robert entered the County of Argyle, which ſtill belonged to the Engliſh, and ravaged it all over. Shortly after, Edward Bruce his Brother, gave the Engliſh another defeat, in the County of Galloway. Theſe two Victories gave the Scots ſuch a Superiority, that they began from thenceforward to deſpiſe the Engliſh, and forget their paſt Loſſes.

1313. Chron. Lanerc. Another by Edward Bruce.

How little Inclination ſoever Edward had for War, he could not avoid endeavouring to ſtop the Progreſs of the King of Scotland. In 1308, that is, in the ſecond Year of his Reign, he led in Perſon a powerful Army into that Kingdom. But as he had taken no care for Proviſions, depending upon what he expected to find in the Enemy's Country, he was obliged to march back his Army into England for want of Subſiſtence. Robert, more provident than he, had carried away, or deſtroyed before-hand, whatever might ſerve to maintain the Enemies Troops. Edward's Retreat gave the King of Scotland an opportunity to become maſter of ſeveral Places in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and to make that Year a very proſperous Campain. The Troubles which afterwards happened in England on account of Gaveſton, enabled that Prince to make a ſtill greater Progreſs. In 1310 and 1311, he entered England twice, and carried away a great Booty. In 1312 he recovered Perth, Lanerc, Dumfries, Roxborough; and laſtly, Edinborough Caſtle, which was taken by Storm by the Earl of Murray his General. This Year the little Iſle of Man voluntarily ſubmitted to him.

Whilſt Robert continued his Conqueſts, Edward, wholly employed in ſeeking means to be revenged on the Barons, for putting Gaveſton to Death, was ſurpriſingly negligent with regard to Scotland. Inſtead of haſtening an Agreement with the Lords, in order to unite all his Forces, he prolonged the Negotiation, by a Policy very pernicious to the Affairs of the State. Mean time, Robert took advantage of the Negligence of the Engliſh. After making himſelf maſter of all the Places Edward I. poſſeſſed in Scotland, except Sterling, he ſent, in 1313, his Brother Edward to beſiege that Town, the ſtrongeſt then in Scotland. The Siege was carried on very vigorouſly; but the Beſieged made as brave a Defence. However, [Philip] Mowbray, the Governor of the Place, finding his Maſter made no Preparations to relieve him, thought to do him good Service in ſigning a Capitulation, whereby he promiſed to ſurrender the Town in a Year, if it were not relieved by that time.

1314. Edward having ſufficient time to prepare, and deſiring at any rate to prevent the Loſs of ſo important a Place, ſummoned all his Vaſſals to meet him with their Troops (4). The Engliſh, Gaſcons, and Welſh (5), were ſo ready to obey him, that by June 1314, he ſaw himſelf at the head of a hundred thouſand Men. The Soldiers already devoured in their Imagination, whatever the former Ravages of Edward I, had left in Scotland. Only the Earls of Lancaſter, Arundel, Hereford, and the new Earl of Warwick, refuſed, on this occaſion, to ſerve the King, their miſtruſt of him not permitting them to put themſelves in his Power.

How great ſoever the Inequality of theſe two Armies might be, the Scots being determined to conquer or die, received their Enemies with that Vigor and Reſolution, that they ſoon put this numerous Army into Diſorder and Confuſion. The Engliſh Horſe being preſſed at firſt, with a Fury they could not withſtand, were the Occaſion by their Flight, of the Defeat of the whole Army; a Defeat the moſt terrible England had ever endured ſince the beginning of the Monarchy (1). The Scotch Writers mount the Enemies Loſs to fifty thouſand Men. They pretend, the Number of the Priſoners taken on this occaſion exceeded that of the Conquerors. The Earl of Glocester, Nephew of Edward II, with many other Lords of Diſtinction (2), and above ſeven hundred Knights, lay dead on the Field of Battle. The Engliſh reduce the Number of the Slain to ten thouſand. But the Conſequences of this Action diſcover that their Loſs was much greater, ſince from that time they ventured no more to take the Field.

Edward, with the Remains of his Army, haſtily retreated, without thinking himſelf out of Danger till he was at York, where the diſperſed Fugitives came to him (3). He formed a very conſiderable Body, with which he ſhewed a Deſire to re-enter the Enemies Country, and hazard another Battle. But the Conſternation of his Troops was ſo great, that he could not prevail with them to endeavour to retrieve their Honour. This Battle, called the Battle of Banockbourn, procured the Scots, beſides an ineſtimable Booty, a Peace which laſted ſeveral Years. They acquired ſo great a Superiority over the Engliſh, that theſe laſt, far from being able to recover what they had loſt in Scotland, were long forced to ſee their Borders ravaged, without daring to make the leaſt Reſiſtance. Their Terror was ſo great, that one of their Hiſtorians affirms, three Scotch Soldiers were ſufficient to put a hundred Engliſhmen to flight, ſo much were they diſcouraged by this terrible Defeat.

So extraordinary and ill-formed a Project ſerved only to bring the Impoſtor to the Gallows, inſtead of a Throne, which he would fain have mounted. Without doubt he built his hopes upon the little Eſteem the Engliſh had for their King, having probably imagined it would not be difficult, to make them believe he was not Son of Edward I, who had none but noble and generous Inclinations. But it was not this vile Inſtrument, which Providence was pleaſed to uſe, to ruin this unhappy Prince, though in ſome Meaſure this Event may be conſidered as a ſort of Preſage of what was to happen.

The Loſs ſuſtained by the Engliſh in Scotland was followed by a dreadful Famine which laſted three Years, and deſtroyed an infinite Number of People. In vain did the Parliament endeavour to help it by ſettling the Price of Proviſions: They were forced the next Year to revoke the Act that had been paſſed on that account. (4) But neither War nor Famine, nor the Murmurs of the People, were able to hinder the King from expending a large Sum, in celebrating the Funeral of his Favourite, whoſe Body was removed to King's Langley in Hertfordſhire. He would honour the Funeral Pomp with his Preſence, attended by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſome other Biſhops. But the Barons poſitively refuſed to aſſiſt at the Obſequies of a Man ſo odious to them, and whom they deem'd unworthy of the Honour done to his Memory. 1315.

Walſing. p. 106.

Mean time the Famine raged in ſo terrible a manner that one can hardly give Credit to what Hiſtorians ſay of it. (5) They are not content with telling us, that the moſt loathed Animals were uſed for Food, but what is much more horrible, People were forced to hide their Children with all imaginable care, to prevent their being ſtolen and eaten by Thieves. They aſſure us, that Men themſelves took precautions to hinder their being murdered in private Places, knowing there were but too many Inſtances that ſome had been ſerved in that manner, to feed ſuch as could find no other Subſiſtence. We are told likewiſe, that the Priſoners in the Goals devoured one another in a barbarous manner, the extreme Scarcity of Proviſions not permitting their being allowed neceſſary Food. The Bloody Flux, cauſed by groſs feeding, compleated the Miſery of the Engliſh. Such Numbers died every day, that hardly could the Living ſuffice to bury the Dead. The only Remedy that could be found againſt the Famine, but which was not capable of bringing all the neceſſary Relief, was, to prohibit on pain of death, the brewing any ſort of Beer, to the end, the Corn uſually expended that way, might ſerve to make Bread (6). 1316. The Famine increaſes. Walſing.

Notwithſtanding theſe Calamities, which ſhould have turned their thoughts to Religion and Repentance, the mutual Enmity which the King and Barons had long harboured in their Breaſts, was ſeen daily to increaſe. It was almoſt impoſſible but this violent Hatred ſhould in the end produce very fatal Effects. Edward, not being able to forget the Injuries he had received, entertained in his heart a ſtrong Deſire of Revenge, which put him upon ſeeking all poſſible means to gratify it. He was chiefly exaſperated againſt the Earl of Lancaſter, whom he looked upon as the ſole Author of his Diſgraces, and his moſt dangerous Enemy. Had the Earl's Life been in his Power, he would not, probably, have ſpared it. But as his Diſſimulation had not been capable of drawing him into any Snare, finding he could not reach his Perſon, he attempted to deprive him of his Eſtate and Honour. To that purpoſe he created him a Trouble, which the moſt immoderate Miſtruſt could not have prevented. 1317. Injury done the Earl of Lancaſter.

Whilſt the Earl kept at a diſtance from Court (7), a certain Knight, called Sir Richard St. Martin, a Man of a mean Look, and dwarfiſh Stature, preſented to the Judges a Petition, claiming the Wife of the Earl of Lancaſter, Heireſs of the Families of Lincoln and Saliſbury. He ſet forth in his Petition, that he had carnally known her, and that ſhe had made him a Promiſe of Marriage, before ſhe was contracted to the Earl. The Counteſs, diſſatisfied with her Husband, having, to her eternal Shame, confeſſed the Fact, was adjudged, with all her Eſtate, to the unworthy Claimant. This Affair, which would have required a long Examination, was ſo quickly decided, that it was eaſy to ſee the Judges were gained before-hand, and the King himſelf had been a Promoter of the Proceſs. An Injury of this nature done to a Prince of the Blood Royal, exceedingly beloved by the People, raiſed an extreme Indignation againſt the King. Nothing was every where heard but Murmurings againſt his Government. As he had then no Favourite to bear the Blame, it was all caſt on himſelf; and People ſaid publickly, never was the Throne of England filled by a Prince ſo unworthy to rule a free Nation. There were even ſome who took the Liberty to upbraid him to his face for his ill Conduct. 1317. His conduct ripped up in a Letter. Walſing. and delivered him a Letter. The King imagining it contained ſomething proper to divert him, ordered it to be read aloud. But he was very much ſurprized to hear only outragious Reproaches for his Cowardice, Tyranny, and all the Grievances introduced in his Reign. The Woman being apprehended, confeſſed, ſhe was bribed by a certain Knight to play that part; and the Knight boldly maintained, That believing the King would read the Letter in private, he thought it the propereſt way to let him know the complaints of his Subjects.

1318. The Barons complain of ſeveral Grievances. Whilſt England was reduced to extreme Deſolation, Edward, without troubling himſelf about the Ravages, the Scots continued to make on the Borders, minded only how to humble the Barons, who began to form new Projects, the Conſequences whereof he had reaſon to fear. They had lately preſented to him a Petition, containing a long Liſt of the People's Grievances, of which they demanded a ſpeedy Redreſs. Nothing was farther from his Thoughts than to reform abuſes. However as he durſt not openly diſcover his intentions, he had referred the matter to the Parliament which was to meet at Lincoln. A Scotiſh Invaſion at the ſame time, afforded him an excuſe to prorogue the Parliament ſeveral times, and at length to diſſolve it. This Proceeding ſo incenſed the Barons, that with one conſent they reſolved to take Arms, to obtain by Force the Satisfaction they required. They would have doubtleſs extremely diſtreſſed this weak Prince, uncapable of governing himſelf at ſo nice a Juncture, if ſome Lords of more Moderation had not joined with the Pope's Legate to promote a reconciliation. Theſe Mediators obtained of the King, that for the Satisfaction of the confederate Barons he ſhould admit a certain number of them into his Council, and promiſe to do nothing without their advice. The Earl of Lancaſter was to be one: but as he could not truſt the King, it was agreed he ſhould nominate a Baron or Knight to ſupply his place (1). Moreover Edward promiſed to grant an abſolute pardon, without any reſtrictions, to the Earl of Lancaſter, for all that was paſſed. This Agreement was made and ſigned at Leek on the 9th of Auguſt 1318, and confirmed three days after by (2) the Parliament, called upon the preſſing Inſtances of the Mediators. After this Affair was ended, the King and Earl of Lancaſter meeting on a Plain near Leiceſter, embraced and kiſſed one another in token of a perfect Reconciliation. Let us now return to the War with Scotland, which ſtill continued during the Troubles in England.

After Robert's obtaining near Sterling that ſignal Victory which proved ſo fatal to the Engliſh, he purſued the Vanquiſhed into England, where he committed prodigious Ravages, whilſt Edward durſt not ſtir from York to oppoſe his Enemy. The King of Scotland, not ſatisfied with this Advantage, projected the Conqueſt of Ireland upon the Crown of England. This Iſland had long been governed by Engliſh Officers who were more careful to enrich themſelves, than to promote the Publick Good. Their arbitrary Proceedings had bred among the Iriſh ſo great and univerſal Diſcontent, that they wanted only a favorable Opportunity to revolt. The defeat of the Engliſh Army before Sterling, giving them reaſon to believe, the preſent Juncture was very proper to execute their Deſign, they ſent word to the King of Scotland, that they were ready to caſt off the Engliſh Yoke, provided he would give them Aſſiſtance. Robert took care not to loſe ſo fair an Opportunity to become maſter of the Iſland, or at leaſt to make there a powerful Diverſion. He ſent thither ſome Troops under the Command of his Brother Edward, who heading the Rebels, conquered the beſt Part of the Iſland, and was even acknowledged for King. Whilſt he was carrying on his Conqueſts, Robert amuſed the King of England with Propoſals of Peace, which he ſeemed to do with Sincerity and Earneſtneſs, but artfully raiſed from time to time Difficulties, which hindered matters from being concluded. This Proceeding laſted till 1317, without Edward's perceiving his Enemy's Artifices. His little Penetration would even have made him entirely loſe Ireland, had he not been rouzed by the Murmurs of the People. The Prejudice England might receive by the Loſs of that Iſland was ſo manifeſt, and the Conſequences ſo plainly laid before him, that at length he reſolved to ſend thither a powerful Supply, under the Conduct of Mortimer.

The King of Scotland ravages England. Has a Deſign upon Ireland. Walſing. Ch. Lanerc. He ſends Edward his Brother thither. Act. Pub. III. p. 596. Walſing.

With this Aid the Engliſh that were in Ireland, finding themſelves able to take the Field, marched to attack the Scotch Prince. Mean while, the King of Scotland, receiving intelligence how much his Brother ſtood in need of being ſpeedily relieved, went himſelf into Ireland. But upon his Arrival, he heard his Brother was defeated and ſlain in a Battle wherein he had raſhly engaged (3). Robert's Loſs on that occaſion breaking all his meaſures, and diſabling him from continuing the War in that Country, he thought it more proper to go and improve the Advantages, lately gained by his Arms in Scotland. In his Abſence, Douglas, one of his Generals defeated the Army ſent by the King of England into that Kingdom, to try to take advantage of Robert's being in Ireland.

1318. Who is defeated and ſlain. Walſing.

This freſh Victory, which put it out of the Power of the Engliſh to withſtand the Scots, inſpired Robert with the thoughts of improving it, by laying Siege to Berwick, which was ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh (4). He could not make his Preparations without Edward's knowledge. But his knowing it was to little purpoſe, ſince he had neither Money nor Troops ſufficient to prevent his Enemy's Deſigns. His Subjects were ſo averſe to him, that he could not expect to procure, either a timely or powerful Aid. And ſuppoſing he could have expected it, he plainly ſaw the Parliament would make him pay dear for the Subſidy they ſhould grant (5). In this Extremity he turned to the Pope, and earneſtly intreated him to interpoſe his Authority, in order to procure him a Peace, or at leaſt a Truce with Scotland. John XXII, who had lately ſucceeded Clement V. immediately granted Edward's Requeſt. He looked upon this as a very favourable Opportunity, to extend his Power over crowned Heads. Accordingly he took upon him to make Peace between Edward and Robert, not as a Mediator, but as Sovereign Arbiter, and by virtue of his Apoſtolical Authority. To that end, he ſent two Legates into England, with a Power, which ſhewed that he thought himſelf inveſted with Sovereign Authority over all Kings, even in temporal Affairs. Their Commiſſion ran, that they were to make Peace between the two contending Nations, in what manner they pleaſed, and to compel both Princes to accept it, on pain of Excommunication, and an Interdict upon their Dominions. But as he judged ſuch a Peace could not be made without ſome Debate, which would take up time, he ordered his Legates to cauſe a two Years Truce to be publiſhed in his Name, and by his Authority; and gave them Power to excommunicate thoſe that refuſed to obſerve it.

The King of Scotland prepares to beſiege Berwick. 1319. Edward applies to the Pope. Walſing. Ch. Lanerc. who ſtands to force them to make Peace. De la M. Act. Pub. III. p. 594, 611, 615, 622, 633, 657, 787.

The Legates, furniſhed with ſo large and extraordinary Power, came into England, and immediately cauſed the Truce to be proclaimed. Edward paid an implicit Obedience to it, not conſidering he thereby ſacrificed to the Court of Rome the moſt authentick Prerogatives of the Crown. It was not the ſame with Robert. Under pretence, that the Pope and his Legates gave him not the Title of King, he would never permit the laſt to enter Scotland, much leſs to proclaim the Truce there. He even treated very roughly the Superior of the Cordeliers of Berwick, ſent to him by the Legates, who uſing Surpriſe, was ſo bold as to publiſh in ſome meaſure the Truce, in the Preſence of ſeveral Scots. Inſtead therefore of obeying the Pope, he beſieged and took Berwick by the Treachery of the Governor (6), if the Engliſh are to be credited. This Contempt for the Pope's Orders, obliged the Legates to excommunicate him, and put his Kingdom under an Interdict. But he did not much regard a Cenſure ſo manifeſtly unjuſt to him, and ſo very partial to the Engliſh. Therefore continuing his Progreſs he advanced on the Borders of England, and committed great Ravages, without meeting any oppoſition (7).

Edward found then, that the ſpiritual Weapons of the Pope were but of little ſervice. Accordingly, on a ſudden altering his Method, he found means to raiſe an Army, with which he would go and attempt the recovery of Berwick. Whilſt he was employed in the Siege, the Earl of Murray, the King of Scotland's General, made a Diverſion in England, which proved very fatal to the Borderers. In his return from ravaging ſeveral Counties, he met a Body of Engliſh Militia to the Number of ten Thouſand, with the Archbiſhop of York (8)

Though his Forces were not near ſo numerous as thoſe of his Enemies, he couragiouſly charged them, and obtained over theſe undiſciplined Troops a Victory (1), which deſtroyed above half. The Scots called this Action, The white Battle, from ſome Engliſh Prieſts being killed in the Fight with their Surplices on. This Accident obliged Edward to raiſe the Siege of Berwick. Shortly after, with much Sollicitation, he obtained a Truce for two Years; whereupon he left the North, and returned to London, where he was no leſs unfortunate.

A Truce for two Years. Act. Pub. III. p. 869. Walſing.

Promotion of the Spencers, Father and Son.

The Truce reſtored not to England the expected Tranquillity. Hardly was it proclaimed, before the Kingdom was involved in freſh Troubles, much more violent than thoſe cauſed by Gaveſton. The Enmity between the King and the Barons was ſtill kept alive, like Fire under Cinders, and only wanted a freſh occaſion to rekindle. Unhappily, an occaſion was but too ready (2). The Lords, ever jealous of thoſe about the King's Perſon, had introduced into Court a young Gentleman, Hugh Spencer, whom they believed entirely devoted to their Intereſts. They had procured him the Office of King's Chamberlain, with a deſign to make uſe of him as a Spy, in order to be informed of what paſſed at Court, where they ſeldom appeared. But their Project turned againſt themſelves. Spencer had a Father named Hugh as well as himſelf, a Perſon of Courage and good Senſe, who gave him quite contrary Inſtructions. He intimated to him, it would be much more eaſy to make his Fortune, by labouring directly for himſelf, than by ſerving the Barons; and with a little Patience and Obſequiouſneſs, he might render himſelf ſuperior to thoſe, whom he looked upon as his Protectors. Spencer the Son being inclined to follow his Advice, found at firſt great Difficulties. The King could not behold with a good eye, a Domeſtick who had already ſhown too great an Inclination for his Enemies. Nevertheleſs in time, and by the prudent Counſels of his Father, Spencer removed by degrees, the ill Impreſſions his Maſter had taken againſt him. As his Deſign was to govern the King entirely, he ſcrupled not to become for ſome time his Slave, by ſhewing on all occaſions, that he was wholly devoted to him. By this blind Obſequiouſneſs, and by a general Compliance to whatever was agreeable to him, from his Spy, he became his Confident, and at length ſupplied in his Heart the Place formerly poſſeſſed by Gaveſton. When he ſaw himſelf in this great degree of Favour, he made an ill uſe of it, like his Predeceſſor, and by his exceſſive Pride and inſatiable Avarice, made it ſoon wiſhed, that Gaveſton had not been oppreſſed.

De la M. Spencer, the Father, made Earl of Winchester. His Character.

Hugh his Father, whom he had cauſed to be created Earl of Wincheſter (3), had been till then of a quite different Character. Nothing could be laid to his Charge unbecoming a Man of Honour and Honeſty. In all the Poſts he had been promoted to, by this and the late King, he had always behaved with great Moderation, Prudence and Impartiality. But he knew not how to preſerve the Reputation he had acquired. A blind Fondneſs for his Son, and Ambition, which had ſeized him in his old Age, threw him into thoſe Exceſſes, which rendered both him and his Son odious to the Nation, and particularly to the Nobility. It was not long before an univerſal Diſcontent became viſible. The Earl of Lancaſter, a great Favourite of the People, and a ſworn Enemy to the King, notwithſtanding their outward Reconciliation, had improved theſe Junctures, to form a Party capable of ruining the two Favourites (4). He had demonſtrated to his Friends, "That their Ruin and his own were "infallible, if means were not found to remove the "Spencers from Court. That the King, who harboured "a ſecret Deſire of Revenge, was indeed incapable of "managing a Deſign; but that every thing was to "be feared from that Prince, aſſiſted by his two new "Miniſters, of much greater Abilities than Gaveſton. "He added, theſe Miniſters were no leſs guilty than "the other, of divers Enchroachments on the Privileges "of the People, and that all the Endeavours hitherto "uſed, to reduce the Royal Authority within due "Bounds, would be fruitleſs, if the King was ſuffered to "return to his former Courſes, aud trample upon the "Liberties of the Subject." Theſe Reaſons, alledged by a Prince, who paſſed for a diſintereſted and zealous Aſſerter of the publick Good, and joined to the Envy raiſed by the Advancement of the Spencers, cauſed ſo ſudden an Effect, that the old Aſſociation was renewed. As the confederate Barons (5) had every thing to fear from the Abilities of the Miniſters, they loſt no time, which was ſo precious, in preſenting to the King Petitions, as they had done concerning Gaveſton. Such a Conduct would only have given their Enemies leiſure to prepare. And therefore, without diſcovering their Intentions, they reſolved to levy Troops with all poſſible Secrecy and Expedition, and to ſurprize the King and his Favorites, before they had time to take any meaſures. This Deſign was executed with that ſpeed, that in a very ſhort ſpace, they drew together eleven thouſand Men, with whom they ventured to take the Field. Their firſt Exploit was to plunder the Lands of the Spencers, which was left to the Care of Roger Mortimer the Younger, ſo called to diſtinguiſh him from his Uncle of the ſame Name. He diſcharged his Commiſſion in ſo violent a manner, and with ſo little regard for the Favorites, that he did them in a few Days threeſcore thouſand Pound damage. This done, the Barons ſent ſome of their Body (6) to preſent a Petition to the King, deſiring the Removal of the Spencers (7). Edward perceiving it was not in his Power to curb their Boldneſs, referred the matter to the Parliament (8). He did not queſtion, but he ſhould have Intereſt enough with the Commons, to protect the two Miniſters. But the Barons Reſolution to continue in Arms, broke all his meaſures. Several Members of Parliament being at the devotion of the Lords, others awed by the Army, and all in general having too little value for the Spencers, to run any hazard for their ſake, the two Favorites were baniſhed the Realm, without the King being able to ſcreen them (9). This Parliament was called, The Parliament of the white Bands, on account of certain white Marks, by which the Adherents of the Barons were to know one another. Whatever Endeavours the King uſed to oppoſe theſe violent Proceedings, he found himſelf conſtrained to give way to a Torrent, which he could not withſtand. Spencer, the Father, being then out of the Realm upon the King's Affairs, the Son was ignominiouſly conducted to Dover, where he was ſhipped off with great Threats, if ever he pretended to ſet foot in the Kingdom again.

Edward highly reſented this Affront, and ſwore to be revenged. But perhaps means would have been found to appeaſe him, if the Queen, who, on the like occaſions, was wont to act the Part of a Mediatrix between the King and the Barons, had not ceaſed doing them that good Office. Inſtead of endeavouring to aſſwage the King's Anger, ſhe took care to excite him to Vengeance, being exaſperated at an Affront, ſhe lately received from a Baron, and of which ſhe caſt the Blame upon the whole Party. 1321. She stirs up the King to a Revenge. the Queen a very insolent Letter, expressly approving what had passed. It was very difficult for that Princess, who was naturally haughty and revengeful, not to resent such an Affront. As she plainly saw, the Union of the Barons was the sole cause of Badlesmere's Insolence, she thought the readiest way would be to break their Association. The King waited patiently for a favourable opportunity to exercise his vengeance; but a Woman's revenge can bear no delay. The Queen, in her resolution of spurring on Edward, persuaded him, that the present Juncture was very advantagious to free himself from the Power of the Barons: that by immediately punishing the Governour of Leeds, as he deserved, he would strike such a Terrour into the Barons, who did not expect any such thing, that they would not think even of standing upon their Defence, when they should see him Sword in hand, and able to compel them to return to their Allegiance. Edward relishing this Advice, gave Orders for levying Troops. But for fear of any Obstacle, and in order to remove the People's Apprehensions, who began to be alarmed at these Levies, he issued out a Proclamation, protesting, he took not Arms to make War on his Subjects, but only to punish the Insolence of a private Person. This Proclamation producing a good Effect among the People, and the Barons not thinking they should engage the Kingdom in a Civil War for the sake of a single Officer, the King raised an Army without opposition. When his Troops were ready to march, he went immediately and besieged the Castle of Leeds, and taking it, ordered the Governor (1), with some other inferior Officers, to be hanged. This good Success causing him to forget his Protestation, he made use of his Arms, to take Vengeance on his Enemies. To that end, he besieged some other Castles belonging to the Barons, and particularly Warwick, which he became master of with the same ease. When he thought himself sufficiently formidable, he recalled Spencer the Son, who since his Banishment had turned Pyrate, particularly against the English.

Edward continuing his Progress, after the Return of his Favorite, put the associated Barons into the utmost Consternation, who were not prepared for their Defence. They would have been very glad, on this occasion, of the Queen's Assistance: But she was too much incensed against them to stand their Friend. In this ill posture they saw themselves exposed to the Fury of their Enemies, who spared them not. Mean while, the King, by his sole Authority, revoked the Sentence of Banishment against the Spencers, and recalled the Father, as he had already done the Son. The King's Diligence threw the Barons into so terrible a Perplexity, that they knew not what Course to take. His Army was in the Center of the Kingdom, ready to fall upon the boldest. The People, as it usually happens on such occasions, joined with the strongest, for fear of being oppressed before the Barons were able to protect them. In this Extremity, most of the associated Barons wisely chose to throw themselves upon the King's Mercy. As for those who refused to follow their Example, many were taken and executed; some fled for Refuge beyond Sea; and others were shut up in several Prisons (2). Of the Number of these last was Roger Mortimer, junior, whom the Spencers closely confined in the Tower, but who doubtless would not have met with so favorable a Treatment, had not his Life been saved by a powerful Interceſſion.

The Earl of Lancaster's Faction being extremely weakened by the Defection, Flight, Imprisonment, or Death of his Adherents, the Earl, with what few Troops he could assemble, saw himself constrained to retire into the North. He had nothing to depend upon but the Protection of the Scots, who promised him Succours; but it was necessary to come and join them. The Rout he took, and some intercepted Letters, discovered his Intention to the King. To prevent it, he ordered Sir Andrew Harcla, Governour of Carlisle, to draw together what Troops he could and go out against the Earl to cut off the Passes, or at least to keep him at a Bay, whilst he pursued him in Person with his Army. However expeditious the Earl of Lancaster was, and whatever care he took to retard the King's March, by destroying the Country behind him, he was obliged, after passing the Trent over Burton-Bridge, to halt, in order to oppose the Passage of the Army which pursued him. But Edward retiring, to pass at another place, the Earl resolved to stand his Ground. Nevertheless, whether through Scruple, or fear of the King's superior Forces, he suddenly altered his mind. In hopes of freeing himself from these Streights, he advanced to Burrow-Bridge, where ran another River, which afforded no other Passage but over a Bridge defended by Harcla. In this extremity, he was under a Necessity either of resolving to fight the King, who closely pursued him, or of attempting to force this Pass, before the Royal Army came up (3). He chose the latter, and without loss of time, ordered the Bridge to be attacked. The vigorous Resistance of the Enemy, the Death of the Earl of Hereford (4), slain in the beginning of the Fight, and the Dread of being surprized by the King, who was advancing, so daunted Lancaster's Troops, that instead of continuing the Attack, they took to flight, and dispersed themselves in the Country. Harcla, perceiving this Disorder, speedily passed the Bridge, and pursued the Runaways, of whom he took great Numbers Prisoners. The Earl of Lancaster, who endeavoured in vain to rally his Men, staying too long in hopes of succeeding, could not avoid the misfortune of being taken himself, with fourscore and fifteen Barons and Knights, and conducted to the Castle of Pontefract (5). This unfortunate Prince saw himself exposed to the Insults of the Soldiers, who in derision called him King Arthur, from his using that Name in some of the intercepted Letters. But this was not the most rigorous part of his Punishment. A few days after, the King being come to Pontefract, ordered him to be arraigned in the Hall of the Castle, before a small Number of Peers (6), who attended him, among whom were the two Spencers. By this little Assembly was the Earl condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered for a Traitor. But out of reverence to his Birth, the King was pleased to save him the Infamy of that Punishment, and only ordered him to be beheaded (7). Nine other Lords of his Party were sentenced to the same Punishment, and executed at York. The Lord Badlesmere, the first Cause of the War, and four other Barons, suffered the like Death at London, Windsor, Canterbury, and Gloucester, for a Terror to the Kingdom. Never since the Norman Conquest, had the Scaffolds been drenched with so much English Blood, as upon this occasion (8). These inhuman Proceedings were ascribed to the Spencers, who thereby rendered themselves extremely odious to all the World, and bred in the Hearts of the Nobility a Desire of Revenge, which was but too fully glutted in the end (9).

Edward imagined, that after this Success against his Subjects, he could not but be very formidable to the Scots. In this belief, he resolved to march towards Scotland (10), big with the Expectation of surprizing Robert, and repairing, by this one Expedition, all his former Losses. Whilst he was in his own Territories, he had plenty of Provisions, every one striving to supply his Army, more out of Fear than Affection. But preposterously fancying, he should find the same Conveniences in the Enemy's Country, he was suddenly in a terrible Want. So, instead of advancing any farther, he was forced to return in haste, as he had done once before, without being the wiser by that Experience. But this was not all the Dishonour he received from this ill-concerted Expedition. Hardly had he begun to return into his own Dominions, when Robert closely pursued him even into England, and overtaking him at Black-more, eased him of his Baggage, and had like to have taken him Prisoner. The English Army being all dispersed on this occasion, Robert continu-

At laſt, having burnt the Monaſtery of Rippon and ranſacked the Abbey of Beverly, he returned home loaded with Booty. Whatever reaſon that Prince had to expect great Advantages from the Continuance of the War, he entered into Negotiation for a Truce, which at length was concluded on the 13th of May 1324, for thirteen Years. He conſented the more readily to this Truce, as he was forced to give ſome Reſpite to his Subjects exhauſted by ſo long a War. Beſides, he hoped by that means to be reconciled to the Court of Rome, having received intimation, that his Abſolution, and the Removal of the Interdict, depended upon his Compliance.

Truce of thirteen Years. Act. Pub. III. p. 983. 1022. Walſingh.

The Submiſſion of the Engliſh, and the long Truce with Scotland, placed Edward preciſely in a Situation moſt agreeable to his Temper. He had nothing to divert him from his Pleaſures; enjoyed a peaceable Kingdom; and could leave the Government to his Favorites, without fear of being controlled by his Subjects. This was a Happineſs he could not attain till this Year, being the ſixteenth of his Reign. However, his Satisfaction was ſometimes diſturbed by the Remembrance of things paſt. The Death of the Earl of Lancaſter, of which he began to repent ſince his peaceable State, now and then ſtung him with bitter remorſe. This manifeſtly appears, in his Anſwer to certain Lords petitioning him to pardon a condemned Criminal (2). Is it poſſible, cried he, that ſuch a Wretch as this ſhould find ſo many Friends to intercede for him, when not one would ſpeak in behalf of my Couſin of Lancaſter, who, if he had lived, might have been uſeful both to me and the whole Kingdom? therefore, as for this Fellow, he ſhall die as he deſerves.

Uncertainty about the Earl of Lancaſter's Character.

The Character of Thomas Earl of Lancaſter, was not much leſs ambiguous than the Earl of Leiceſter's, in the Reign of Henry III. The King's and the Spencer's Adherents called him Villain and Traitor, one that having taken Arms againſt his Sovereign, was juſtly condemned. But the People in general had his Memory in great veneration, conſidering him as a real Martyr for Liberty. Immediately after his death, his Tomb was flocked to, where many Miracles were pretended to be wrought (3). The King was even obliged, ſtrictly to command the Biſhop of London, to put a ſtop to the Superſtition of the People of his Dioceſe, who came and ſaid their Prayers to the Earl's Picture hung up in St. Paul's Church. Probably, the Uncertainty concerning the Character of this Prince would have laſted much longer, if two things had not determined People in his favour. The firſt was, the Puniſhment of Harcla, who being made Earl of Carliſle, for taking Lancaſter Priſoner, incurred the Diſpleaſure of the Spencers, and upon a Suggeſtion of a Correſpondence with Scotland, was beheaded (4). The ſecond was, the Canonization of Lancaſter in 1389, at the Requeſt of Edward III, Son of him that had taken away his Life (5). After that, there was no room to queſtion the Sincerity of his Intentions: At leaſt, it was no longer permitted openly to defame his Memory.

Great Power of the Spencers.

The Death of this Prince, and of ſeveral other Lords of the ſame Party, placed the Spencers on the top of the Wheel. As there was now no Man able to oppoſe them, theſe two Miniſters did, in the King's Name, whatever they thought agreeable with their Intereſts, without regarding a Party entirely reduced. Had they been ſo wiſe to moderate their Paſſion, and deny themſelves the Pleaſure of Revenge, they would have doubtleſs ſupported themſelves in their high Station, and cauſed their Maſter to paſs an eaſy and quiet Life. But where are Men of this Character to be found? The Spencers, to compleat their Vengeance, threw the Kingdom into greater and more fatal Troubles, than what were lately appeaſed. Not content with putting to death the Heads of the oppoſite Party, with depriving others of their Eſtates, and with condemning great numbers to perpetual Baniſhment, they believed themſelves yet unſafe, till they were rid of three Perſons who made them uneaſy, and with whom they were extremely incenſed; namely, the Biſhops of Lincoln (6) and Hereford, and Roger Mortimer the younger. This laſt, who had done them great damage, was in their power, being actually Priſoner in the Tower.

They perſecute their Enemies.

They attack the Biſhop of Hereford, but are oppoſed. Act. Pub. III. p. 617. 637. Walſing. De la M.

Adam Orleton, Biſhop of Hereford, was promoted to that Dignity by the Intereſt of Pope John XXII, in ſpite of all the King's Endeavours to the contrary. This Prelate, who had ſhown but little regard for the Court on that occaſion, rightly judged the King would not fail, when in his Power, to be revenged on him. For this reaſon he joined with the Earl of Lancaſter, to ſcreen himſelf from the Perſecution he juſtly feared. Matters having taken a quite different turn from what he expected, and the King preſerving an extreme Reſentment againſt him, his Ruin was determined. To that end he was ſummoned to anſwer in the King's Court to a Charge of High-Treaſon entered againſt him (7). He appeared, but refuſed to plead in any but the Eccleſiaſtical Court, inſiſting upon the Privilege of his Order. This Refuſal would have done him no Service, had he not been ſupported by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and Dublin. Theſe Prelates conſidering the Sentence which the King's Court was going to pronounce, as a manifeſt Violation of the Church's Immunities, went in Company with ſeveral other Biſhops, and forbid the King's Judges to take cognizance of the Caſe, threatning them with Excommunication, if they dared to proceed. However deſirous the King and his Miniſters were to be rid of this Biſhop, the Clergy's Oppoſition hindered the Judges from paſſing Sentence, and the Affair was referred to the Parliament. Nevertheleſs, till this Proceſs was over, the King ordered the Temporalities of the Party accuſed to be ſeized.

The two Biſhops join together.

The Biſhop of Lincoln, who was in the ſame caſe, plainly perceived what would be his doom, if the Biſhop of Hereford was condemned. A common Intereſt forming a very ſtrict Union between theſe two Prelates, they applied themſelves to find means to raiſe Troubles, which ſhould ſhelter them from the King's Vengeance. Unhappily for him their Endeavours ſucceeded but too well.

Mortimer is condemned twice, and pardoned.

Roger Mortimer the younger was not, or at leaſt ſeemed not to be, in very favorable Circumſtances. Detained in cloſe Confinement, and deſtitute of a Character which might ſcreen him from the malice of the Favorites, who were extremely incenſed againſt him, he expected to forfeit his Head for the Damages he had done. And indeed he was condemned to die (8), but found a powerful Interceſſion with the King; who, notwithſtanding the Sollicitations of his Favorites, changed his Sentence to perpetual Impriſonment. It was no ſmall matter for Mortimer to eſcape death. The State he was in ſeemed to require his Patience, till time ſhould bring ſome alteration in his favour. But ſo ſlow and uncertain a means was not capable of making him eaſy. Whether he was afraid the King would, one time or other, be gained by his Enemies, or relied upon the ſame Protection that had already ſaved his Life, he entered into new Plots. Though a Priſoner, he attempted to make himſelf maſter of the Tower, and likewiſe of Wallingford Caſtle, by the help of his Friends. This Plot being diſcovered, one of his Accomplices was condemned to be hanged, and himſelf once more had the Sentence of Death paſſed upon him. However, he obtained his Pardon again.

Remarks on his being thus pardoned.

When a Man reflects on the great Credit of the Spencers, their revengeful Temper, and the reaſon they had perſonally to hate Mortimer, he muſt be convinced, that the Protection which ſcreened him from their Vengeance was very powerful. On the other hand, if all the Circumſtances of this Reign be conſidered, it will not be thought likely, that any other Perſon but the Queen could poſſibly obtain ſuch a Favour from the King, againſt the Intereſt and Sollicitations of the Miniſters. This Conjecture is confirmed by the ſcandalous manner wherein that Princeſs afterwards lived with Mortimer;

(1) They took, among the reſt, John de Bretagne Earl of Richmond Priſoner. Walſingham p. 117.

(2) He was one of Lancaſter's Family and ingaged with his Lord in the late Inſurrection, and being condemned to be hanged, ſome, about the King, becauſe he formerly had a Place at Court, offered to intercede for him. At which the King falling into a Paſſion ſaid as above. Walſ. p. 117. The words are tranſlated nearer the Original than in the French.

(3) He was buried in the Church of the Priory of Pontfract. The Prior and Monks giving out that Miracles were wrought at his Tomb, the Report gained Ground in ſuch a manner, that the King was forced to order the Church to be ſhut up. The King's Letter to the Biſhop of London on account of his Picture which was ſet up in St. Paul's Cathedral, and worſhipped by the People, is in Vol. III. p. 1033, of Rymer's Fœd. See Brady. 1323. from whence it may be inferred, their good Underſtanding commenced long before it was publickly known. For a further Confirmation of this may be added what all the Hiſtorians unanimouſly relate, that the Queen inceſſantly complained of the Severities, exerciſed upon the Friends of the late Earl of Lancaſter. This gives occaſion to preſume, that Mortimer was the principal Subject of her Complaints. Moreover, at this very time it was, that the Spencers began to vex Queen Iſabella, inſomuch, that by their Perſecutions, they obliged her to complain to the King of France her Brother, that ſhe was regarded but as a Servant in the King her Husband's Houſe. Now it does not appear, that the Favorites had any other Reaſon to mortify her, than the Protection ſhe granted to Mortimer their Enemy. All theſe Reaſons incline me to believe, there was at this time a Familiarity between Iſabella and Mortimer, and that the Protection ſhe publickly honour'd him with, drew upon her the Malice of the Favorites. The Vexation they gave her, led her to ſeek means to be revenged in her turn. This is truly the Source of the Events we are going to relate, concerning which Hiſtorians have expreſſed themſelves very obſcurely. Let us add here, in order not to return to Mortimer till there ſhall be occaſion, that quickly after he found means to eſcape out of the Tower (1), and lie concealed ſome time in England, notwithſtanding the diligent Search that was made to apprehend him. Though Hue and Cry was raiſed after him, which ſeldom fails of Succeſs, he had the good fortune to eſcape the Search, and retire into France. Probably, he was hid in ſome Place where they durſt not look for him. Let us now proceed to the fatal Effects of the Love, Ambition, and Revenge, which at that time poſſeſſed the Minds of the principal Perſons at Court.

Affairs of Edward with France.

The Peace made by Edward I with France ſtill ſubſiſted, notwithſtanding certain Diſputes between the two Crowns, in the Reigns of Lewis Hutin, and Philip le Long, Sons and Succeſſors of Philip the Fair. Upon Charles the Fair's Acceſſion to the Throne of France, after the Death of his Brothers, theſe Differences were conſiderably increaſed, on account of the Juriſdiction claimed by that Prince over Guienne, as Sovereign Lord of that Duchy. It is probable too that Charles, diſſatisfied at the ill Treatment of his Siſter Queen Iſabella in England, ſought occaſion to give Edward Marks of his Reſentment. An unexpected Accident in Guienne, gave him an opportunity to make himſelf Satisfaction. Hence flowed all thoſe Misfortunes which afterwards fell upon the King of England.

The King of France takes occaſion to ſeize Guienne. Act. Pub. III. p. 1005. IV. 48, 55, 63, &c.

At a Town in Agenois, called St. Sardos, held of the Caſtle of Montpezat, ſome Outrage was committed, which Edward's Officers in Guienne neglected to redreſs (2). Whereupon the Parties concerned carried their Complaints to the King of France, as Sovereign. Charles embraced this opportunity to improve his Right over Guienne. He cauſed the Court of Peers to ſentence the Lord of Montpezat, and other Gaſcon Gentlemen to Baniſhment, and confiſcate their Caſtles to the Crown of France. By virtue of this ſentence, given without ſummoning the King of England, or his Officers, Charles would have taken poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Montpezat; but was prevented by the Engliſh, who placed a ſtrong Garriſon there. This oppoſition occaſioned another Sentence, declaring the Garriſon guilty of Felony, for oppoſing the execution of the firſt. Mean while, the King of France ordered Troops to be raiſed in Perigord, and the neighbouring Provinces, with deſign to beſiege the Caſtle. To give the better colour to this Armament, he complained, that Edward had not done him Homage for Guienne and the Earldom of Ponthieu (3), and ſo had a Pretence ready to confiſcate theſe Provinces, in caſe his Arms met with the expected Succeſs. Indeed it was viſible, his Deſign was not to take a Caſtle only, ſince he ſent a formidable Army into Guienne, under the Command of Charles de Valois his Uncle, who made himſelf maſter of ſeveral Places. Certain it is, nothing was farther from Edward's thoughts, than a deſire of entering into a War with France, and yet he took no Method to avoid it. Inſtead of giving the King his Brother-in-law ſome Satisfaction, by doing Juſtice to the Parties concerned in the Affair of St. Sardos, and by offering the Homage due to him, he ſtill kept his Character of neglecting great matters for the ſake of Trifles (4). It is true indeed, he ſent Commiſſioners into Guienne (5), with publick Orders to make inquiſition concerning the Buſineſs of St. Sardos. But by their private Inſtructions they were to do their utmoſt to oblige the Plaintiffs to deſiſt from their Appeal, which was not endeavouring to ſatisfy the King of France. As for the Homage, though he did not pretend to diſpute it, he excuſed himſelf from doing it, on pretence he had never been ſummoned in form. Mean time, he ſent his Brother, the Earl of Kent, to command in Guienne, but with ſo few Troops, that the Earl not daring to keep the Field, ſhut himſelf up in Reole, where he was beſieged, and at laſt forced to capitulate.

Negotiation at Paris. Act. Pub. IV. p. 42, 63, 98, 100.

Before the Earl of Kent went over to Guienne, he was ſent to Paris, to try to adjuſt the Difference between the two Crowns. He had even agreed with the Court of France upon a Treaty, which the King his Brother refuſed to ratify. This was the Subject of a long Negotiation, which ſerved only to give the Earl of Valois time to purſue his Conqueſts in Guienne. At length, Edward perceiving the Duchy was in manifeſt danger, thought fit to make ſome Preparations, which occaſioned the Court of France to equip a Fleet, to oppoſe that of the Engliſh. The Spencers, ever watchful of occaſions to vex Iſabella, uſed this to deprive her of the Earldom of Cornwal, aſſigned her for her private Expences. They ſuggeſted to the King, that it was dangerous to leave that Country in the hands of the Queen, when he was in War with the King her Brother. They added, that probably, the Fleet the French were fitting out, was deſigned for an Invaſion from that quarter. This was ſufficient to induce Edward to reſume that Earldom in a very diſobliging manner to the Queen, without diſſembling that he thought her capable of holding a criminal Correſpondence with the Enemies of the State (6). This Indignity, which ſhe highly reſented, added to ſo many other Reaſons of Diſguſt againſt the Spencers and the King, in all likelihood, haſtened the Project, the particulars whereof I am going to relate.

1325. The Pope tries to accommodate Matters. Act. Pub. IV. p. 105. Walſing.

Though Edward made ſome Preparations for War, it was not by the Force of his Arms that he expected the Reſtitution of what was taken from him. His chief Reliance was on the Pope, who being choſen Mediator between the two Crowns, put him in hopes of a good Iſſue of this Affair. To work this Agreement, the Pope ſent two Nuntio's to Paris (7), where Ambaſſadors from England (8) alſo repaired. But the Negotiation went on ſo ſlowly that the Engliſh could not help ſhowing ſome Impatience. As they ſeemed inclined to return home, a Perſon of great Note in the Court of France took occaſion to inſinuate to the Nuntio's, that if the King of England would ſend his Queen to Paris, ſhe would undoubtedly obtain from the King her Brother much better Terms than the Ambaſſadors could expect. The Nuntio's having made this Propoſal to the Engliſh Plenipotentiaries, it was reſolved that one of them, the Biſhop of Wincheſter (9), ſhould take a Journey to London, to perſuade their Maſter to follow the method ſuggeſted to them. Theſe particulars are to be ſeen in a Letter from Edward to the Pope on this occaſion, inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts. It was not therefore a Contrivance invented by the Spencers to be rid of the Queen, as ſome affirmed, ſince the Project came firſt from France. It is much more likely, that the Queen her ſelf put the King her Brother upon it, in order to have an opportunity of going to Paris, and beginning the execution of her Plot againſt the King her Husband and his Favorites. Be that as it will, the Propoſal being debated in Council (10), any expedient was thought preferable to a War, as mat-

Act. Pub. IV. p. 156.

How diſadvantagious ſoever this Treaty appeared to Edward, as he was willing at any rate to avoid a War, he failed not to ratify it and prepare to do his Homage. The Spencers beheld theſe Preparations with great Uneaſineſs, knowing there were in the Kingdom great Numbers of Male-contents who might take advantage of the King's Abſence, to excite freſh Commotions. An Expedient found out in this Interval, either in France, or in England, freed them from their Trouble. It was inſinuated to the King, that if he would reſign to Prince Edward his Son aged thirteen Years, the Duchy of Guienne and the Earldom of Ponthieu, the King of France would receive the Homage of the young Prince, and reſtore him the Places he had promiſed to give up by the Treaty. In all likelihood this Overture came from the Court of France, as well as the Propoſal of the Queen's going to Paris. But it was only hinted to the King like the former, in order to induce him to demand that Favour himſelf. However that be, as every one is apt to flatter himſelf, Edward imagined that, out of Reſpect to him, the King of France had deviſed this Expedient, to excuſe him from doing what was very diſagreeable to him, or the Queen had obtained this Favour by her Sollicitations. Neither himſelf nor the Spencers perceived the Poiſon that lurked under this ſeemingly very advantagious Propoſal. They did not queſtion in the leaſt, but the management of Guienne would ſtill remain in their hands, in the Name of the young Prince, at leaſt during his Minority. On the other hand, the propoſed Change did not appear to be beneficial to France. But for that very reaſon they ſhould have ſuſpected it; ſince it ſeldom happens that any thing advantagious is offered to another, without the Propoſer's receiving ſome Benefit, though at firſt it does not appear. However, as Edward ſuſpected not his Queen, he accepted, without heſitation, the Offer, which excuſed him from a Journey he was very unwilling to make. This was, as one may ſay, throwing himſelf headlong into the Snare laid for him, the Queen's ſole Aim, in the whole Contrivance, being to get the Prince her Son with her, and to make him her Inſtrument to ruin the King her Husband.

He accepts the Propoſal.

Remarks which make appear that the King of France acted in concert with the Queen his Siſter.

There is hardly room to queſtion, that Charles the Fair was very deeply concerned in this Plot, when it is conſidered, that from him came the firſt Propoſal of ſending Iſabella to Paris. This gives occaſion to preſume, he was Author of the ſecond too, which tended to draw Prince Edward there alſo. And indeed, if he had not ſome private View, what Advantage could the Change propoſed be to him? Was it not more honourable, to ſee the King of England at his feet, than his Son? And yet, inſtead of appearing to have made any objection on this account, it is ſeen in ſeveral Places of the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he very readily came into it, by the great haſte wherewith this Agreement was made. The 21ſt of Auguſt, Edward had ſtill thoughts of going to France. The 24th of the ſame Month he writ to Charles, to be excuſed, upon a pretended Fit of Sickneſs, from meeting him at Beauvais on the day appointed. The 2d of September, he abſolutely reſigned to the Prince his Son the Earldom of Ponthieu (4). The 4th of the ſame Month, Charles ſigned Letters Patent, conſenting to the Subſtitution of the Son in his Father's room, on condition King Edward would reſign to his Son whatever he held in France. But this condition was already performed in England two days before, with reſpect to the Earldom of Ponthieu. Hence it is plain, this Negotiation was begun and ended between the 24th of Auguſt and the 4th of September, which doubtleſs will ſeem too ſhort a time, if the Court of France is ſuppoſed not to be already determined, to grant what ſhe well knew was going to be demanded. If the Son's Subſtitution in the Father's place, had been attended with no Conſequence, there would have been no occaſion to take much notice of it; the thing in itſelf being of little moment. But it was neceſſary to relate the Circumſtances, in order to ſhew it was a Plot contrived long before by the Queen, and a Snare laid by her for the King her Husband, and at the ſame time that ſhe acted in concert with the King of France her Brother. For, it is very hard to believe this Princeſs ſo politick, as to draw King Charles into her Project, without his or his Council's perceiving it. It is therefore very likely, that before Iſabella left England, ſhe had intimated to the King her Brother, that ſhe wanted to throw off the Dependence ſhe was kept in by the Spencers, and free herſelf from the ill Treatment ſhe received, by their Inſtigation, from her Husband. So, it may be very probably preſumed, it was in order to ſerve the Queen his Siſter, that Charles cauſed to be made indirectly the Propoſal of ſending her to Paris. That it was moreover in proſecution of the ſame Deſign, that he ſo readily came into the Treaty he concluded with her, when he might reaſonably expect to become maſter of Guienne. In fine, that it was with the ſame View, that he conſented to receive the Son's, inſtead of the Father's Homage. It is ſcarcely to be doubted, that the prolonging of the Term of the Homage, without giving the Reaſons, was a Conſequence of the ſame Project. It was believed, without doubt, there would be need of more time, to prevail with Edward to ſend his Son to Paris, to which it was imagined he would make ſome Objections. To all theſe reaſons may be farther added, that afterwards Charles permitted the Queen his Siſter to ſtay in France, notwithſtanding the repeated Inſtances of her Husband to the contrary. Moreover the French Hiſtorians own themſelves, he had promiſed her Aſſiſtance. Add to this, Iſabella's Hatred of Spencer the younger, and her Paſſion for Mortimer, which ſhe took no further care to conceal, when ſhe had the Prince her Son in her power. Moreover let the Readineſs be conſidered, wherewith all the Engliſh Lords declared for her, when it was time, as we ſhall ſee preſently. From the Connexion of all theſe Circumſtances it is demonſtrable, that Iſabella's Plot was formed before her Departure from England, and that the King her Brother was not ignorant of it. I have dwelt the longer on theſe particulars, becauſe the Hiſtorians ſeem to me to ſpeak very obſcurely of the Cauſes of the Revolution I am going to relate.

The two Kings being agreed upon the expedient propoſed, Prince Edward departed for Paris on the 12th of September 1325 (5), after receiving from his Father the abſolute Grant of the Duchy of Guienne and Earldom of Ponthieu. In a few days after his Arrival (6), he did Homage to the King his Uncle, who actually reſtored him Guienne, but kept Agenois, of which Edward the Father greatly complained. He pretended, that by the late Agreement Charles was obliged to reſtore all Guienne to his Son. Charles, on the contrary, maintained, that the reſtitution he had promiſed, had relation to the late Treaty, whereby he reſerved Agenois for himſelf. This Conteſt diſpleaſed not the Queen, who wanted a Pretence to ſtay at Paris, from whence ſhe did not intend ſo ſoon to depart. After the Arrival of the Prince her Son, all the Engliſh who had fled for refuge into France. or been baniſhed their own Country, came to her. Roger Mortimer was of this number, and became her chief Counſellor. From thenceforward Edward's Ambaſſadors had but little acceſs to the Queen, and were no longer adviſed with, concerning the Affair of the reſtitution of Agenois. On the contrary, ſhe held frequent Councils, where none were admitted but the profeſſed Enemies of the King her Husband, and of the Spencers. Nay ſhe had ſecret Conferences with Mortimer, which occaſioned many Suſpicions. In fine, ſhe came to uſe ſo little diſcretion in her Familiarities with him, that Edward's Servants at Paris were extremely offended thereat. On the other hand, her Return to England was deferred from day to day, on divers pretences, notwith-

Some ſay, her Paſſion began at Paris: But much more probably, it commenced (as was ſaid) in England before Mortimer's Impriſonment. However this be, the Queen's ſecret Conferences with a Fugitive ſhe ought to have baniſhed her preſence, as an Enemy to the King, opened at length the Eyes of the Biſhop of Exeter, one of Edward's Ambaſſadors. The Biſhop plainly perceiving his Maſter was betrayed, privately withdrew from the Court of France (2), to inform him of what was tranſacting at Paris. He acquainted him, not only with the Queen's ſcandalous Behaviour with regard to Mortimer, but aſſured him alſo they were contriving ſome Plot againſt him. He very juſtly built his Suſpicions on their frequent Councils with the Exiles, without ſuffering the Ambaſſadors to be preſent. Edward had already thought it very ſtrange, that after the Homage was done, the Mother and Son ſhould ſtay ſo long in France, and had often writ to recall them. The Biſhop of Exeter's late Information entirely opening his eyes, he began from that moment to perceive his great error in ſending his Son to Paris. This made him repeat his Inſtances for their Return, and poſitively command the Queen to bring his Son with her, without ſtaying one minute for the Reaſons ſhe had hitherto alledged. His Orders were ſo urgent, that Iſabella was obliged to ſeek other excuſes. She cauſed the King her Brother to ſend him word, ſhe could not think of returning to England, without being firſt ſecured againſt the Treatment ſhe was apprehenſive of from Spencer the Son (8). Edward, in his anſwer to this Letter, juſtified Spencer's behaviour to the Queen, by her own Letters to that Favorite, full of Friendſhip and confidence, ſince her being in France. Moreover, he aſſured the King his Brother-in-law, that he would never ſuffer Spencer or any other Perſon, to be wanting in the reſpect due to his Queen. He further repreſented to him, that if he had not entirely relied on his Sincerity, he ſhould never have ſent his Son into France, and deſired him to remember his promiſe, and ſend him back with all ſpeed. He writ in much the ſame manner to the Queen and Prince: but his Letters were all to no purpoſe. Iſabella was determined to purſue her point, and whilſt ſhe was taking meaſures at Paris to accompliſh her deſign, her Friends were effectually ſerving her in England. The Heads of her Party were Henry of Lancaſter, Brother of him beheaded at Pontfract, and the Biſhops of Lincoln and Hereford. They did not find it very difficult to form a ſtrong Party againſt the King, conſidering the Diſpoſitions of the Barons ſince the late cruel Executions.

Confutation of Edward's baniſhing the Queen and his Son.

1326. Charles the Fair, as the French Hiſtorians are forced to own, had promiſed the Queen his Siſter ſome Aſſiſtance, but was unwilling it ſhould appear he was concerned in her Plots (4). It was neceſſary therefore for Iſabella to find a Protector, who would not ſcruple openly to ſupport her Intereſts. To that end, ſhe applied to the Earl of Hainault, from whom ſhe believed ſhe ſhould be able to procure ſome Troops, to ſtrengthen her Party upon her Arrival in England. But as ſhe could not expect to gain that Prince, without making it turn to his advantage, ſhe concluded with him a marriage between her Son Edward and his Daughter Philippa, as if it had been in her power to diſpoſe of the young Prince. Several pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts plainly ſhew, this marriage was in hand whilſt the Queen was yet at Paris. Amongſt others, there was a Letter of King Edward to his Son, expreſly forbidding him, to enter into any Marriage-Ingagement without his Knowledge.

Mean time, the King of France ſtill permitted Iſabella to continue at Paris, and read without any Emotion, or Anſwer, Edward's Letters, upbraiding him with Breach of Faith. The Information Edward received from the Biſhop of Exeter; the Queen's frivolous Excuſes to defer her Return; and King Charles's connivance, troubled him extremely. He plainly ſaw, ſome Plot was contriving againſt him at Paris, tho' he could not tell what it was. But he was very ſenſible, the conſequences were to be dreaded, as long as the Prince his Son was in the hands of his Enemies. Moſt of the Hiſtorians affirm, the Contempt ſhewn by the Mother and Son for his Orders, induced him at length to baniſh them the Realm. But a Letter, he ſent the Pope on that Subject, manifeſtly ſhews, it was only a falſe rumour ſpread in France, on purpoſe to juſtify the Queen's ſtay. In the Letter Edward told the Pope, That he had never ſuch a Thought: That the tender Age of his Son freed him from all Imputation of Diſobedience, of which the Queen alone was guilty, and that he had too great an Affection for both, to treat them ſo inhumanly. After trying in vain all the ways he could deviſe, to oblige them to return to England, he turned his whole Fury upon the Ambaſſadors, who aſſiſted the Queen in the negotiation of the fatal Treaty, and reſolved to make them reſponſible for the Iſſue. He particularly charged the Biſhop of Norwich and Earl of Richmond, with prevaricating in the execution of their Orders (5), wherein he committed two egregious Errors: Firſt, as he increaſed thereby the number of his Enemies, who were already too numerous. Secondly, as he diſcovered his Incapacity to govern his Kingdom, ſince, as a minor King might have done, he caſt on his Miniſters the blame which he himſelf had incurred, by ratifying the Treaty. This Conduct could not fail to give his Enemies a great advantage; whoſe chief aim was to perſuade the People, the King was very unfit to govern. To this imprudent Proceeding, he added another, no leſs impolitick, in declaring War againſt France, without being in any readineſs to maintain it; and in giving Charles a plauſible pretence openly to ſupport his Siſter's Intereſts (6).

As Iſabella's project to dethrone the King her Husband has ſomething deteſtable in it, the French Hiſtorians would fain inſinuate that Charles the Fair her Brother was no way concerned in it. On the contrary, they affirm, that when he came to know it, he expelled her his Dominions, and forbid his Knights to give her any aſſiſtance. They would have ſpoke the whole Truth, if they had ſaid, he did not do this, till Iſabella had taken all her meaſures with the Earl of Hainault, and was upon the point of executing her deſign. Mezerai could not help diſcovering his thoughts, when he ſaid the Spencers were ſo liberal of their Money at the Court of France, that Charles, gained by Preſents, or awed by the Threats of a Rupture, prohibited his Subjects from aſſiſting the Queen. It is true he adds, that becauſe Mortimer, who had made his Eſcape out of the Tower, was come to Queen Iſabella at Paris, Charles deteſting their ſhameful Proceedings, would not ſuffer her any longer in his Dominions. But it is eaſy to ſee, the French King was not ſwayed by that Motive, ſince it is not true, that Mortimer followed the Queen into France, where he had been two Years before her. On the contrary, it is certain, Charles ſuffered his whole Court, above ſixteen Months, to be witneſs of the Familiarities between his Siſter and Mortimer. And if he ſent her afterwards out of his Territories, it was purely on account of the Uncertainty of the Iſſue, and to avoid the Blame of having approved of her Conduct, in caſe ſhe did not ſucceed.

Iſabella leaving the Court of France, paſſed ſome days at Abbeville, from whence ſhe came to Valenciennes. Upon her Arrival, ſhe ratified the Treaty concluded between her and the Earl of Hainault, and contracted her Son Edward to the Princeſs Philippa. A few days after, ſhe repaired to Dort, where ſhe embarked the Troops ſupplied by the Earl of Hainault, who were all ready there, with Ships to tranſport them. John de Hainault, Brother of the Earl, had the Command; and the Queen, as a ſingular favour, gave him leave to ſtile himſelf her Knight. Some reckon theſe Troops but three thouſand Men (7). Others ſay, they were much more numerous. But ſhe did not rely ſo much upon theſe Forces, as upon the Diſcontents of the Engliſh, and the many Adherents procured her by her Friends in England. She landed on the twenty ſecond of September [at Orewell] in Suffolk, where ſhe was joined by Henry of Lancaſter, and ſeveral other Lords (8). At the ſame time, the Enemies of the Spencers were very buſy in levying Troops to come to her aſſiſtance; and her Army ſoon became ſo numerous, that ſhe ſtruck Terror into

Edward was then little able to withſtand his Enemies. All his Endeavours to raiſe Troops had proved ineffectual: No body would expoſe himſelf to the Queen's Reſentment, or hazard his Life and Fortune for an unhappy Prince, who was now looked upon as loſt. In this Extremity, finding no remedy in England, he reſolved to retire into Ireland, and leave Spencer, the Father, in Briſtol. Here ſhe publiſhed a Proclamation, inviting the King to come and reſume the Government: but herein ſhe acted not with Sincerity. Whilſt the Queen was at Glaceſter, a Report being ſpread that the King was ſome where concealed in Wales, Henry of Lancaſter was detached in queſt of him. He had with him only Spencer, Chancellor Baldoc, Simon de Reading, and a few Domeſticks, all the reſt forſaking him in his Misfortunes. As the Abbey of Neath was no proper place to keep the Priſoners, Henry of Lancaſter carried them to Monmouth Caſtle till farther Orders (7). When the Queen heard that the King her Husband, and her principal Enemies were in her Power, ſhe held a Council, to know how ſhe was to behave at this juncture. It was reſolved in the Council, that the Biſhop of Hereford ſhould be ſent to demand the Great-Seal of the King; as well to hinder him from uſing it againſt the Queen, as to be able to call a Parliament, without which nothing could be done but what would want a lawful Authority. If what had hitherto paſſed, diſcovered to the King the Deſigns of his Enemies, this laſt Circumſtance fully convinced him, he ſhould be no longer regarded, ſince by taking from him the Great-Seal, he was deprived at the ſame time of the Exerciſe of the Royal Authority. He delivered it however, without ſhewing any Reluctance, and gave the Queen and the Prince his Son Power to uſe it as they pleaſed, even in matters of mere Grace. The Favorites and Miniſters having thus received the Reward of their Pride and Cruelty, the Queen came to London, to take new meaſures concerning the Parliament which was to meet. She entered the City in triumph, amidſt the Acclamations of the People, who called her their Deliverer, and expreſſed their Thankfulneſs, for the pretended Service ſhe had done the State. The Parliament meeting in January (9) 1327, the firſt thing taken into conſideration, was the depoſing of the King, for which every one was now ſo prepared, that the unfortunate King had not ſo much as a ſingle Advocate to plead for him. It was unanimouſly reſolved, the King ſhould be depoſed, and his Son Edward made King in his room. The Heads of the Charge exhibited againſt him, were digeſted into ſeveral Articles, of which ſome were very much aggravated, and others only bare Repetitions, in order to ſwell the Number. In general, he was accuſed, of not having governed according to the Laws of the Land; of having made uſe of ill Counſellors, and rejecting the Advice of his faithful Subjects. [The Articles at length were (10):

This Act paſſing Nemine Contradicente, young Edward was proclaimed King in Weſtminſter-Hall, by the Name of Edward III. Then the Archbiſhop of Canterbury preached a Sermon on theſe words, The Voice of the People, the Voice of God; wherein he endeavoured to vindicate what the Parliament had done, and exhorted the People to pray to the King of Kings for their new Sovereign.

Pretended Sorrow of the Queen. Walſing.

When the News of this rigorous Sentence was brought to the Queen, ſhe ſeemed to be extremely moved, even to the burſting out into Tears. But her outward Grief little agreed with all her Proceedings to dethrone her Husband; much leſs with her Paſſion for Mortimer, of which ſhe gave ſuch publick Marks, that it was impoſſible to be miſtaken. The Prince her Son, whoſe Youth made him leſs ſuſpicious, was perhaps the only Perſon that was affected with her counterfeit Tears. Urged by his generous Inclinations, he ſolemnly vowed not to accept the Crown during the King his Father's Life, without his expreſs Conſent. This Vow ſomewhat broke the meaſures of the Parliament. They were afraid Edward the Father would perſiſt in keeping the Title of King, though ſtript of all his Authority. In this Perplexity, it was deemed abſolutely neceſſary, to oblige him to reſign his Crown to the Prince his Son. Purſuant to this Reſolution, the Biſhops of Lincoln and Hereford were ſent to prepare him. Then the Parliament nominated twelve Commiſſioners; namely, three Biſhops, three Earls, two Barons, two Abbots, and two Judges (1); to whom was added Judge Truſſel, as the Nation's particular Procurator, to declare to him, that the People of England were no longer bound by their Oath of Allegiance, and to receive his Reſignation. Nothing ſhewed ſo much their Reſentment againſt the unfortunate King, as their Choice of the two firſt Biſhops (2), whom he had all along looked upon as his Enemies, and who indeed diſcharged their Commiſſion very rudely. Inſtead of giving him Conſolation, they inſulted over his Misfortunes, in endeavouring to perſuade him, he was depoſed for his own Good, and to eaſe him of the great Weight of the Government, that he might live more happily than he had hitherto done. But as their malicious Diſcourſe made no great impreſſion upon him, they plainly told him, unleſs he complied with the Parliament, his Condition would be rendered more unfortunate: Adding, his Obſtinacy would be a great Prejudice to his Family; for, if he refuſed to reſign the Crown to his Son, the Nation was reſolved to elect a King, not of the Royal Family. Upon theſe words, they withdrew, in order to give him time to conſider of his Anſwer to the Commiſſioners, who were coming to receive his Reſignation.

The Prince would not accept the Crown without the King's Conſent. Walſing.

1327. Sad State of Edward. De la M.

At the Arrival of the Commiſſioners, the unfortunate King came out from his Bed-Chamber in a Mourning-Gown, with Looks demonſtrating his inward Trouble. As he was acquainted with the occaſion of their coming, the ſight of that formidable Power, which had juſt deſpoiled him of Royalty, made ſuch an impreſſion upon his Mind, that he fell into a Swoon, from whence he could hardly recover. As ſoon as he came to himſelf, the Commiſſioners told him their Meſſage, and repreſented to him, the ill Conſequences of his Refuſal. Then, the unhappy Prince, with a Sadneſs that could not be ſeen without Pity, anſwered, " That he ſubmitted to " whatever was required of him, with the greater reſig- " nation, as he acknowledged, his Sins were the ſole " cauſe of his Misfortunes." He added moreover, " that " he could not behold without extreme Grief, the Aver- " ſion his People had for him; but if his Sorrow could " admit of any Comfort, it was from the conſideration " of his Subjects Goodneſs to his Son, for which he re- " turned them Thanks." Walſing. Knighton. His Anſwer to the Deputies.

After this Anſwer, he proceeded to the Ceremony of his Reſignation, by delivering to them the Crown, Scepter, and the other Enſigns of Royalty. Then Sir William Truſſel, addreſſing himſelf to the King, ſpoke in this manner, making uſe of a Form of his own, in a caſe where there was no Precedent to follow. I William Truſſel, Procurator of the Prelates, Earls, Barons, and People in my Procuracy named, having for This full and ſufficient Power, do ſurrender unto you, Edward, late King of England, the Homage and Fealty of the Perſons aforeſaid, and do acquit the ſame, in the beſt manner the Law and Cuſtom can give it, and do make this Proteſtation, in the Name of all thoſe that will not be in your Fealty or Allegiance for the future, nor claim or hold any Thing of you as King, but account you as a private Perſon, without any manner of Royal Dignity (3). After theſe Words, the High-Steward, [Sir Thomas Blunt] broke his Staff, and declared all the King's Officers diſcharged from his Service. Thus ended the Reign of Edward II, in the forty third Year of his Age, having laſted nineteen Years, ſix Months and fifteen Days. He reſigns the Enſigns of Royalty. A new Proceedure in this Caſe. Polychron. l. 7. c. 43. Knighton. De la M.

This Prince had a very mean Genius, which permitted him not to diſtinguiſh what was for his Advantage, from what was hurtful to him. He followed his Humour, without troubling himſelf about the Conſequences, and without being able to remedy the Misfortunes he thereby drew on himſelf. Though he had many Failings, he may be affirmed to be more weak than wicked. To ſum up his Character in a few Words, he was exceeding like his Grandfather Henry III. Edward his Father, a much wiſer Prince than he, and taught by the Misfortunes of the two Kings his immediate Predeceſſors, ever avoided, as a moſt dangerous Rock, all occaſion of Quarrel with the Nobility; chuſing rather to give way a little, than hazard his quiet to gratify his Reſentment. The Son had not a ſufficient Capacity to follow ſo good an Example, or to improve by his Inſtructions. He gave up himſelf entirely to his Favorites, and choſe rather to forfeit the Affection of his People, than deny himſelf the Satisfaction of heaping Favours on thoſe he loved. His Weakneſs and Incapacity drew on him the Contempt of his Subjects, which was ſoon changed into hatred, when he was ſeen to ſacrifice all to his Paſſions. He had the Misfortune to have a beautiful and amorous Wife, who giving way to an infamous Paſſion, compleated his Ruin, for fear perhaps of being herſelf prevented. Certainly, he was treated too ſeverely by his Subjects, whoſe Inſolence increaſed in proportion to their Sovereign's Weakneſs. One cannot obſerve without wonder, that there was not a ſingle Perſon willing to draw his Sword in his Defence. I ſhall not undertake to determine how far, in thoſe Days, the Rights of the People, with regard to the King, might extend. I ſhall only ſay, there was no Precedent to follow; for this is the firſt Inſtance, in the Engliſh Hiſtory, of a King depoſed by his Subjects, at leaſt ſince the Conqueſt. Edward II is taxed with being given to drink. Some ſpeak of his Fondneſs for Gaveſton, ſo as to make it believed very Criminal. Others, on the contrary, commend him for his Continency. And indeed, we do not find he had any Miſtreſſes or Baſtards, like ſome of his Predeceſſors. He founded Oriel-College and St. Mary-Hall in Oxford (4), and built a Monaſtery for Friars on his Eſtate at Langley. Character of Edward II. De la M.

An Earthquake. I ſhall cloſe the Hiſtory of this Reign with two events, which I have not had occaſion to ſpeak of elſewhere. The firſt was an Earthquake, the moſt terrible that had ever been felt in Great Britain. The ſecond was the Suppreſſion of the Order of the Knights-Templars, both in England and all other Chriſtian States. This Order was firſt inſtituted at Jeruſalem, in the Reign of Baldwin IV (2), for the defence of the Holy Sepulchre, and Protection of the Pilgrims that reſorted thither from all parts. Hugo de Paganis and Geoffrey de St. Ademar were the Founders. The Knights of this Order were at firſt called, The Poor of the Holy City. Afterwards they had the Name of Templars, becauſe their firſt Houſe was near the Temple. Hence it is, that all their Houſes were ſtiled Temples. This Order was confirmed in the Council of Troye, 1127, and its Rule compoſed by St. Bernard.

After the Downfal of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, about the Year 1186, this Order was diſperſed over all Europe, and increaſed prodigiouſly by the Liberality of the Chriſtians (3). Riches ſoon changed the Manners of the Knights. In proceſs of time their ſcandalous Lives, joined to an inſupportable Pride, cauſed them to be as odious, as they were eſteemed in the beginning of their Inſtitution (4). Philip the Fair, King of France, being diſobliged by thoſe of his Kingdom, and (5) not content with puniſhing the Offenders, attempted the Ruin of the whole Order, by means of Pope Clement V, whom he had artfully gained. In the firſt place, he ordered all the Templars in France to be ſeized (6), as well as the Grand Maſter of the Order, who reſided in the Iſland of Cyprus, and by the Pope's order, was come to Paris. Then upon a Charge exhibited againſt them, that at their reception into the Order, they denied Jeſus Chriſt, and ſpit (7) upon a Crucifix, he cauſed fifty ſeven to be burnt, among whom was the Grand Maſter. To this accuſation was added others of Hereſy, Sodomy, and other numberleſs Crimes. To oblige the King of France, Clement V, earneſtly preſſed Edward II, to follow the Example of Philip his Father-in law. After much Sollicitation, he obtained at length, that all the Templars in England ſhould be ſeized (as they were in France) in one day (8). Edward being prevailed with, in expectation of their Eſtates, which were very conſiderable, held a National Synod at London, where they were condemned. However, They were not treated ſo rigorouſly as in France. They were only diſperſed in the Monaſteries to do Penance, with a moderate Penſion paid out of the Revenues of the Order. The Severities exerciſed upon them in France and England, would no doubt have ſufficed, if the Deſign had been only to chaſtiſe them: but their Deſtruction was determined. Clement V, agreeing in this point with Philip the Fair, cauſed ſtrict Inquiry to be made, and many Witneſſes to be heard, who accuſed not ſome particular Knights only, but the whole Order, of the moſt enormous Crimes. If theſe Depoſitions were well atteſted, one can hardly conceive it poſſible, there could be ſo deteſtable a Society among Chriſtians. But every Body was not equally perſuaded of the Truth of theſe Evidences, particularly as to what concerned the Order in general. Theſe Preparations being made, the Pope called at Vienne in Dauphiné, a general Council, where he preſided in Perſon; and where Philip was pleaſed alſo to be preſent, to promote the Condemnation of the Order. But they did not find the Council diſpoſed as they expected. The Biſhops could not think of condemning Men that were not convicted, or even ſummoned before the Council to anſwer for themſelves. Theſe Proceedings of the Pope, without hearing what the Order could alledge in their defence, did not appear ſufficient to the Council, who wiſhed that things were done in a more legal manner. So the Pope was obliged to uſe the Plenitude of his Apoſtolical Power, in ſuſpending this Order for ever, by a Bull read in the ſecond Seſſion. As the Council was not prepared for it, no Man ventured to oppoſe the Bull; and their Silence was taken for an Approbation, according to the method now ſome time eſtabliſhed. By the ſame Bull, the Pope reſerved to the Holy See, the Diſpoſal of the Eſtates of the Templars; and, ſhortly after, Clement aſſigned them to the Hoſpitallers or Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, called at this Day, Knights of Maltha. Edward II, who had taken poſſeſſion of the Eſtates of the condemned Order, in vain oppoſed the Pope's Grant to the Hoſpitallers, and inſiſted on the Prerogatives of his Crown, by which all Confiſcations were adjudged to him. The Troubles in England during his Reign, would not permit him to keep Poſſeſſion (9). Thus the whole Order of the Templars were made to ſuffer the Puniſhment deſerved, doubtleſs, by ſome of their Members, but which, probably, was not due to all in general.

Having in the laſt Coin-Note ſpoken of the Perſons that ſat and acted at the Exchequer during the ſecond Period, I ſhall conſider II, the Buſineſs of the Exchequer during the ſame, which may be ranked under three general Heads: 1. Affairs of the Revenue. 2. Cauſes. 3. Buſineſs of various kinds. 1. There was in the Exchequer a great Variety of Buſineſs, ſpringing from things incident to the Revenue. Fines of divers kinds were impoſed, and Amercements ſet by the Treaſurer and Barons. They ſometimes ſurveyed the King's Manors, and committed or demiſed the ſame. They alſo committed (by the King's Command and Aſſent) the Counties to Sheriffs, and removed them from their Bailywicks. In fine, it was the Buſineſs of the Treaſurer and Barons, to ſpeed the levying and getting in of the King's Debts, and manage the Crown Revenue to the beſt Advantage. Nevertheleſs, if the King thought them remiſs, or wanted Money very urgently, he would ſend Writs or Meſſages to them, to haſten the getting in of Money, in ſuch manner as he directed. 2. Pleas and Cauſes: Though after the Separation of the Common Pleas from the King's Court and Palace, it was forbidden, by the Great Charter, and afterwards by an Ordinance, to hold Common Pleas in the Exchequer, yet in fact, ſome Common Pleas were ſtill holden; and the King ſometimes gave leave to particular Perſons, to bring their Suits and recover their Debts there. In Suits moved between Parties in the Exchequer, the King granted preference to one Perſon; namely, that he ſhould be paid before other Creditors. 3. Under the Head of Buſineſs of various kinds, we may place Conventions and Recognitions, which were frequently made in the Exchequer, and the Preſentation and Admiſſion of Officers of the Exchequer, as will be ſeen hereafter. Several Officers of the Exchange; and Coinage of Money, were from time to time preſented and ſworn in the Exchequer, as well as ſome others, who were Officers at large, as Cuſtomers and Commiſſioners of Perambulation of Foreſts. Particularly the Mayors and chief Officers of Towns, Eſcheators, &c. were preſented at the Exchequer. The Citizens of London, after they had choſen a Mayor, uſed to preſent him yearly on the Morrow of St. Simon and St. Jude, before the Treaſurer and Barons, who ſwore and admitted him to his Office; ſo likewiſe their Sheriffs on the Morrow of St. Michael. Thus Nicolas Batt their Mayor (28 Hen. III.) was preſented by the Citizens, and 9 Ed. II. the Mayor, &c. preſented their Sheriffs Hamon Godchep, and William Euddele. If the Sheriff of London did not come to the Exchequer at the King's Command, to take upon him the Office of Sheriff, he was to be amerced. Sometimes Sheriffs of Counties, Under-Sheriffs of Hereditary ones, &c. were ſworn in Perſon at the Exchequer. Several of the King's Tenants in Capite, by Knight's Service, did their Fealty; and others who held of the King in Capite, by Rent Service, paid their Rent at the Exchequer. Walter le Brun, Farrier at the Strand in Middleſex, was to have a piece of Ground in the Pariſh of St. Clement, to place a Forge there, he rendering yearly ſix Horſeſhoes. Mag. Rot. 19 Hen. III. This Rent was antiently wont to be paid at the Exchequer. It is ſtill tendered there to this Day, by the Mayor and Citizens of London, to whom, in proceſs of Time, the ſaid piece of Ground was granted. During this ſecond Period (as well as during the firſt) the chief Juſticiary, the Treaſurer, the Barons, and Council at the Exchequer, did ſometimes act in Affairs relating to the publick Peace, and to the Government and Defence of the Realm. In general, the Buſineſs and Acts of the Court of Exchequer, were wont to be entered or recorded in ſeveral Rolls, the principal whereof were, the Rotulus annalis, or great Roll of the Pipe, of which I have ſpoken in the laſt Coin Note; and therefore ſhall only add here, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer (who ſeems to have been appointed to be a Check upon the Treaſurer) from antient Time, cauſed a Counter-Roll of the Treaſurer's Great Roll, to be made up every Year. There are ſome of theſe Rotuli Cancellarii more antient than the Reign of Henry III. This obſervation may ſerve to reſolve a doubt, which the Antiquaries have hitherto lain under, For Example: There is in the Record-Office in the Tower of London, a Duplicate Great Roll of 6 Richb. I. and another of 7 John. And there is another of the third of John, in the Cuſtody of the Treaſurer and Chamberlains of the Exchequer. The Great Rolls of which ſeveral Years are in the Repoſitory of the Pipe. And in the ſame Repoſitory, there are two Great Rolls of the fourth of John. Now all theſe Duplicate Rolls Mr. Madox takes to be Rotuli Cancellarii. The next Records were the Memoranda, or Remembrances. A Remembrance was antiently wont to be made for every Year, in each of the Remembrancer's Offices. On the part of the Treaſurer's Remembrancer, each yearly Bundle contained ſeveral Heads or Titles, ſuch as Communia, the common Buſineſs; Compota, or Accounts; Viſus, Views; Adventus, the Advents of the Accomptants; and other Titles. So alſo the Memoranda, on the part of the King's Remembrancer, have the like Heads or Title. Of the Originals of the Chancery, which were wont to be repoſited in the Treaſurer's Remembrancer's Office, I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. In the Memoranda of the Exchequer, was entered great variety of Buſineſs: For Inſtance, the King's Writs and Precepts of many kinds, relating to the Revenue, Tenures, &c. Commiſſions of Bailywicks, Cuſtodies, Ferms, &c. Preſentations and Admiſſions of the Officers of the Exchequer, and other Officers; Pleadings and Allegations of Parties; Judgments and Awards of the Juſticiary, the Treaſurer and Barons, and the King's Council; Recognitions of Debts, and Conventions of divers kinds; Accompts, Views of Accompts, with ſeveral Acts relating to Accomptants; Inquiſitions of Sheriffs, Eſcheators, &c. Advents of Sheriffs, Eſcheators and others, and in general, all thoſe things which were compriſed under the Term, Communia, or common Buſineſs. There were alſo Memorandums entred in theſe Rolls, pro Commodo Regis to controll Accompts, or to ſave the King's Rights; either by way of Memorandum pro Rege, or of Loquendum cum Rege, or cum Juſticiario, or cum Concilio Regis, &c. The Judgments and Awards of the chief Juſticiary, and of the Treaſurer and Barons, were commonly entered in the Rolls, in the Terms, Conſideratum eſt, or Concordatum eſt, per Juſticiarium, or per Theſaurarium et Barones; and ſometimes Proviſum eſt, and adjudicatum eſt. But other words were alſo ſometimes uſed, as Ordinarunt, præceperunt, &c. Theſe and the like Terms were alſo uſed in other Judicatures. In Glanvil it is ſaid, the Tenant, or Defendant, ſhould be diſcharged by Judgment of the Court, per Conſiderationem Curiæ. l. 2. c. 18. In the Buſineſs of the Exchequer (as to Pleas and Accompts) there was frequent uſe of Writs or Letters from the King to the Treaſurer and Barons, ſignifying to them his pleaſure, concerning Matters depending before them. Theſe paſſed under the great or the privy Seal. Sometimes Meſſages were brought by living Meſſengers. The moſt frequent of theſe Writs or Meſſages were: To do Juſtice or Right to Parties: To ſhew Favour to Parties: To give diſpatch to Parties. In proceſs of Time, this Correſpondence between the Palace and the judicial Courts, or the Practice of ſending Writs or other Meſſages to the Judges of the King's Courts, was in many Caſes, forbidden by Statute. But this Reſtriction was not till after the ſecond Period, or the Reign of Edward II. Thus much of the Buſineſs. I come now III, to the Accompts of the Exchequer. As the Sheriffs were the moſt conſiderable Accomptants to the Crown, the method of Accompts at the Exchequer will be beſt learnt from thoſe of the Sheriffs. The Accompt of a Sheriff was divided into certain formal Parts: The Proſer; the Viſus Compoti; the Summa, or making of the Sum. The Proſer was a Prepayment out of the Sheriff's Ferm, and Corpus Comitatus, and out of his Proficuum, and the Summonces. It was probably called Proſrum, a Proferendo. If this Proſer was not paid, the Accomptants were amerced, or otherwiſe puniſhed. The Viſus Compoti, or view of Accompt, was the Entrance or forepart of the Accompt, which ſtood de bene eſſe, whilſt the Sheriff was purifying or liquidating his Account, by producing his Warranta, or Vouchers, by Virtue whereof, he was to have an Allowance or Diſcharge of any Sums charged on him. After the View was made, he proceeded to the Summa, to make, or caſt his Sum, which was always at the end of his Accompt. Another way of conſidering the manner of a Sheriff's Accompt is, as it ſtands in the Great Roll. When he accompted as Firmarius, his Accompt conſiſted of ſeveral Parts, the Corpus Comitatus, the Remanens firmæ, after Terræ datæ; the Crementum, if any; the Proficuum or firma de proficuo, the Iſſues of Eſcheats and Purpreſtures, Fines, Oblatas, Amerciaments of divers ſorts, Eſcuages, Aids, Tallages, and caſual Profits; Ferms or Iſſues of Towns, Burghs, Gilds or Lands, which were within the Sheriff's Charge, and the like. The Corpus Comitatus conſiſted of ſeveral Manors and Lands, which being let or committed together to the Sheriff, made the Fund, out of which the annual Ferm to the Crown aroſe. Theſe Manors or Lands lay within the Sheriff's County. But, by ſome accident, certain Manors in Cornwal belonged to the Ferm of Devonſhire. Mag. Rot. 5 Hen. II. In time, the Kings charged the Corpus Comitatus, with certain payments of Alms and Liveries, called Eleemoſynæ, and Liberationes Conſtitutæ, and alſo granted away part of the Lands. Hence came the Diſtinction of the Terræ datæ. For when ſome of the Lands out of which the Sheriff's Ferm aroſe were granted away, it was fit he ſhould have Allowance for ſo much as the Terræ datæ bore in the Corpus Comitatus. The Sum to be anſwered for after that Deduction, was called Remanens Firmæ poſt Terras datas. The Lands thus granted away, were ſometimes ſaid to be miſſæ extra Comitatum. Beſides theſe, there was a third ſettled Payment, viz. the Tertius denarius, wont to be paid by the Sheriff out of the Corpus Comitatus, to the Earl of the County. There was alſo caſual Payments, ſuch as occaſional Proviſions or Diſburſements of various Sorts. There was a way of computing the Value of the ſeveral things that made up the Corpus Comitatus, viz. ſuch a Manor or Land, portat in corpore Comitatus, ſo much. When the Sheriff was not the Fermer, but Cuſtos of a County, he did not anſwer in this manner, but was a kind of a Proficuarius or Bailiff, and was to accompt for the Proficuum of his County, and to be diſcharged of the Fermer. In entring the Sheriff's Accompts in the Great Roll, by a Proviſion in the 54th of Hen. III. the Corpus Comitatus was written firſt, then the ſettled Alms and Liveries, and the Warrants for the Sheriff's Diſburſements, &c. But 22 Ed. I. it was ordered that the Corpus Comitatus ſhould not be written every Year afreſh in the Great Roll, but in a particular Roll by itſelf, and out of that Roll ſhould be read every Year to the Sheriff upon his Accompt. But that the Remanens Firmæ, after the Terræ datæ, ſhould be written in the Great Roll. The Sheriffs generally accounted from Michaelmaſs to Michaelmaſs. Edward I. ordained, that the Sheriffs ſhould be Eſcheaters in their reſpective Counties. If a Man held a Bailywick, and executed it by a Subſtitute, the immediate Bailee was to pay the Accompts of the Iſſues of the Bailywick. The ſtated Accounts were rendered regularly in courſe every Year. In general, Accomptants were obliged to come in perſon to render their Accompts. If they made an Attorney, it was uſually by the King's leave, and afterwards by warrant of the Treaſurer, Chancellor, or Barons, or one of them. Accompts were to be rendered at the Exchequer upon Oath. In ſome Records, mention is made of the Accomptants anſwering per Fidem, or per verum dictum, which Madox imagined to be a voire dire, or a Declaration upon their Faith or Allegiance. Where one was indebted to the King and likewiſe to another Perſon, the King's Debt was to be preferred in Payment. If one was indebted to the Crown, ſuch Debtor could not make a Will to diſpoſe of his Chattels to the King's Prejudice; nor could his Executors have Adminiſtration of his Chattels, without permiſſion from the King, or the Juſticier, or Barons of the Exchequer, and if it was doubtful whether the deceaſed's Effects would ſatisfy the Debts due to the King, it was uſual for the King to ſeize into his Hands the Chattels of the Debtor. If the King's Debtor was unable to ſatisfy the King's Debt out of his own Chattels, the King would betake himſelf to any third Perſon who was indebted to the King's Debtor; and upon recovery of ſuch Debt, the third Perſon was acquitted againſt the King's Debtor. The Heir of the King's Debtor was not to be diſtreined for the King's Debt, in caſe the Chattels of the King's Debtor were ſufficient to anſwer it. The Widow of the King's Debtor was not to be diſtreined by her Dower, to anſwer the King's Debt, in caſe the Heir had ſufficient to anſwer it: Neither were Sureties to be diſtreined, ſo long as the principal Debtor had wherewithal to anſwer the Debt. By the antient uſage of the Exchequer, the King's Debtors, or Accomptants were wont to have Writs of Aid, to recover their Debts of ſuch Perſons as were indebted to them, in order to enable them to anſwer the Debts they owed to the King. When the Sheriff or other Officer having the Summonce of the Exchequer, had levied or received the Debt due from any Perſon to the King, he was to give the Debtor an Acquittance or Tally of Diſcharge; and afterwards acquit the Debtor of ſuch Debt at the Exchequer. In caſe of Diſtreſs, it was the Duty of the Sheriff to ſell it at a reaſonable Price; and to prevent Frauds, by an antient Statute, 27 Hen. III, certain Perſons were to be aſſigned to approve the ſame to the Sheriff. Sheriffs were to notify the Time of their accompting, to Bailiffs of Liberties, and other Perſons concerned. The King's Debtors found Sureties, if required. They were uſually called Plegii, Obſides, and Manucaptores. Sometimes the Pledges were remarkably numerous. Writs of the great and privy Seal were frequently uſed, both in reference to Accompts, and other Buſineſs at the Exchequer. Allowances or Diſcounts were uſually made per Warrantum, either by virtue of the King's Writ, or by Writ or Award of the chief Juſticier, or other Baron of the Treaſury. Hence aroſe the great number of Writs of Allocate and Computate. Attermination were given by the Treaſurer and Barons to the King's Debtors, by virtue of the King's Writs directed to them; and in like manner, Reſpites and Diſcharges. By Attermination, is meant, granting Men ſeveral Terms or Days for payment of their Debt, when they could not pay it at once. Sometimes Men were diſcharged by the chief Juſticiary, or by the Treaſurer and Barons, without any eſpecial Writ. Sometimes both Debts and Accompts were diſcharged by the King's Pardon. If upon the Account viewed or ſtated, the Crown was found indebted to the Accomptant, the Sum in which the Crown was ſo indebted, was called Superplus, or Superpluſage, probably, becauſe it was ſo much more, than the Accomptant's Receipts. If an Accomptant did not come to render his Accompts, or did not purſue the ſame in due manner, he was puniſhed by Diſtreſs, and ſeizure of Land, and by Amercement. If he did not anſwer the Debts or Sums wherewith he was charged, he was committed to the Marſhal, or Fleet-Priſon, or the Tower of London. If Accomptants departed from the Exchequer, before their Accompts were ſpeeded, they were, if Commoners, to be attached by their Bodies. Lords and others, who claimed to have Franchiſes within their Seigneury or Liberty, were to come yearly to the King's Exchequer, when the Sheriff of their County was paſſing his Accompt; and then they were to render an Account there of the Iſſue of their Franchiſe, and were allowed ſo much as they were rightfully intitled to by Charters from the Crown. But if the ſaid Lords and others failed to appear, &c. it was uſual for the King to ſeize their Franchiſe. The Accomptants at the time of paſſing their Accompts, did ſometimes ſit upon a Bench in the Court of Exchequer. As Money was ſometimes paid in, ſo Accompts were ſometimes rendered at the Camera Regis. Debts were put in charge many ways. By Virtue of the King's Writ: By the Writ or Teſtimony of the Juſticiary or Baron: By Judgment or Award of the Juſticiary, &c. in Court: By the Rolls, or Eſtreats of the Juſticiers: By the acknowledgment of the Parties: From the Original of the Chancery: And by other ways. The Chancery, in the moſt antient times, was uſually holden at the Exchequer: Or, many or moſt of the Chancery Writs were then diſpatched and ſealed at the Exchequer, where the Great Seal was commonly kept. When therefore the Chancery was ſeparated from the Exchequer, and the Charters, Writs, and Precepts of the Great Seal came to be entered by themſelves in the Rotuli Cancellariæ, (ſuch as Charter-Rolls, Patent-Rolls, &c.) at or about the beginning of King John's Reign: Then, as it ſeems, commenced the Method (which has been continued ever ſince) of ſending Eſtreats from the Chancery to the Exchequer. In fact, from the beginning of King John's Reign, they wrote every Year the ſaid Rotuli Cancellariæ, and afterwards made Eſtreats thereof; which Eſtreats were tranſmitted into the Exchequer, and were called Originale, or Originalia, and Extractæ Cancellariæ. They were written out of the Fine-Rolls, Patent-Rolls, and other Rolls of the Chancery. And out of them, Fines, Ferms, &c. were taken and put in charge at the Exchequer for the King's Profit. Eſtreats were alſo made of Fines, Amercements, and ſuch like, from the Court holden Coram Rege, or from the Common Bench, and from the Iters, &c. Theſe were called the foreign Eſtreats, and were ſent out in another Summonce, than that which was awarded for the Debts, contained in the Originals. If theſe Eſtreats were not brought in, in due time, a Writ was iſſued to the Perſons or Juſtices before whom they lay, to bring them in. Tallies were of great and conſtant uſe in the Exchequer, coeval with the Exchequer itſelf in England. The word is French, and ſignifies Cutting. Theſe Tallies were pieces of Wood, cut in a peculiar manner of Correſpondency. For example, a Stick, or Rod of Hazel, or other Wood, well ſeaſoned, was cut ſquare and uniform at each end, and in the Shaft. The Sum of Money which it bore was cut in Notches in the Wood, by the Cutter of the Tallies; and likewiſe written upon two Sides of it, by the Writer of the Tallies. The Tally was cleft in the middle by the Deputy-Chamberlains, with a Knife and Mallet, through the Shaft and the Notches; whereby it made two Halves, each Half having a Superſcription, and a Half-part of the Notch or Notches: A Notch of ſuch a largeneſs, ſignified M*l.* of another largeneſs C*l.* &c. It being thus divided, one part of it was called a Tally, the other a Counter-Tally, or a Tally, and a Foil, Folium. Sometimes the Parts were called Scacbia, and Contratallia. However, theſe were in effect one Tally, or two parts of one thing. And if they were genuine, they fitted ſo exactly, that they appeared evidently to be Parts the one of the other. Their Uſe was to prevent Fraud. Tallies had a Superſcripture, importing of what Nature they were, and for what Purpoſe given. Counters were ſometimes uſed at the Exchequer, in the way of Computation. In which Caſe, the Counters were laid in rows upon the ſeveral Diſtinctures of the chequered Cloth, viz. one row or place for Pounds, another for Shillings, &c. In the 17th of King John, ten Shillings of Venetian Money (valued at XV s.) and two Beſants (valued at III l. and VI d.) were uſed at the Exchequer for Counters. Mag. Rot. 17 John. Rot. 6.

I come now in the laſt Place to the Officers or Miniſters of the Exchequer. The principal Officers of the great or ſuperior Exchequer were: The two Remembrancers, the Ingroſſer of the great Roll, the Uſher, the Conſtable, the Marſhal, the Auditors, the Clerk of the Eſtreats. 1. There were antiently at the Exchequer two Remembrancers. They were ſometimes called Rememoratores Regis. In time one came to be called the King's, the other the Treaſurer's Remembrancer. And their Offices were diſtinct, as appears by diſtinct Bundles of Memoranda, which have been made up in their reſpective Offices, and remain there from very ancient time to this Day. In the 6th of Edward II. Adam de Limburgh one of the Remembrancers had XX l. yearly Stipend allowed by the Crown for executing his Office, and William de Everdon the other Remembrancer, XL Marks a Year for himſelf and Clerks. Lib. 6. Ed. II. 2. The Engroſſer of the Great Roll was a moſt antient and a conſiderable Officer in the Exchequer. Though the name of this Office does not occur in moſt antient Times next after the Conqueſt, yet it is doubtleſs as old as the Exchequer itſelf, that is, there was always ſome Perſon or Perſons employed to write the Great Rolls. In the 19th of Edward II. the Ingroſſer, and the Treaſurer's Remembrancers, were allowed two Clerks each, and were to receive an additional Salary for their Maintenance of twelve Marks yearly. Trin. Com. 19 Ed. II. 3. The Office of Uſher was a very antient and Hereditary Office. He had ſeveral that acted under him in the great Exchequer, in the Exchequer of the Jews, and in the commmon Bank. Many curious and uncommon Memoirs relating to this Office occur in Records. Vide Madox's Hiſt. Excheq. p. 718. It was the Uſher's Duty to keep the Exchequer ſafely, and to take care of the Doors and Avenues to it, ſo that the King's Records might be in ſafety. He likewiſe tranſmitted the Writs of Summonces, which iſſued out of the Exchequer for the King's Debts; that is, cauſed them to be delivered to their reſpective Sheriffs, to whom they were directed. This Office was held of the King in Capite, by Serjeanty. 4. The Conſtable of the Exchequer was deputy to the Conſtable of England, and was nominated by him. There can be little ſaid of his Duty, only he ſeems to have had in ſome Caſe, a concurrent or like Power with the Marſhal. In antient time there was alſo a Conſtable in the Court of Common Bench, who enrolled Eſſoigns, and did other Miniſterial Acts. 5. The Office of Marſhal of the Exchequer is very antient. He was appointed by the Marſhal of England. Whilſt an Account pended, he had the keeping of ſeveral ſorts of Writs and Vouchers produced by Debtors or Accomptants. Theſe he kept in Farules or Bins, or in Filets or Files, or in a Purſe or Bag. The Farulus Mareſcalli is often mentioned in the Exchequer Records. When an Accomptant, having been ſworn to Account, did not do it or made default at any day prefixed to him: or did not duly anſwer the Arrerages of his Account, he was commited in Cuſtody to the Marſhal, to remain Priſoner till the Court made a Receſs. The word Marſhal ſeems to have been ſometimes uſed with Latitude. The Perſons that were employed at the Exchequer, in arreſting Accomptants or other Delinquents, were ſometimes called by that Name. 6. In proceſs of Time, there were Officers at the Exchequer, called Auditores Compotorum Scaccarii. They ſeem to be firſt appointed in the Reign of Edward II. being then called clerici nuper deputati. The Accounts of ſome parts of the Revenue were before uſually audited, either by ſome of the Juſtices, or Barons, or by Clerks, or Perſons, aſſigned hac vice for that purpoſe, by the King, or the Treaſurer and Barons. 7. Little occurs within the time of the ſecond Period, concerning the Clerk of the Eſtreats and foreign Summonces. In the 18th of Edward II. all the Eſtreats which were in the Cuſtody of the Treaſurer's Remembrancer, were by command of the Treaſurer and Barons, delivered to John de Chiſenbale, Clerk of the Summonces. 8. There was alſo a Clericus Brevium de Scaccario. He belonged to the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Amongſt the Officers of the Exchequer, during the ſecond Period, may be reckoned the Chamberlains. In the firſt Period, the Chamberlains in Fee, who were great Officers in the King's Court, ſometimes ſat and acted in Perſon in the King's Exchequer, and are numbered amongſt the Barons there. But afterwards, the Chamberlains in Fee uſually deputed others to execute their Offices for them, both in the great Exchequer and at the Receipt. The Perſons to ſo deputed, were at firſt Knights. In ſuch caſe, the Chamberlain in Fee was to come regularly in Perſon, and preſent his Deputy to the Treaſurer and Barons: And thereupon the Deputy uſed to be ſworn and admitted. But ſometimes he preſented his Deputy by his Steward, or other Attorney; and ſometimes by Letters Patent directed to the Treaſurer and Barons. Sometimes alſo he preſented his Deputy to the King himſelf, and then upon the King's Writ ſuch Deputy was admitted. The Treaſurer and Chamberlains had under them certain Clerks, who during their Attendance on the King's Buſineſs, were at Livery or Allowance from the King. Theſe Clerks were uſually called, during the firſt Period, Clerici Theſaurarii et Cameratiorum, and Clerici de Theſauro or de Recepta, without diſtinguiſhing them from one another by particular names of Office. Hence hath ariſen ſome Obſcurity. The Clerici Theſaurarii ſeem to have been the Officers afterwards called, Clerk of the Pells, Writer of the Tallies, &c. and induced all the Officers of the Receipt, except thoſe whoſe Offices were Serjeanties, or related immediately to the Chamberlain's Office. In the upper Exchequer, there are but few Memorials concerning the Officers or Clerks of the Receipt. The Clerkſhip of the Pells is probably antient. There is in the Treaſury, at the Receipt of Exchequer, a Pell, or it may be, a Counter-pell of 9 Hen. III. In the 35th of Hen. III. the Pell Roll is called Magnus Rotulus de Recepta. In the 28th of Hen. III. Simon de Weſtminſter was choſen one of the Tellers of the Exchequer. At the Receipt of Exchequer were alſo ſome Serjeanties or Hereditary Officers; namely, a Peſor and Fuſor. The Office of Peſor, Ponderator, or Weigher, was the Serjeanty, which in the 4th of King John, was veſted in Thomas de Windeſore, and remained in that Family for ſome time afterwards. Another Serjeanty was the Fuſorie. By Fuſor we are to underſtand Melter. One William was Fuſor in the Reigns of King Henry II. and Richard I. Concerning the Uſher of the Receipt, nothing remarkable occurs within this Period. I ſhall conclude with a few Inſtances of the Allowance made to ſeveral Miniſters of the Receipt of Exchequer, for their Liveries and Corrodies, and other Neceſſaries. In 9 Hen. III. the Liveries of the Miniſters of the Exchequer for fourſcore Days, from the Feaſt of St. Michael, till Monday next after the Feaſt of St. Lucius were: To three Scribes c s. To the two Knights of the Chamberlains VIII Marks. To John de Windeſore IIII l. To John the Fuſor II Marks and a Half. To Simon Druel II Marks and a Half. To the four Tellers IIII l. To the Vigil, and for Light X s. For a Hutch to lay up the Memoranda VI d. For Rodds for the Tallier V s. For Parchment for the Uſe of the Chamberlains, and the chief Juſticier's Clerk IIII s. For Ink, during the whole Year, III s. For Litter for the Chamber of the Barons, and Houſe of Receipt XII d. For Neceſſaries for the ſaid Chambers XX d. For ten dozen of Hutches XX s. For Wax III s. For Leather for the Tallier IX d. For a Hutch to lay the Inquiſitions in II d. For the Marſhal's Hutch XII d. For a Sack to put the allowed Tallies in XIIII d. For carrying and re-carrying the Hutches V s. For a Tonell to put in the D Marks, ſent to the King at Oxford, by R. Biſhop of Chicheſter XII d. For Locks, Bolts, and other ſmall Expences IIIII s. Total, XXIIII l. XIII s. VIII d. Ex Pelle Receptæ de Anno 9 Hen. III. Rot. ult. indorſo, penes Theſ. et Camer.

Edward II's Coins (if ever he coined any Money, which Nicolſon ſays cannot be certainly affirmed) are in all reſpects like his Father's, and diſtinguiſhed from them only by Name, viz. EDWA. EDWAR. or EDWARD. ANGL. DMS. HYB. On the Reverſe, the Names of ſeveral Cities in England and Ireland, as CIVITAS LONDON. LINCOL. DUBLIN. WATERFORD, &c. The Title of Dominus Hyberniæ is never wanting on his Coin. Nicolſon obſerves, neither our Hiſtories nor Laws afford us any Light, as to this King's Money.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK X.

The Reigns of EDWARD III, and RICHARD II, Containing, the Space of Seventy Three Years: With a DISSERTATION on the Salick-Law, and the State of the Church from 1272 to 1399.

II. EDWARD III. Sirnamed of WINDSOR.

1327. THE deposing of Edward II procured not the English all the Happiness they were made to expect. If they saw themselves freed from the Troubles that disturbed the late Reign, it was only to fall into a no less incommodious State. The Government of a weak and imprudent King was not more dangerous than that of a minor Prince, under the Direction of a passionate Mother, and a young unexperienced Minister, more presumptuous and less able than the Spencers. Accordingly the People quickly found, that they had not gained much by the Change. Happily for them, Edward's Minority was of no long continuance. As soon as the young Prince had taken the Government upon himself, he converted the Misfortunes of the late Reign into Blessings, and the Injuries received from France and Scotland, into Glory and Triumphs. A remarkable Instance, which shews, that the prosperous Condition of a State depends less on its own Strength, than on the Prudence of him that sits at the Helm. This is what we are going to see in the present Reign, which is justly ranked amongst the most Illustrious of the English History.

Edward III. proclaimed and crowned. J. Barnes. Walsing. Froissart.

When the Commissioners sent to Kenelworth, were returned with Edward II's Resignation, the Prince his Son was again proclaimed, under the Name of Edward III, and crowned a few Days after (1). The Queen and Mortimer, whose Interest it was to make the whole Nation Accomplices of their violent Proceedings, affected on that occasion, to cause a Coronation-Medal to be struck, importing the universal Consent of the People to the present Revolution. On one Side was the young King crown'd, laying his Scepter on a heap of Hearts, with this Motto, POPULO DAT JURA VOLENTI. On the Reverse, a Hand held forth, as it were saving a Crown falling from on high, with these Words, NON RAPIT SED RECIPIT (2). 1327.

The Parliament names the Regents. Though Edward was but in his fifteenth Year (3), he had already a mature Judgment, and a Penetration uncommon to that Age. However, in compliance to the Laws of the Land, the King must have Governors, and the State Regents. The Parliament (4) chose twelve from among the Bishops, Earls, and Barons, of whom Henry of Lancaster was declared the Chief (5). The Queen opposed not this Nomination. But as she had the Power in her own hands, she seized the Government, and shared it only with her Creatures. Roger Mortimer, who had as great an Influence over her, as Spencer the Son had over the late King, executed the Office of Prime Minister, and managed the Affairs of the Kingdom according to his Pleasure. As the Parliament was at the Queen's devotion, she procured the Grant of a Dower,

But the Queen seizes the Government. Walsing. De la M.

(1) He began his Reign January 20. was crowned the 26th at Westminster, by Walter Archbishop of Canterbury; and on Candlemass-Day received the Order of Knighthood from the hands of the Earl of Lancaster. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. IV. p. 244. Walsing. p. 126.

(2) This is Joshua Barnes's Account in his Life of Edward III, who tells us he saw one of these Medals at a Friend's Chambers in Gray's Inn. But Bishop Nicolson thinks they were very widely mistaken that first ascribed these Medals to that Prince. For (as he says) there is nothing in the Legend that looks that way, and the inscribed Fancies are too bright for those Times, and savour of a much more polite Age. Hist. Lib. Part III. p. 250.

(3) He was but in his fourteenth, being born in Novemb. 1313. See above, p. 392. Note (1).

(4) Mentioned above, and which was still sitting at Westminster.

(5) There were five Bishops, two Earls, and five Barons: Their Names were, Walter Reginald Archbishop of Canterbury, William Melton Archbishop of York, John Stratford Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Cobham Bishop of Worcester, and Adam Orleton Bishop of Hereford; the Earls were, Thomas of Brotherton Earl-Marshal, and Edmund of Woodstock Earl of Kent; the Barons were, John Lord Warren, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Percy, Oliver Ingham, and John Lord Ross: Besides Henry Earl of Lancaster Lincoln Leicester and Derby, who was deputed to have the chief Care of the King's Person. Leland's Collect.

The Parliament annuls the Sentences paſſed in the late Reign. Act. Pub. IV. p. 245, 256, 257.

The Animoſity ſhewn by the Parliament in their Proceedings againſt Edward II, encouraged ſuch as were Sufferers whilſt the Spencers were in Power, to petition to be reſtored to their Eſtates and Honours. Their Petitions met with a favourable Reception. The Parliament, willing to juſtify their late Conduct, reverſed all the Judgments paſſed in the foregoing Reign, as well againſt the late Earl of Lancaſter (1) and his Adherents, as againſt thoſe that favoured the Deſigns of the Queen. It was pretended, they were contrary to Law, and manifeſtly extorted by the Credit of the Favourites. Perhaps this gave occaſion to ſome Hiſtorians to ſay, that Edward III was pleaſed to begin his Reign with a General Pardon. But if by this General Pardon be meant the reverſing the forementioned Judgments, the Honour of it is not to be aſcribed to the King. He not only did nothing of himſelf, but it is certain that herein the ſole Motive was to diſparage the late Government, and favour the Queen's Party. For the ſame purpoſe, the King was perſuaded earneſtly to ſollicit the Court of Rome for the Canonization of the Earl of Lancaſter, beheaded at Pontfract (2). He was made to ſay in his Letter to the Pope, that the Miracles wrought at his Tomb, were a clear Evidence, his Puniſhment was a real Martyrdom. In fine, all the Proceedings of the Queen and Parliament tended ſolely to juſtify what had been done with regard to the late King, which doubtleſs would have been deemed very criminal if it had not been crowned with Succeſs.

The King of Scotland breaks the Truce. Buchanan. Act. Pub. IV. p. 270, 281. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 15.

The Tranquillity England hoped to enjoy under the new King, who was in Peace or in Truce with all his Neighbours, was diſturbed by an Incurſion of the Scots on the Borders. Robert their King, though in an ill State of Health, and of a great Age, believed he ought not to ſuffer the Non-age of the King of England to paſs without reaping ſome advantage. He was afraid likewiſe that a too long repoſe might enervate his Subjects. In his Circumſtances, he thought it neceſſary to keep them in breath, well knowing they had to deal with formidable Enemies, who in making Truce with them, had not departed from their Pretenſions. Theſe are the moſt probable Reaſons of this Rupture, which Buchanan juſtifies only by ſaying, it is to be ſuppoſed that Robert was ſwayed by powerful Motives. Be this as it will, he put the Earl of Murray (3), and Sir James Douglaſs at the head of twenty thouſand Men, and ordered them to ravage the Borders of England (4). Edward could not hear the News of this Irruption, without an eager deſire of ſignalizing himſelf in the Defence of his Kingdom. Though they who governed in his Name had no great Inclination for War, they did not think it for their Intereſt to ſuffer ſuch an Inſult. Their Authority might have been ſhaken, if on this occaſion they had ſhewn any ſign of Weakneſs or Cowardice.

Edward raiſes an Army. Walſing. Knighton. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 18. Act. Pub. IV. p. 281, 287, 292. Echard.

The Opinion of the Council being agreeable to the King's Deſires, an Army of ſixty thouſand Men was raiſed, including the Troops brought by John de Hainault into England. The whole Army being come to York, Edward was juſt going to head them, when a ſudden Quarrel aroſe between the Engliſh and the Hainaulters, wherein many were ſlain. As the Engliſh were the Aggreſſors, Juſtice could not be done to the Foreigners, without diſpleaſing the Army. So the Court was forced to ſtay longer at York than was at firſt deſigned, in order to find means to compoſe this Difference, before they took the Field. This Delay gave the Scots time to paſs the Tine between Carliſle and Newcaſtle, and to ravage in a barbarous manner the Country on this ſide the River. They had four thouſand Men at Arms. The reſt of the Troops were mounted on little ſwift Horſes, in order the more eaſily to make Incurſions and retreat. This News haſtened the King's Departure. Though he did not know exactly where the Enemies were, he marched in queſt of them, guided only by the Fire and Smoak of the Houſes ſtill burning in the Road. What ſpeed ſoever he made, he could not poſſibly overtake them. As they had no Infantry, nor were encumbered with much Baggage, they made ſuch extraordinary Marches, that not only they were out of the Reach of the Engliſh Army, but even at ſuch a diſtance, that there was no tracing them. The Uncertainty of the Place where they were retired, cauſing the King to deſpair of meeting them, he called a Council of War. Some confuſed Advices making it thought, that the Scots had not yet repaſſed the Tine, it was reſolved to expect them beyond the River, near the Place where it was believed they would paſs in their return home. This Reſolve was put in execution. But the Engliſh Army had no ſooner paſſed the Tine, than they were forced to go back again, not finding North of the River wherewithal to ſubſiſt.

During the time ſpent in theſe Marches and Countermarches, Edward, having never received certain intelligence of the Enemy, was extremely uneaſy. As he knew not which way to go in ſearch of them, he ordered it to be proclaimed in the Army, that whoever ſhould bring him certain News of the Scots, ſhould be made a Knight, with a Penſion of a hundred Pounds Sterling. The Hopes of ſo good a Reward, ſet ſo many People to work, that it was not long before he had the deſired Information (5). But it was not without ſome Confuſion that he heard the Enemies, of whom he was ſo eagerly in queſt, were not above two Leagues off. He marched immediately towards them, in expectation of fighting that very Day. But he did not long enjoy the Pleaſure of that Expectation. The Scotch Generals, who were not ignorant of his Approach, had encamped over againſt Stanhope Park, on a Hill, at the foot of which runs the River Were, ſhallow indeed, but full of Rocks, which rendered the Paſſage very difficult. How deſirous ſoever Edward was of fighting, he was ſenſible, to his great Sorrow, that he could not attack them without expoſing his Army to manifeſt Danger. It was a ſad thing for a young Prince, greedy of Glory, to ſee the Enemies ſo near, without being able to give them Battle. He did not however quite deſpair of ſucceeding. As he judged of their Courage by his own, he ſent them word, if they would come over the River to him, he would retire at a convenient diſtance, and give them time to paſs, and chuſe what ground they ſhould think proper, or elſe on the ſame Terms he would come over to them. The Scotch Generals anſwered, That the Engliſh Army being three times ſtronger than theirs, it would be great Raſhneſs to accept the Propoſals: That they were bent upon keeping their Poſt, and it was the King's Buſineſs to diſlodge them, if he thought it for his Advantage to attempt it. However, as they were apprehenſive, that Edward, in amuſing them with his Offers, intended to paſs the River at ſome other Place, they retired in the Night, and encamped in a more advantagious Poſt than what they left. Beſides, that they had ſtill the Were in their Front, their Flanks were defended by inacceſſible Mountains and Bogs, which removed their Fear of being attacked, though the Engliſh had paſſed the River elſewhere. Edward having notice of their Motion, followed them, with the Were between him and the Enemy, and having found them poſted in that manner, made them the ſame Offer as before, to which they returned the ſame Anſwer.

Edward overtakes them, but could not fight.

J. Barnes's Hiſtory of Edward III. Walſing.

Whilſt the two Armies lay in ſight without being able to engage, the Lord Douglaſs, one of the Scotch Generals, paſſed the River at ſome diſtance from the two Camps, with only two hundred Horſe. With this little Troop, he ſtole into the Engliſh Camp, and penetrated even to the Royal Tent, where he gave a terrible Alarm. Probably, his Deſign was to carry off the King; but not ſucceeding, he retired without much loſs. At length, after both Armies had kept their Poſts a fortnight, the Scots decamped in the Night, and by ſpeedy Marches, which prevented the Engliſh from purſuing them, retired into their own Country. They were now ſo far off, when Edward was told of their Retreat, that he did not think fit to follow them. Several aſcribed then to Mortimer the ill Succeſs of this Campaign, and ſuſpected him of holding Intelligence with the Enemy, to facilitate their retreat without fighting. Edward having nothing more to fear from the Scots, returned to York, extremely mortified at not being able to revenge himſelf. Upon his Arrival at that City, he disbanded his Army, and after magnificent Preſents, ſent back John de Hainault to his own Country (6).

1327. Queen, intreating her to render his Impriſonment more eaſy; but nothing was capable of moving that inexorable Princeſs, in favour of a Husband, whom ſhe herſelf had reduced to that wretched Condition without his deſerving, at leaſt from her hands, ſuch barbarous Uſage. If ſhe had dared to follow her Inclinations, ſhe would have left his Letters unanſwered. But as it was her Intereſt to deceive the Publick by this Correſpondence, ſhe Walſing. was very glad to continue it. She ſent him now and then ſome Linen, and Cloaths, and other little Preſents, to perſuade the credulous People, ſhe ſacrificed her Tenderneſs to the Good of the State. It was not ſo eaſy to deceive Edward himſelf, ſeeing he could not but be convinced, that ſhe was the ſole Cauſe of his Misfor- De la M. tunes. Accordingly, ſhe never had the Face to appear in his Sight. She would not ſo much as permit the King her Son to pay his Duty to his unhappy Father; for fear he ſhould learn what ſhe deſired he might be ignorant of as long as he lived. So, though the impriſoned King ardently wiſhed to ſee them both, and frequently asked why they were ſo unkind as to deny him that Comfort, he could never obtain it.

Mean time, the rigorous Uſage of that unfortunate Prince, began to excite Compaſſion in the Breaſts of De la M. the Engliſh, who are naturally generous. Henry of Lan- Knighton. caſter himſelf, who had the cuſtody of him, relented daily to ſuch a degree, that he gave him ſome ſmall hopes of recovering his Liberty. Another Motive, beſides that of Generoſity, influenced the Earl; and that was, the irregular Conduct of the Queen, and the great Credit of Mortimer, whoſe Arrogance rendered him odious to all. As he took no care to hide his Sentiments, the Queen and Mortimer ſuſpected him of a Deſign to reſtore the old King. The Suſpicion, whether well or ill grounded, produced a fatal Effect, by determining them to prevent the imagined Danger. To that end, they reſolved to take the captive King out of the hands of his Keeper, whom they ſuſpected, and entruſt him with ſuch as they could depend upon (1). Walſing. Sir John Maltravers, and Sir Thomas Gurney, both of ſo brutiſh a Temper, as was requiſite for the Deſigns of thoſe that employed them, had orders to remove Edward from Kenelworth to Berkley Caſtle. It was hardly poſſible for the unfortunate Prince to fall into worſe Hands. At firſt they carried him to Corfe, then to Briſtol (2), and afterwards to Berkley (3) Caſtle, which De la M. was to be his laſt Priſon. In the Journey, they made him ſuffer a thouſand Indignities, even to the cauſing him to be ſhaved in the open Field with cold Water taken from a ſtinking Ditch (4). What Firmneſs ſoever he had hitherto ſhewn, he could not, on this occaſion, help lamenting his Misfortune, and diſcovering his Grief. Amidſt his Complaints and Reproaches againſt thoſe who uſed him ſo barbarouſly, he told them, that in ſpite of them, he would be ſhaved with warm Water; and at the ſame time he ſhed a Torrent of Tears. His Enemies hoped, the Vexation and Fatigue he was made to endure, would put an end to his Days. But though they were ſerved with a barbarous Zeal by theſe mercileſs Guards, who, for that purpoſe, uſed the moſt cruel, as well as inſolent means, yet the Goodneſs of his Conſtitution prevented them from ſucceeding. Theſe Wretches, finding their Cruelties had not ſo ſpeedy an Effect, ſent for freſh Inſtructions, for which they were not made to wait long. They received preciſe Orders to put that Prince to death, who, though overwhelmed De la M. with Miſery, cauſed continual Fears in the Authors of his Calamity. It is ſaid that Adam Orleton, Biſhop of Hereford, one of the Queen's Miniſters, ſent with theſe Orders a Latin Letter, wherein by a ſhameful Equivocation, he adviſed them at the ſame time to murder Edward, and exhorted them to refrain from ſuch a Crime. And indeed, the words aſcribed to him, are capable of both theſe Senſes, according to the difference of the Pointing (5). Theſe Orders were no ſooner come, but the two Keepers, knowing what they were to do, entered Edward's Room to put them in execution. He being Ibid. then in his Bed, they laid a Pillow on his Face, to pre- Walſing. vent his being heard; and then, with a Cruelty not to be Knighton. parallelled, thruſt a horn Pipe up his Body, through which they ran a red-hot Iron, and burnt his Bowels. In this horrible manner did that miſerable Prince expire (6), amidſt ſuch violent Pains, that in ſpite of the Precaution of his Murderers, his Cries were heard at a diſtance. To conceal this execrable Deed, the two Executioners De la M. ſent for ſome of the Inhabitants of Briſtol and Gloceſter; Walſing. who examining the Body, and finding no ſigns of a violent Death, concluded, he died a natural Death. This account, which was carefully atteſted by Witneſſes, was immediately diſperſed over the whole Kingdom, that it might be known unto all.

The Misfortunes of this Prince, whom his Enemies ſo cruelly perſecuted, began to raiſe the Pity of the Engliſh, after ceaſing to be formidable to them. But this Pity was unactive, whereas their hatred never ſuffered them to reſt till they had entirely ruined him. Indeed it would be difficult to juſtify his whole Conduct, but they cannot be charged with being prejudiced in his favour, who aſſure us, his Faults were diſproportionate to his Puniſhment. He was a Sufferer himſelf for not having the Reſolution to puniſh his Favorites. An important Leſſon for all Princes, but which few are ſo wiſe as to learn. The Compaſſion for his Sufferings, which could not always be concealed, roſe to that height, that after his Death he was reverenced as a Saint; ſo eaſily do the People run from one Extreme to another. His Body was immediately Act. Pub. buried without any funeral Pomp, in the Abbey Church IV. p. 337. at Gloceſter. However, ſome time after, the King his De la M. Son ordered a ſtately Tomb to be erected for him in that Church. So far were his Murderers from receiving for their Parricide the reward they expected, that they were forced to fly beyond Sea to avoid Puniſhment. The very Perſons that employed them, affected to cauſe diligent ſearch to be made after them, to cover the ſhare they had in the Crime. Three years after, Gurney was ſeized at Gurney Burgos, and by order of the King of Caſtile carried to taken and Bayonne, from whence Edward commanded him to be con- beheaded. veyed to England. But by ſome practices, not fully cleared De la M. in Hiſtory, he was beheaded at Sea (7). Maltravers ſpent Walſing. his Days in Exile, in ſome place in Germany where he had retired. But divine Vengeance ſtopped not at the Puniſhment of theſe two Villains. The Queen, Mortimer, and their Accomplices felt likewiſe its Effects. Perhaps too we are to conſider as Conſequences of the ſame Vengeance, the violent or untimely Deaths of almoſt all the Deſcendants of Edward III, as well as the Civil Wars wherewith England was afflicted, in the Reigns of that Prince's Poſterity, as will be ſeen hereafter (8).

1328. I ſhall ſpeak of this affair in another place. The Second was the Peace with Scotland propoſed by King Robert. Queen Iſabella and Mortimer, who held the Reins of the Government, believing a War was againſt their Intereſts, were very eager for a Peace. On the other hand, the King of Scotland perceiving he was no longer able to bear the hardſhips of War, deſired to ſpend the reſidue of his days in Peace. Beſides, as his Infirmities warned him of his approaching Death, he was very glad to prevent, by a Peace with the Engliſh, the Accidents which a War might cauſe, during the Non-age of his Son David who was but ſeven Years old. The Parliament being entirely in the Queen's Intereſt, it was not difficult to obtain their Conſent, to enter upon a Treaty, which both Parties were equally deſirous of concluding. The Queen-Mother, and Mortimer in behalf of the Engliſh, and Douglas in the Name of the King of Scotland, were the Managers of this Affair. A Peace was quickly made and confirmed by the Marriage of David, Prince of Scotland, with Joanna (1) Siſter of Edward, though they were both Children.

Peace between England and Scotland. Walſing. Buchanan. Act. Pub. IV. p. 354.

The Engliſh, for the moſt part, were very uneaſy to ſee a Treaty begun, which in all appearance could bring them no Advantage. However, their Uneaſineſs would have been removed, by the hopes of the Repoſe it was to procure them, if, to haſten the Concluſion, Iſabella and Mortimer had not given up to the King of Scotland ſuch Advantages, as he could not have expected, even after the gaining of many Battles. By their Advice, Edward renounced all his Pretenſions to Scotland, both with regard to the Sovereignty and the Propriety (2). At the ſame time he reſtored to Robert, all the Charters and Inſtruments which might prove the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over that Kingdom. Among theſe Inſtruments, was the famous Act, called Ragman's Roll, ſigned by John Baliol, and all the Barons of Scotland; wherein were contained the Rights of the Crown of England. This was followed by the Reſtitution of the Crown, Scepter, Jewels (3), which Edward I, had carried away from Edinborough, and of every thing in general which might any way teſtify the Sovereignty of England over Scotland. Had all this been done from a Motive of Juſtice and Equity, to repair, in ſome meaſure, the Injuries done by Edward I, to the Scots; far from being thought ſtrange, ſuch a Chriſtian Conduct ſhould have been highly commended. But as People were fully convinced, that the Queen and Mortimer acted not from ſuch a Motive, and beſides were prepoſſeſſed in favour of the Sovereignty eſtabliſhed by Edward I, every one was extremely diſpleaſed with this Reſtitution. They ſaid, "This "was dearly purchaſing a Peace, neither honorable nor "neceſſary; that by this ſhameful Treaty, all the Mo-"ney expended, and all the Blood ſpilt, in the Con-"queſt of Scotland, were rendered entirely fruitleſs: That "the Queen, who under colour of the King her Huſ-"band's Incapacity, had diveſted him of his Authority, "plainly diſcovered, how unable ſhe was herſelf to go-"vern the State; and that the Faults committed by Ed-"ward II, during his whole Reign, were nothing in "compariſon of what ſhe had done the very firſt Year "of her Adminiſtration." Notwithſtanding all theſe murmurs, the Queen and Mortimer had Credit enough with the Parliament (4), to cauſe the Peace to be confirmed, and the Sum of thirty thouſand Marks, which Robert promiſed to pay within three Years, to be conſidered as a ſufficient Compenſation for whatever was reſtored to Scotland. Thus it frequently happens, that the very Perſons who pretend to reform the Government by extraordinary Methods, ſhew afterwards, that they had nothing leſs in view than the publick Good, which ſerved them for a Pretence.

Nuptials of the Princeſs Joanna. Walſing. Knighton.

In conſequence of the Treaty, the Nuptials of Joanna the King's Siſter was ſolemnized at Berwick (5). Shortly after Mortimer, as a Reward for his late pretended Service to his Maſter, was made Earl of March in full Parliament (6). John of Eltham, the King's Brother, was created Earl of Cornwal, and James Butler, Earl of Ormond.

1328. Henry of Lancaſter, and ſome other Lords (7), came not to this Parliament. They were diſſatisfied that the Queen-Mother and Mortimer uſurped all Authority, contrary to the Intent of the Parliament, that nominated twelve Barons to manage the publick Affairs. The tragical Death of Edward II, and the late Treaty with Scotland, furniſhing them with a plauſible pretence to complain, they had now begun to hold private Conferences, and project a Reformation of the Government. As Secrecy was very difficult, in a Confederacy where they deſigned to engage a great many Perſons, the Queen and Mortimer had ſoon notice of it. The Earl of Lancaſter, whom they conſidered as Author of the Plot, and Head of the Male-contents, was the firſt Victim they reſolved to ſacrifice to their Safety. An Accident that happened ſhortly after, afforded them an opportunity, which they believed they ought to embrace, to accompliſh their Deſign. The Earl had a private Quarrel with the Lord Holland (8), whom he looked upon as a mortal Enemy to his Family, and one of the principal Authors of the Death of Earl Thomas his Brother. Some Threats he let fall againſt his Enemy, induced Sir Thomas Wythers, one of his Domeſticks, to revenge his Maſter. An opportunity offering preſently after the breaking up of the Parliament, Wythers killed the Lord Holland, and took Refuge in the Earl's Palace at Lancaſter, from whence repeated Orders from Court were not able to force him. The Queen and the Earl of March were not ſorry, their Enemy gave them ſo plauſible a pretence to exaſperate the King againſt him. They repreſented to the young Prince, of what Importance it was, not to ſuffer a Subject, of what Quality ſoever, to take upon him to protect Criminals, and ſtop the Courſe of Juſtice: That it was acting the Sovereign, and there was danger, that thoſe who aſſumed ſuch a Power, intended to enlarge it at the expence of the Royal Authority, and were contriving to diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom. By theſe provoking Diſcourſes, they perſuaded the young King to reſolve to chaſtiſe this Diſobedience.

1328. They maliciously insinuated, that his two Uncles, and Henry of Lancaster Grandson of Henry III, had formed the Project of excluding the Issue of Edward II from the Throne, of which that Prince was declared unworthy; as if the Faults of the Father were to reflect on the Children. The young King, who had no suspicion of the Queen his Mother, giving ear to this Accusation, resolved by force of Arms to bring Persons to their Duty, whom he now considered as Rebels. He even began his Preparations, to execute this Design. In all likelihood, this Affair would have been attended with fatal Consequences, if the Archbishop of Canterbury (1) had not zealously interposed, to stop the course of these Commotions. The Archbishop artfully hinted to the Queen, that the Manifesto of the Male-contents was so plausible, and such the Grievances complained of, that it was to be feared the whole Nation would join with them. The Queen readily apprehended the Archbishop's Hints, and believing the Attempt to reduce them by force, would be as dangerous for her, as the Male-contents, she was prevailed with to end the Affair by an Agreement, to which the Male-contents were not very averse. As their Party was not yet strong enough to carry things to the Point they desired, their Intent in publishing the Manifesto, was only to convince the Queen of her great danger, in endeavouring to crush them. So, without insisting any further on their Grievances, they accepted the Pardon procured them by the Archbishop, for certain Fines, and the Banishment of Beaumont, Trussel, and the Murderer of the Lord Holland, who were excepted in the Pardon (2). On this occasion the Earl of March pretended to be a Friend to the Princes, but harboured in his Breast a lively Resentment against them, to which the Earl of Kent fell a Sacrifice (3).

1329. Robert, the brave King of Scotland, enjoyed not long his late glorious Peace with England. He died (4) sedate and easy, with the Comfort of having freed Scotland from the Dominion of the English, and of seeing his own Family settled in the Throne. The Scots very justly rank him among their most illustrious Kings, as the Restorer of their Monarchy. This Prince, on his Death-bed, recommended three things, especially to the Persons he had appointed Regents, during the Minority of his Son David, then but eight Years old. The first, never to hazard a Battle in the Kingdom. The second, to make no long Truces with the English, in case the two Nations should come to a Rupture. The third, to have always an Eye upon what passed in England, for fear of being surprized unprepared.

The Earl of March, still supported by the Queen-Mother, saw himself raised so high, that he acted more like a Sovereign than a Minister. He disposed of all the Offices, as well as of the publick Revenues, with an Authority, joined to an Arrogance very common to Favorites, and which contributes no less than their Advancement to render them odious. The extraordinary Credit of this Earl roused the Jealousy of the English, who were the same, since the deposing of Edward II; and who had no greater Esteem for this new Favorite, than they had formerly for Gaveston and Spencer. Among those who discovered their Sentiments the most freely, Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle, was the principal. This Prince, as well as Edward II his Brother, had no great Genius for publick Affairs, but was naturally sincere and generous. He had, however, suffered himself to be deceived by the Artifices of Isabella, when he joined with her against his own Brother, never imagining she would have carried things so far. When once he was engaged in that Party, the suddenness of the Revolution which happened immediately after, would not permit him to recede. The Government was changed before he had time to reflect on the Consequences of the Queen's Undertaking. The disorderly Behaviour of that Princess, the Arrogance of the Favorite, the sudden Death of the King, and the ill Management of the publick Affairs, at length opened his Eyes. He perceived with Grief the Injustice of the Plot he had unhappily engaged in. A generous Man cannot, without pain, conceal his Sentiments. The Earl, little versed in Politicks, was not careful enough to hide his Uneasiness at past Transactions, and at what he saw every day. He had joined with Henry of Lancaster during the late Commotions, thereby shewing, it was not his fault that the present Scene of Affairs was not altered. This was sufficient to induce Isabella and the Earl of March to hasten his Ruin, for fear of being prevented. To that end, they laid for him the most extraordinary Snare imaginable, in which it is amazing he should suffer himself to be taken. As his Conduct was unblameable, it was necessary, in order to destroy him, so to manage it, that he should render himself criminal, that his Ruin might be thought the less strange. For that purpose, his two Adversaries, by some who feigned to be his Friends, insinuated to him, that Edward II, his Brother, was still alive, and reported to be dead, only to prevent the Troubles his Friends might excite: That he was strictly guarded in Corfe Castle, and suffered to be seen by none but his Domesticks, who were confined with him. This pretended Secret was supported with divers Circumstances, and confirmed by the Testimony of several Persons of Distinction; among whom were two Bishops who were deceived as well as Edmund, or helped to deceive him. He had himself assisted at the Funeral of the King his Brother. But what he had now heard, joined to a like Report, spread at the Court by the Artifice of his Enemies, and to his Desire that the thing might be true, easily induced him to believe, he might possibly have been deceived by counterfeit Obsequies. In this belief, he resolved to try all ways to free the pretended Prisoner from his Captivity. He was however in suspence on account of his Oath to the King his Nephew; but was quickly eased of that Scruple. It is said, that being commissioned to go to the Pope, and demand the Canonization of the late Earl of Leicester, he took that opportunity to consult John XXII upon this Affair. It is added, but how truly I know not, that the Pope not only approved of his Project, but charged him to put it in execution, under pain of Excommunication. When Edmund found himself supported by such an Authority, all his Scruples vanished. So, without further Consideration, he departed from Avignon, bent upon using all his Endeavours to free the King his Brother, whom he imagined to be still in Prison. However, as this Belief was grounded only upon Report, the certainty whereof was not well averr'd, he sent a trusty Friar to Corfe, to be assured of the Truth. The Contrivers of the Plot had taken care to have it whispered about in the Country, that Edward was still a Prisoner. So, the Monk upon his coming into those parts for private Information, found the Inhabitants of the Neighbourhood believed it. Prepossessed by these false Rumours, the Frier, pretending Business with the Governor of Corfe, asked him, whether there was really any Foundation for what was reported of Edward? The Governor, who had received his Instructions, returned such an Answer, as confirmed him in his Opinion. It is even said, that he shewed him, at a little distance, a Person sitting at a Table, who was served with great Respect; and by that means entirely convinced him, that he was not deceived. Edmund being confirmed in his Belief by the Frier's Report came himself to Corfe, and without shewing the least doubt, demanded to be conducted to his Brother's Apartment. The treacherous Governor pretending to be surprized at his knowing the Secret, did not deny that Edward was in the Castle; but told him, he had positive Orders to let no Person see him. This Confession made Edmund repeat his Instances, but finding the Governor inflexible, he gave him a Letter for the Prisoner, wherein he assured him, he would do his utmost to procure his Liberty. This Letter was immediately carried to the Queen, who shewed it to the King her Son, magnifying his danger from his Uncle's Practices. It was not difficult for her to obtain the King's Leave to secure the Prince's Person. He was very far from suspecting his Mother to be herself the Author of this Plot. As soon as the King had given his Consent to what was proposed, measures were taken to apprehend Edmund at Winchester, where the Parliament was assembled. His Impeachment being brought before the Peers, his own Letter was produced, which he could not disown: Nay, he confessed that several Lords, and particularly the Archbishop of York, and Bishop of London, were concerned in the Plot, or at least had advised him to hasten the Execution (5). Upon this Confession, which shewed a settled Design to change the Government

Also, that Sir Ingram Barenger brought him a Message from William Lord Zouche, desiring he would assist in his Restoration. Likewise, that Sir Robert Taunton came to him from the Archbishop of York, to encourage him, by assuring him that he had in readiness five thousand Men to carry on the Work. Also, that Sir Fulk Fitz-Warin told him, it would be the greatest Honour that ever could happen to him, in case he appeared in the Attempt; promising 1329. vernment, he was condemned to loſe his Head (1). The Execution ſoon followed the Sentence. All that day the King was ſo beſet by the Queen his Mother, and the Earl of March, that none could approach him to ſue for the Pardon of a Prince ſo nearly related to him. It is even affirmed, that he knew nothing of the Sentence paſſed upon his Uncle, or of his Execution till it was too late. Be this as it will, Edmund was brought upon the Scaffold, to ſuffer the Puniſhment to which he was condemned. But the Executioner ſtealing away, he ſtayed from Noon till Evening, before any could be found to perform his Office. At laſt, towards Night, one out of the Marſhalſea ſevered his Head from his Body (2). Thus died that Prince, in the 28th Year of his Age (3). He left two Sons, who died young; and two Daughters, the youngeſt of whom was the greateſt Beauty of her time. Her ſecond Husband was the famous Prince of Wales, her Couſin, eldeſt Son of Edward III. Edmund was the only Perſon proſecuted for the imaginary Crime for which he ſuffered Death; tho' according to his Depoſitions, ſeveral others ought to have undergone the ſame Puniſhment. But the Authors of the Plot wanted no other Sacrifice. Beſides, they took care not to examine matters too ſtrictly, for fear of giving occaſion to diſcover, what it was their Intereſt to conceal. It is even very probable, that ſeveral of thoſe impeached by Edmund were Betrayers, employed by his Enemies to hurry him into Deſtruction.

Before I proceed, it will be neceſſary to ſpeak of Edward's Affairs with France during his Minority. Not only the Order of time requires it, but it is very proper to clear beforehand, the Origin of an Affair which is to be the principal Subject of this Prince's Majority. To that end, I muſt reſume the Account of the Diſputes between the two Crowns, where I left off in the Reign of Edward II.

Affairs of Edward with France.

The laſt Treaty made at Paris, by the Mediation of Iſabella, did not fully end all the Differences between Edward II, and Charles the Fair. The Queen, who had only in view the Project formed againſt the King her Husband, did not think it her Intereſt to diſcuſs all the Articles included in theſe Diſputes. She was too apprehenſive of raiſing ſome Obſtacle to her principal Deſign. On the other hand, King Charles, who was in poſſeſſion of Agenois, did not think proper to urge, himſelf, any farther diſcuſſion of matters. So the Sentence paſſed at Paris, in the Buſineſs of St. Sardos, which condemned the Gaſcon Lords to Baniſhment, and decreed the demoliſhing of their Caſtles, was ſtill in force: But the Treaty concluded by the Queen, preſerved Edward's Pretenſions entire, and left him free to proſecute his Right in the Court of Peers. The Reſignation of Guienne, occaſioned freſh Difficulties. Edward II pretended, that Charles in receiving the Homage of the Prince his Nephew, obliged himſelf to reſtore that whole Province; which the King of France denied.

Edward III, was no ſooner on the Throne, but by Advice of his Parliament, he ſent (4) Ambaſſadors to France, to make an agreement between the two Crowns. Shortly after a new Treaty was concluded (5), containing theſe ſix Articles.

New Treaty made at Paris. Act. Pub. IV. p. 279.

I. That both ſides ſhould reſtore whatever was conquered during the War.

II. That Edward ſhould pay the King of France fifty thouſand Marks Sterling, to ſatisfy him for his Charges on occaſion of the Rupture.

III. That a general Pardon ſhould be granted by both Parties.

IV. That the King of France ſhould pardon the Felony of the Gaſcon Lords, as to Life and Limbs, on condition they ſubmitted to Baniſhment.

V. That Edward ſhould undertake to demoliſh their Caſtles.

VI. That this Treaty ſhould be of no effect, unleſs ratified by the King of England before Eaſter (6).

The Court of England was too deſirous of Peace, to neglect the Performance of the laſt Article. So there was a good intelligence between the two Crowns, during the reſt of that Year; both Kings taking care to avoid all Occaſions of a freſh Rupture. 1329.

Death of Charles the Fair.

Hardly was this Affair ended, when a new and more important occaſion of quarrel engaged the two Kingdoms in a War, which cauſed Torrents of Blood to be ſpilt, and brought France in the end to the very brink of Deſtruction. Charles the Fair dying on the firſt of February 1328. without Male-Iſſue, and leaving Joanna his Queen big with Child, there aroſe a great Diſpute concerning the Regency of the Kingdom, during the Queen's Pregnancy. Edward (7) laid claim to it, as Nephew and neareſt Relation of the deceaſed King: But Philip Son of Charles de Valois, and Couſin-German of the ſame King, maintained, he had an inconteſtable Right to the Regency. He founded his Claim upon the Salick-Law, which, in his Opinion, debarred the Females and their Deſcendants from the Succeſſion to the Crown; whence he inferred that neither had they any right to the Regency, in prejudice of the Male-Line. This Controverſy was decided in favour of Philip by the Peers of France, who adjudged him the Regency till the Queen was delivered. It was partly on this occaſion that Edward called the Parliament at Northampton, on account, as was ſaid, of the Peace with Scotland. He laid before them his Reaſons for claiming the Regency of France; the Injury he pretended was done him in the Preference of Philip de Valois; and the diſadvantagious Inference that might be drawn from his Excluſion, with reſpect to the Crown of France, in caſe the Child, the Queen was big with, ſhould not live, or be a Daughter. Hiſtorians do not poſitively ſay what the Parliament's Opinion was in this ſo nice an Affair. But as the Members were at the devotion of the Queen-Mother and the Earl of March, very probably they were no more ſcrupulous with reſpect to the Affairs of France, than they had been concerning thoſe of Scotland. There were much more plauſible Reaſons to diſſuade Edward from making War with France. The Difficulty of the Undertaking; the Strength of the Kingdom; the King's Age, were Objections not eaſily to be anſwered. Beſides, it might ſo happen, that the Preparations to ſupport the King's Claim, would be fruitleſs, if the Queen-Widow ſhould be delivered of a Son. In ſpite of theſe Reaſons, it was not poſſible to perſuade the young King, to relinquiſh a Right which he thought very juſtly belonged to him. However, as he was ſtill a Minor, he perceived it would be very difficult effectually to oppoſe the Advice of the Queen his Mother, his Council, and the Parliament. But if he tacitly deſiſted from his Pretenſions to a Regency which was about to expire, it was otherwiſe with regard to the Crown it ſelf, in caſe the Point in queſtion was not decided by the Birth of a Prince. This appears in ſeveral of his Letters to certain Lords of Guienne, dated the 28th of March, about a Month before Queen Joanna's Delivery. On ſuppoſition ſhe was brought to bed of a Daughter, he told theſe Lords, his Intent was to uſe all poſſible means to recover the Right and Inheritance of the Queen his Mother.

In April, Joanna was delivered of a Princeſs, whoſe Birth would from that moment have occaſioned a bloody War, if Edward had been in Condition to proſecute his Pretenſions. He demanded however the Crown of France by his Ambaſſadors (8): But Philip cauſing himſelf to be crowned, by vertue of the Judgment that gave him the Regency, the Engliſh Ambaſſadors were not ſo much as heard. I ſlightly paſs over theſe things, becauſe it will be neceſſary to ſpeak of them more largely hereafter. It ſuffices at preſent to know, that Edward not having it in his power to puſh this Affair, thought proper to let it lie dormant till a more favorable Opportunity. began

1329. began to take measures in order to war against him. His Act. Pub. IV. p. 368. Alliance about this time with the Duke of Brabant, and several Lords who engaged to supply him with Troops, is a clear Evidence he was meditating some grand Design, and his Letters to the Lords of Guienne shew it was against France. In these Letters, dated September 16. 1328, he positively said, his Intent was to recover his Mother's Inheritance. Now at that time, he had no Quarrel with France, wherein the Queen his Mother was particularly concerned. The Inheritance he mentioned, concerned therefore the whole Kingdom of France, since his Contests with Philip about Guienne had no Relation to Isabella's Right.

Philip summons Edward to do Homage. Froissart, l. 1. c. 25. Mezerai.

Philip de Valois being engaged, in the beginning of his Reign, in a War with the Flemings, was in no haste to demand Edward's Homage for Guienne and Ponthieu. It was not till April 1329, that he caused him to be summoned (1) to appear and do Homage in Person (2). In Edward's present Disposition, he would have gladly been excused from paying Homage to a Prince, whom he considered as an Usurper of his Right. But his Council reflecting on his Youth, and the State of the Kingdom full of Male-contents, could not think of approving a Refusal which probably would throw him into great difficulties. On the other hand, the Queen his Mother and the Earl of March did all that lay in their Power to prevent a Quarrel with Philip. They represented to him, that he would infallibly lose all his Dominions in France, if he unadvisedly discovered his Pretensions to that Kingdom, before he was ready to support them. But these Remonstrances would perhaps have had little weight with him, if for his satisfaction there had not been devised an Expedient, unbecoming indeed the Sincerity Kings ought to profess, but which his Youth and Passion permitted him not to examine too nicely. It was suggested to him, that by protesting beforehand against the Homage, it would be no Detriment to his Claim. Pursuant to this Advice, he made by a Procurator, the following Protestation before his Council:

Edward privately protests against the Homage.

"That for any Homage whatever to be made to the Lord "Philip de Valois, (now bearing himself King of France) "by King Edward of England, for the Dukedom of Gui- "enne, and Earldom of Ponthieu, he did not thereby in- "tend to renounce his Hereditary Right to the Realm of "France, or any ways derogate from the same; even "tho' Letters thereupon should be signed with either of his "Seals. And he did farther protest, that he would not "do any Homage to the Lord Philip, of his own free "will, but only for the just fear he had of losing the said "Duchy and Earldom, and because he was afraid that "he could not avoid other great Dangers and irreparable "Losses (3)." This Declaration was signed by the King and Council, but was not communicated to Philip's Envoy. He only receiv'd this general Answer, that the King would perform as soon as possible what he owed the Crown of France.

How great soever Edward's Unwillingness was to do this Homage, the Consequences whereof he so much dreaded, he resolved upon it, for fear of making known by his Refusal, a Design which it was not yet proper to discover. To make himself Amends, in some measure, for the mortifying Step he was forced to, he ordered a great Number of Lords to attend him, and with a very splendid Equipage, and a Retinue of a thousand Horse, came to Amiens, where Philip expected him. On the day appointed for doing his Homage (4), he appeared before the King of France, in a Robe of Crimson-Velvet, embroidered with Leopards of Gold, his Crown on his head, his Sword by his side, and gold Spurs on his heels. The King of France received him sitting on his Throne, his Crown on his head, his Sceptre in his hand, and a Robe of blue Velvet, powdered with Flower-de-Luces of Gold. By him were the Kings of Navarre and Majorca (5), all the Peers and principal Lords of France, whom he had expressly sent for, to be Witnesses of this authentick Homage. Before Edward's Arrival, Philip pretended this should be a liege Homage (6), as indeed it ought to have been. But in the Conferences held on this account, before the Ceremony, matters were otherwise settled. Edward protesting he was not perfectly informed of the manner of the Homage, offered to do it in general Terms. However, he promised upon his Honour, that if, upon consulting his Records, he found the Homage to be Full, he would give Letters-Patents of it, under his Great Seal. Upon that condition, Philip consented to receive the Homage in general Terms. This was really the manner wherein Edward did it, whatever some French Historians may have said to the contrary, who, doubtless, were misled by bad Memoirs. Edward's Historian says likewise, upon no better grounds, that the King of France was just going to order him to be seized, but that the Bishop of Lincoln gave his Master notice of it, who withdrew without taking Leave. This cannot be true, since Philip could not have taken this Resolution, but upon Edward's refusing to do full Homage, and yet it is certain he was very willing to receive it in general Terms: Nay, they had several Conferences together, after the Ceremony. Before they parted, it was agreed, that Edward should send Ambassadors to France, to finish what the late Treaty had left undecided (7).

1329. Act. Pub. IV. p. 334. Froissart, ibid. Serres. Barnes.

As Edward stood disposed with regard to the King of France, he was not very forward to send the promised Declaration. On the contrary, he tried to gain time, by Proposals of a double Marriage of his Brother and Sister with the Son and Daughter of Philip. He even kept at London almost a Year, on divers Pretences, Ambassadors sent to press him to perform his Promise. During that time, Edward was very urgent in his turn with the King of France, to end their Differences about Guienne, as was agreed at their late Interview. It was easy to see Edward sought only to delay. Accordingly Philip, who impatiently bore all these Delays, sent him word (8), that he would not be his Dupe. He dispatched into Guienne the Earl of Alenzon his Brother (9), who took and demolished the Castle of Xaintes, and plundered that Town. These Hostilities, which Edward did not expect, produced a new Treaty between the two Monarchs (10). Edward positively promised to send the Declaration of Homage, to pay the fifty thousand Marks Sterling owing to France, and sixty thousand Parisian Livres for the Assignment, made him by the King his Father, of Guienne. Moreover he promised to see the Castles demolished, belonging to the Gascon Lords condemned in the Reign of Charles the Fair. Shortly after the Conclusion of this Treaty (11), he sent the King of France Letters-Patents under his Great Seal, to confirm and specify the Homage he had done at Amiens. He expresly declared the Homage was to be deemed full; and that the Homages which he himself or Successors, Dukes of Guienne and Earls of Ponthieu, performed hereafter, should be done in the same manner, and with the same formalities, as the King of France had expected. In these Letters there was a Pattern how the Homage was to be performed. After he had sent this authentick Declaration, he took a Journey to France, under colour of performing a Vow (12). He saw Philip, and obtained of him an Abatement of thirty thousand Livres Tournois, for the Damage done to the Town and Castle of Xaintes, and an absolute Pardon for the condemned Gascon Lords. Let us leave a moment Edward's Affairs with France, to see what passed in England during these Negotiations. We shall soon have occasion to resume the Sequel of these Affairs, which are the principal Subject of this Reign.

It was ſoon after his Return from Amiens, that Edward began, as 'tis ſuppoſed, to be ſuſpicious of the Queen his Mother's Conduct (1). When it was perceived at Court, that the King grew weary of being under the Guardianſhip of his Mother and the Favourite, their Enemies failed not to do all that lay in their Power, to make him jealous of them. So many things deſerving his Attention were inſinuated to him, that he reſolved at length to have perfect Information of his Affairs. Thoſe to whom he applied, caus'd him to obſerve, "That the Earl of March affected "to out-ſhine his Sovereign, by a Magnificence too ſplen- "did for a Subject: That he diſpoſed of all the Offices of "the Kingdom to his Creatures: That he was abſolute "maſter of the Fortune of the Engliſh, caſting down ſome, "and raiſing others, according as they appeared for or againſt "his Intereſt: That by his private Orders Edward II, "was murdered: That the Earl of Kent loſt his Life by "his ſecret Practices: Finally, That very probably the "Queen and her Miniſter had formed the Deſign of ſecur- "ing the Royal Authority, by keeping him always a "Minor." Some add, that it was intimated to him, that the Queen his Mother was big with Child by Mortimer. What they ſay is not unlikely, ſince, according to the Teſtimony of Froiſſart, the Report of her being with Child was ſpread over the whole Kingdom. Theſe Informations entirely convinced the King, of what he had hitherto only ſuſpected. He called to mind the ſudden death of the King his Father; the Beheading of the Earl of Kent his Uncle; the diſhonorable Peace he was made to conclude with Scotland; the extravagant Dowry of the Queen his Mother, the Credit, Riches, and Pride of the Earl of March, and abhorring the Wickedneſs of thoſe who made the Publick Good a pretence to gratify their Paſſions, he reſolved to puniſh them. However, he carefully concealed his purpoſe, till an Opportunity offered of acting, without danger of ruining himſelf. To execute his Deſign, he choſe the time the Parliament was to meet at Nottingham (2). The Court being come to that Town, Queen Iſabella and the Earl of March lodged in the Caſtle, with a Guard of one hundred and eighty Knights (3), whilſt the King, with a ſmall Retinue, was lodged in the Town. In ſpite of theſe Precautions, which ſeemed to ſhew that the Queen and the Favorite were not without their Uneaſineſs, Edward, having gain'd the Governor (4), enter'd the Caſtle through a ſubterraneous Paſſage, and came into his Mother's Apartment, accompanied with Montacute, and ſome other Officers, all bent to loſe their Lives in his Service. There was at firſt ſome Noiſe made, and two Knights of the Guard were killed, who having leſs reſpect for the King than their Companions, offered to reſiſt. The Earl of March was apprehended, and notwithſtanding the Queen's Cries, and Intreaties to ſpare the gallant Mortimer (5), he was carried out the ſame way the King came in, and conducted under a ſtrong Guard to the Tower of London (6).

Act. Pub. IV. p. 452. Edward ſeizes Mortimer, and ſends him to the Tower.

This maſter-piece of Policy ſucceeding ſo well, the King diſſolved the Parliament, and ſummoned another (7). As the late Parliament had not regarded ſo much the Publick Good, as the Intereſts of the Queen and the Earl of March, the King bitterly complained, in his Summons, of the Members, and took occaſion to exhort the People, to chuſe Repreſentatives who had the Good of the State more at heart. The Parliament met at London, with Diſpoſitions very different from thoſe of the former. Moſt of the Members, overjoyed to ſee the Kingdom freed from the Tyranny of the Earl of March, aimed only at the Reformation of what was amiſs in the Government, and the Puniſhment of the Favourite, according to his Crimes; the common Fate of Favourites and Miniſters who abuſe their Power. How great ſoever they may be, they muſt expect to ſee themſelves abandoned by all whenever their Affairs begin to decline.

In his Speech to the Parliament, the King complained in general of the Queen and Mortimer. After which, he ſaid, that, with the Conſent of his Subjects, he deſigned to aſſume himſelf the Reins of the Government, tho' he was not yet arrived at the Age preſcribed by the Law. The Parliament gladly conſented; all the Members being equally ready to ſecond his Deſigns (8).

Edward being thus freed from his Governors, his firſt care was to ſeize the exorbitant Dower of the Queen his Mother, and reduce it to a Penſion of three thouſand Pounds a Year (9). At the ſame time ſhe was confined to her Houſe at Riſings (10), leſt by her Intrigues ſhe ſhould excite new Troubles. Mezerai was miſtaken, when he ſaid, that Edward haſtened his Mother's Death. It is certain, ſhe lived twenty-eight Years in her Confinement, where the King her Son viſited her once or twice every Year, more out of Decency than Affection.

The Ear March is condemned and executed. Knighton. Col. 2556. Walſing.

As for the Earl of March, he was treated with the utmoſt Rigour. His Impeachment, brought before the Parliament, contained divers Articles of which theſe were the principal: That he had ſeized the Government of the Kingdom without Authority, and contrary to the expreſs Regulation of the Parliament: That he had placed, about the King, Spies upon all his Actions, that he might not be able to free himſelf from the Subjection he was kept under: That he had procured the Death of Edward II by his expreſs Orders: That he had contrived a treacherous Plot to take away the Life of the late Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle: that he had appropriated to his own uſe, the twenty thouſand Marks paid by the King of Scotland: Laſtly, that he had lived in a too familiar manner with the Queen-Mother. For all theſe Crimes, which were affirmed to be notorious, and for proof whereof, no Evidences were ſo much as heard, he was condemned to die (11). His Sentence, which ran, that he ſhould, as a Traitor, be drawn and hanged on the common Gallows at Tyburn (12), was executed without the leaſt favor. There was This remarkable in his Sentence, that he was condemned without being heard, as he himſelf had ſerved the Spencers. But this irregularity proved advantagious to his Family. For Roger his Grandſon obtained afterwards an Act to reverſe this Sentence, as erroneous. We ſhall ſee in the Sequel of this Hiſtory, his Deſcendants by the Female-Line mount the Throne of England. The Article of his Impeachment concerning his Commerce with the Queen, is a clear Evidence, how much the whole Kingdom was offended at their Familiarity. If it had not been notorious, there is no likelihood that the Parliament would have wounded that Princeſs's Honour ſo deeply, which could not but reflect on the King her Son. They who have endeavoured to vindicate her, by the little probability, that a Princeſs of ſo high a Rank ſhould ſo far forget herſelf, did not conſider that a few Years before, the three Daughters-in-law of Philip the Fair were as regardleſs of their Reputation, by the Confeſſion of all the Hiſtorians (13).

1331. and became in his Time the moſt illuſtrious and moſt accompliſhed Prince, England had ever produced (1).

The King forms the Project of conquering Scotland.

After Edward had taken upon him the Adminiſtration of Affairs, People were impatient to ſee, which way the young Prince would turn. His Courage, his Abilities, and his active Spirit, made them believe he would not, like the King his Father, chuſe an indolent Life. It was much more likely he would imitate his Grandfather Edward I. France and Scotland were equally concerned to obſerve his firſt Proceedings. France might be apprehenſive, he would renew his Pretenſions to the Crown, obtained by Philip de Valois to his Prejudice. Scotland had no leſs reaſon to fear, he would break through the diſhonorable Treaty, wherein he was engaged by the Queen his Mother and Mortimer, during his Non-age. Though the King of Scotland was his Brother-in-law, it was known in thoſe Days, as well as at preſent, that the Bond of Affinity is not always a ſufficient Bar to the Ambition of Princes. And indeed, Edward had in view theſe two grand Deſigns. But it was not poſſible for him to engage at once in two ſo conſiderable Undertakings. He reſolved therefore to begin with Scotland, that he might, after ſubduing that Kingdom, attack France with the united Forces of the two Nations which divided Great Britain.

The Peace concluded two Years before with Robert Bruce, ſeemed to lay an inſuperable Obſtacle in his way. But ambitious Princes always find Pretences enough to gratify their Paſſions. Edward had one, which to him appeared juſt, or at leaſt ſufficient to authorize his Attempt upon Scotland; namely, that he was betrayed by his Mother and Miniſters in the late Treaty with Robert Bruce. But how ſpecious ſoever this Reaſon might ſeem to him, he did not think proper to uſe it, till he was almoſt ſure of the Succeſs of his Enterprize. To compaſs his ends, he made uſe of the Miniſtry of Edward Baliol, Son of that John Baliol, placed on the Throne of Scotland by Edward I, and afterwards depoſed as a Puniſhment for his pretended Rebellion. It was now thirty eight Years, ſince his Father was dethroned, after ſo long an Interval, the Son, who, ſince the Death of his Father, led an obſcure Life in France, little expected to ſee the King of England preſs him to proſecute his Right to the Crown of Scotland. This however, was by Edward's Order inſinuated to him by the Lord Beaumont, who ſince his Baniſhment reſided in France. Beaumont repreſented to him, that he had a fair Opportunity to mount the Throne of Scotland, uſurped by the Bruces: that David's Minority afforded him a Juncture which would not eaſily be met with again: In fine, that the King of England was inclined to ſecond his Endeavours. Baliol lent a ready Ear to ſo flattering a Propoſal, and to be certain himſelf, how far he might rely on the King, came into England (2), where he kept himſelf concealed. During that time, he treated with Edward, by the Mediation of Beaumont, concerning the Terms on which he was to engage in this Enterprize. Edward's Hiſtorian labours heartily to vindicate the King, in a Proceeding ſo contrary to Sincerity, and the late Treaty with Scotland. But they who are not concerned to defend his Reputation, will hardly deny, that, on this occaſion, Ambition was the ſole or real Motive of his Conduct. It is but too probable, that the Proſpect of an Acquiſition, like That of the Kingdom of Scotland, made him overlook his Scruples on that account. Of this I ſhall hereafter give more than probable Proofs.

Baliol prepares for his Expedition.

The two Parties came to an Agreement without much Difficulty. Baliol thought he could not purchaſe too dearly a Crown, to which he would never have dared to aſpire, without being aſſured of a powerful Aſſiſtance. On the other hand, Edward, who minded his own, more than the Concerns of Baliol, and intended to reap all the Benefit of this Enterprize, ſcrupled not to promiſe ſtill more than Baliol durſt have expected. The Articles of their Agreement were no ſooner ſettled, but the Engliſh Nobles were privately told, that in ſerving Baliol they would pleaſe the King. This was ſufficient to engage in his Party thoſe, who, having received Lands in Scotland by the Bounty of Edward I, had afterwards loſt them by the Revolutions in that Kingdom. Beſides this Aid, Baliol could alſo depend, in Scotland itſelf, upon the aſſiſtance of the old Friends of his Family, who found it their Intereſt to ſupport him. And indeed, the placing this Prince on the Throne, was the only way to recover the Offices and Poſts they were removed from, after Robert Bruce's Advancement. 1331.

Act. Pub. IV. p. 536.

Whilſt Baliol was making his Preparations, Edward pretended punctually to obſerve the Peace with Scotland, and iſſued upon that account ſeveral Orders, which were not well executed. He even publiſhed a Proclamation againſt ſuch as were engaged in the Service of Baliol. But this Step was taken when they were juſt going, and it was too late to prevent them. His ſole Aim was, to make the Publick believe, he was not concerned in an Undertaking, of which he indeed was the real Author.

Edward pretends to keep the Peace with Scotland. Act. Pub. IV. p. 529.

As ſoon as Baliol was ready, he embarked his little Army, conſiſting but of two thouſand five hundred Men, and landed at Kinghorn near Perth (3), from whence he ſent back his Ships. He was willing by that to ſhew his Troops, they had nothing to truſt to but their Valour. Mean while, his Preparations could not be ſo privately made, but the Scots had Intelligence thereof. Hardly were his Men landed, when he heard, that Alexander Seaton was coming to give him Battel, at the head of ten thouſand Men. All means of retreat being taken from the Engliſh, they had no hopes of Safety but in Victory. Accordingly, expecting their Enemies with a noble Reſolution, they fought with ſuch uncommon Bravery, that the Scotch General, with an Army much ſuperior, was ſhamefully and intirely routed (4). The Earl of Fife, who followed Seaton with a ſtill more numerous Army, willing to revenge this diſgrace, had no better ſucceſs. After theſe two Victories, Baliol advancing farther into the Country, met with another Body of Scotch Troops, whom he likewiſe defeated. Five days after, he fought Nigel Bruce, who came to attack him with ten thouſand Men. In this laſt Action he gave no quarter, becauſe he would not be incumbered with Priſoners. 1332.

Baliol lands in Scotland. Boeth. Buchanan. Knighton. Walſing. He gains four battles.

Four Battles loſt in ſo ſhort a Space, throwing the Scots into the uttermoſt Conſternation, Baliol had time to beſiege Perth, called alſo St. John's Town, of which he eaſily became maſter. He found there a great Quantity of warlike Stores and Proviſions, which he wanted extremely, in order to make farther Progreſs. His Affairs obliging him to remove from Perth, Patrick Dunbar, Earl of Marche, took advantage of his Abſence, and beſieged the ſame Town. But upon the firſt News of Baliol's marching to relieve it, he haſtily raiſed the Siege, though his Army was ſuperior in number. Such Terror had their former Loſſes ſtruck into the Scots.

He becomes Maſter of Perth. Knighton.

Baliol's good Fortune failed not to produce the uſual Effects. Great Numbers of Lords and Gentlemen of the Country came and ſwore Fealty to him. This Deſection, which threatned King David with a greater, obliged the young Prince to fly with his Queen into France, it being unſafe to remain any longer in their Kingdom. Mean time, to influence the Affairs of Scotland, Edward ſo managed it, that ſeveral private Perſons fitted out a Fleet in their own Name, to give chace to that which the Scots had ſent to Sea, and which was their laſt Refuge. The Loſs of this Fleet, which was deſtroyed by the Engliſh, quite confounded David's Adherents. The Earl of Fife, who was one of the principal, ſubmitted to the Conqueror, and his Example was followed by many others. Theſe good Succeſſes determined Baliol to cauſe himſelf to be crowned. The Ceremony was performed at Scone, the uſual Place of the Inauguration of the Kings (5).

The new King was no ſooner on the Throne, but, in order to perform his Treaty with the King of England, he did him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland, in the ſame manner as his Father had done it to Edward I, that is, with all the Circumſtances denoting an entire Subjection. In his Letters-Patent he ſaid expreſly, that it was with the Conſent of the King of England, and the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, that he recovered the Poſſeſſion of his Inheritance, of which he ſuppoſed, contrary to Truth, that John his Father was deprived by Robert Bruce. Moreover, he reſigned to the King of England, in payment of the Supplies received from him, the Town and Caſtle of Berwick, which were ſtill in the hands of King David. He offered likewiſe to marry Joanna, Siſter of Edward, if that Princeſs's Marriage with David Bruce could be annulled. 1332. All these Circumstances plainly shew, Edward was but too far concerned in this Expedition, how much soever his Historians may labour to clear him (1).

Edward levies an Army on pretence of Troubles in Ireland;

Whilst Baliol was employed in pushing his Conquests in Scotland, Edward called a Parliament to demand a Subsidy (2). His Pretence was, certain Troubles in Ireland, which he represented as so dangerous, that there was a necessity of sending an Army thither (3). The Subsidy was readily granted. But whilst the Troops designed for this Expedition were marching to imbark, they received Orders to advance towards the Borders of Scotland. Edward representing to the Parliament, that it was dangerous to leave the northern Counties defenceless, whilst their Neighbours were in Arms; and affirming, his Presence was necessary in those Parts, it was resolved that the Irish Expedition should be deferred to some other time. Probably, the Parliament did not suffer themselves to be deceived, but were willing to shut their Eyes voluntarily, not to obstruct the King's Designs.

Mean time, Edward finding, that by the Rapidity of Baliol's Conquests, his Project succeeded to his Wish, immediately pulled off the mask. He began, upon frivolous Pretences to complain, that the Scots had violated the Treaty of Peace. He must needs have been in great want of good Reasons, since he used one so very unlikely in the then Circumstances of Scotland. The Regent left by King David in Scotland, spared neither Excuses, nor Intreaties, nor Submissions to divert the impending Storm, but all to no purpose. Edward, who had formed the Design of taking Berwick, soon after besieged that Place. He pressed it so briskly, that he obliged the Governor (4) to sign a Capitulation (5), promising to surrender the Town, unless relieved by such a Day. During that time, the Regent, seeing Berwick could not be saved without exerting his utmost levied an Army, and was advancing with all speed to give the English Battle. Edward, who was informed of it, expected him at Halydon-Hill, where was fought a bloody Battle, which ended in the entire Rout of the Army of Scotland. Seven Scotch Earls were slain on the Spot, with nine hundred Knights, and four thousand Gentlemen, besides thirty two-thousand common Soldiers, if we believe the English Historians. But the Scots own but ten thousand, which doubtless is nearest the truth. This Victory was followed by the surrender of Berwick, which the King annexed for ever to the Crown of England.

The success of this Campaign answering Edward's expectation, he returned into his own Dominions, leaving with Baliol a Body of Troops to complete the Reduction of all Scotland. Strengthened with this Aid, Baliol took several Towns, after which he held his first Parliament at Edenborough (6). He caused whatever had been done in favor of the King of England, to be confirmed and ratified. Moreover, all the English Lords who had served him, recovered the Lands they had lost in Scotland, or acquired others. All the Acts of Parliament passed in the Reign of Robert Bruce were annulled, as wanting a lawful Authority. Baliol was not satisfied with shewing his Gratitude to Edward, by the Cession of Berwick, and doing him Homage, but resigned to him likewise Roxburgh, Jedburgh, Selkirk, Dumfries, and the Castle of Edenborough, in reward, as he said himself in his Letters, for the Assistance received from him to recover his Dominions (7).

1334. The Scots rebel against him. Buchanan. Boeth. Walsing. Knighton. He is surprized and driven out of Scotland.

This voluntary Homage, and these extraordinary Alienations, made him forfeit the Esteem and Affection of his new Subjects. It was easy for them to see, that Baliol was but Edward's Instrument to render himself Master of Scotland. In this Belief, they resolved to shake off the Yoke of their new King, who so visibly betrayed the Interests of the Nation. Some of the great Men (8), improving this general Disposition, headed a Body of Male-contents, and went in quest of Baliol, who expected nothing less than to be attacked. They surprized and defeated him, forcing him to fly on an Horse without a Saddle to Carlisle, from whence he sent his Protector word of the Misfortune befallen him. 1334.

About the same time Edward summoned a Parliament (9), and communicated his Design, as he said, of going to the Holy-Land with the King of France, and several other Christian Princes. But the news of the Revolution in Scotland, made him alter his pretended Project. Having obtain'd the Aid of Money he demanded, he marched towards that Kingdom, at the head of a numerous Army, and penetrated without opposition to the Northern Counties, whilst the Scotch Army kept in Posts, where it was not possible to attack them. So for want of Enemies to engage with, he left Scotland, and returned into England. Hardly had he reach'd the Borders, when Dunbar, who commanded the Scotch Army, sallying out of his Retreats, retook some Places from the English. As the Season would not permit the King to go in quest of his Enemies, he sent his Troops into Winter-Quarters, and that he might be at hand, resolved to pass the Winter at Roxburgh.

Edward marches into Scotland and ravages the Country. Knighton.

In the Spring he attacked Scotland by Sea and Land. He even advanced as far as the Northern Ocean. But he reaped no great Advantages from this Incursion, as the North Parts of Scotland could not be kept without an Army always there, superior to that of the Scots: So, finding he could not allure them to a Battle, he staid some time at Perth, whilst the Earl of Cornwall his Brother ravaged the Western Counties of that unfortunate Kingdom. It is true, the Scots gained some Advantage over five hundred English Archers, who suffered themselves to be surprized. They took likewise the Earl of Namur, and the Prince his Brother, who served in Edward's Army. But this last Advantage proved fatal to them, as it occasioned the Loss of the Earl of Murray, Regent of the Kingdom. This Earl, who was so generous as to give his two Prisoners their Liberty, carrying his Civilities a little too far in waiting upon them himself to the Frontiers, had the misfortune to be taken by a Party of the Garrison of Roxburgh. This accident added to the Losses already sustained by the Scots, that of a good General, and a very able Regent. 1335.

Mean time, the Pope and the King of France were strongly using their Interest, though indirectly, for King David, by endeavouring to turn the English Arms another way. Whilst Edward was at Perth, he received Ambassadors from France, who, jointly with the Pope's Nuntio, pressed him to perform his Engagement to carry his Arms into Palestine. He easily perceived, their sole Intent was to divert him from the War with Scotland. So, to avoid all farther Sollicitations, he plainly told Philip's Ambassadors, that by God's Grace he was in a condition to make War against the Infidels, without their Master's Aid, as soon as he had finished the Conquest of Scotland. This Answer convincing the Scots that he was fully resolved not to end the War till he was absolute Master of the Kingdom, the greatest Part voluntarily submitted, plainly perceiving, it was not possible for them to resist any longer. They who took this course obtained very favourable Terms, but there were others who chose rather to be exposed to the last Extremities, than submit to the Yoke of the English, after the Campaign was over. Edward returned in Triumph to England (10), having order'd Perth, Edenborough, and Sterling to be refortified, and left the Government of Scotland to the Earl of Athol.

1336. Edward ravages Scotland. Act. Pub. IV. p. 695, 698 and returns. Knighton. Walsing.

Edward, who thought he had sufficiently tamed the Scots, fell into a sort of a Fury upon the News of this fresh Revolt. As soon as the Season would permit, he marched a fourth time into the Heart of Scotland (1), and ravaged in a merciless manner the Counties that had declared against him. In his return, he burnt the Town of Aberdeen, and some other Places of less note; and leaving a small Army with Baliol, marched back to his Dominions (2), where he was called by more important Affairs. This was Edward's last Expedition into Scotland. It was time for that unhappy Kingdom to enjoy some Repose. Since it was first invaded by Edward I, so much Scotch Blood had been spilt, that it is very surprising, after so many Losses, the People of that Country should still be able to contend for their Liberty (3).

Edward's Designs against France.

Edward's four Expeditions into Scotland gained him no doubt a great Reputation. But it seems that part of his Glory might have been disputed, by the consideration of the Superiority of his Troops, more numerous, better disciplined, and more amply provided with all things necessary, than those of the Scots. He was willing therefore to demonstrate in a larger and more noble Field, that he was not afraid to face the greatest Dangers, and to contend with more formidable Enemies. So, from henceforth neglecting Scotland, which he believed sufficiently subdued, and which afforded him no more Lawrels; he resolved to attack France, the most powerful State of all Europe, and to use his utmost endeavours to wrest the Crown from Philip de Valois. I have already mentioned his claim to that Kingdom, from which he was excluded by virtue of the Salic-Law. As he pretended this Law was misunderstood, and as that was the Origin and Cause of a long and bloody War, which frequently brought France into extreme Danger, there would be a sort of Necessity, before we proceeded to particulars, to show the real Foundation of this War. But as this matter cannot be briefly explained, I must beg the Reader's leave to refer him to the Dissertation at the End of this Reign, that the thread of the History may not be interrupted. It suffices here to say in a word, that Edward pretended, the Salic-Law, in excluding Females from the Succession to the Crown, did not exclude their Male-Issue; from whence he inferred, that the next Male-Heir ought to succeed.

The Collection of the Publick Acts contain several Pieces, clearly shewing, that although Edward seemed to submit to the Judgment given against him in France, he was meditating some great design, and that against France. Amongst others, there is a Letter to the Inhabitants of Bayonne, positively promising them never to make Peace with France without their being included, though he was not then in War with that Crown. It was not therefore Robert d' Artois, expelled France, and sheltered in England, that inspired him with the Thoughts of invading France, as all the Historians unanimously affirm. I do not deny however, that Robert d' Artois, displeased with Philip de Valois, helped by his Councils, and perhaps by the Consideration of his Friends in France, to make him hasten the Execution of his Project. But since Robert d' Artois is generally reckoned the Author of this Undertaking, and of the Calamities suffered by France on that occasion, it will not be improper to inform the Reader of the Reasons which that Prince, descended from Lewis VIII, thought he had to complain of Philip. For that purpose, it will be necessary to know something of the Genealogy of the House of Artois.

1336. State of the Earl of Artois's Case.

Robert, Earl of Artois, Son of Lewis VIII King of France, had a Son and a Daughter, namely, Robert and Maud. Robert II was Earl of Artois, and Maud married Othenin, Earl of Burgundy, by whom she had two Daughters, Joanna and Blanch, who were Wives to Philip le Long, and Charles the Fair, Kings of France. Joanna had a Daughter called Blanch, married to Eudes Duke of Burgundy. Robert II had but one Son, named Philip, who dying before the Earl his Father, left Robert his Son, the third of that Name, but not Earl of Artois. Robert III. claimed the Earldom, as Grandson to Robert II, and the next Male-Heir. But Maud his Great Aunt, maintained, that the Succession belonged to her, as Sister of Robert II, and nearer by one degree than Robert III. The Court of Peers decided the Affair in favour of Maud, whose two Daughters were married to the two younger Sons of Philip the Fair. Robert d' Artois submitted to the Sentence during Philip's Life, and all the Reign of Lewis Hutin, but took Arms in the Regency of Philip le Long, and got possession of Artois. When from Regent, Philip was become King, the Affair of Artois was again brought before the Court of Peers, and decided once more in favour of Maud his Mother-in-law. After the Death of Charles the Fair, Robert d' Artois was of all the great Men of France, the Person that acted with the greatest warmth, to procure the Crown for Philip de Valois his Brother-in-law, and maintained the most strenuously the Authority of the Salic-Law. He hoped thereby to establish a Precedent in his favour, with regard to the Earldom of Artois, and that the Salic-Law being admitted, with respect to the Crown, all the Fiefs thereof would be subject to the same Law. So, depending upon this Precedent which made for him, and the Advantage of being Brother-in-law of the new King, he revived the Process, and produced certain Charters under the Great-Seal, to confirm his Right. But Philip caused the Charters to be examined so strictly, that they were discovered to be counterfeit, for which a Gentlewoman of Artois, who had forged them, was severely punished. These Charters, on which Robert founded his Claim, being rejected, the Earldom of Artois was adjudged to Blanch, Daughter of Philip de Long, by vertue of the Right she had from Maud her Grandmother. Robert, full of Indignation, fell into a Passion with the King, and upbraided him in such a manner, as touched him very sensibly. It is said, he proceeded to Threats, which determined the King to prosecute him with the utmost rigour. He ordered him to be summoned before the Peers; and causing him to be condemned for Non-appearance, commanded the Sentence to be publickly read in the Streets of Paris. Robert withdrew into Hainault: but Philip not letting him rest there, he took the desperate Course of throwing himself into the Arms of the King of England. He found that Monarch finishing the War with Scotland, and meditating his Enterprize upon France. In all likelihood, he contributed by his Sollicitations to hasten the Execution of that Project (4).

1337. Edward makes an Alliance with several Princes. Act. Pub. IV. p. 724. &c. Froissart, l. 1. c. 35.

So important a War could not be undertaken, without extraordinary Preparations, and the support of divers Alliances, which might balance the Superiority, France had then over England. Edward had now gained the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Guelder and Hainault, his Brothers-in-law, the Archbishop of Cologn, and several other German Princes: Nay, he neglected not the private Assistances of divers Lords of Germany, Flanders, Holland, Brabant, Gascogne, who were to supply him with a number of Horse, in proportion to the Sums he gave them. All these Troops drawn together, and joined to the English, would have made a very numerous Army. But these Alliances were not near so advantagious to him, as that procured him by Robert d' Artois with James d' Arteville, a Brewer of Ghent. The Credit of that Burgher was so great in Flanders, that he had caused the principal Cities to revolt against the Earl (5). This Prince was even reduced to the Necessity of flying for refuge into France, till Philip, who had engaged to restore him, was able to accomplish his Promise. Edward taking advantage of this Juncture, offered his Protection to the Flemings, who gladly accepted it, apprehensive as they were, of being oppressed by Philip, this Alliance was the more advantagious, Prince Edward made Duke of Cornwal. Walſing. Knighton.

Whilſt Edward was making his preparations for this important War, the Object of all his Cares, he ſummoned a Parliament (2). The principal Buſineſs was to ſettle the Woollen-Trade, which was of very great conſequence to the Kingdom. In this Parliament, he created Prince Edward his eldeſt Son Duke of Cornwal, being the firſt in England that bore the Title of Duke (3).

Edward writes to the Pope againſt Philip. Act. Pub. IV. p. 826. Walſing. p. 136.

When the King was almoſt ready to begin the War, he wrote to the Pope and Cardinals, to juſtify his Enterprize againſt France. He complained in his Letters, that tho', after the Death of Charles the Fair his Uncle, the Crown was devolved to him as next Heir, he was deprived of it by a raſh and unjuſt Sentence: That the Ambaſſadors ſent to Paris to demand the Crown, not only were not heard, but were treated with that Violence as even to be threaten'd, and put in danger of their Lives: That by taking from a Minor the Crown, which of Right belonged to him, the Peers of France acted like Robbers rather than Judges; and that he proteſted againſt whatever was done during his Nonage. Then he ſaid, that Philip de Valois, not content with uſurping the Kingdom of France, had, before any declaration of War, unjuſtly ſeized Guienne and the Earldom of Ponthieu, and without cauſe, united theſe two Provinces to the Crown: That he had countenanced the Scotch Rebellion, inſtead of aſſiſting him, as he was obliged by the Bond of Affinity. Laſtly, That by his whole Conduct he had ſhewn himſelf to be his mortal Enemy, and extremely uneaſy at every thing tending to the Honor of England (4).

Philip's Anſwer.

Theſe Letters being communicated to Philip, he anſwered, That by the Salic Law, and the Judgment of the Peers, Edward was excluded from the Succeſſion to the Crown of France, to which otherwiſe he could pretend no manner of Right, ſince he was born out of the Kingdom: That for his part, not only all the French had received him for King, but Edward himſelf had ſubmitted to their Judgment: That the Homage he had done in Perſon, and confirmed by his Letters Patent, was a clear evidence, that he was himſelf convinced of the groundleſsneſs of his Pretenſions. Edward replied, That his Proteſtation in the Preſence of his Council before he went and did Homage, prevented its being any Prejudice to him: That the Fear of loſing his Lands in France, was the ſole Motive of it; which, added to the Conſideration of his Minority, was more than ſufficient to invalidate whatever had been hitherto done. Of theſe two Reaſons, the firſt would hardly have been admitted in a Court of Juſtice; but it was not there this famous Proceſs was to be decided. Mean time, Edward willing to ſhew his Allies he was too far engaged in the Conteſt to recede, ordered the Duke of Brabant to demand the Crown of France in his Name. At the ſame time he made him his Lieutenant-General for that whole Kingdom, with Orders to the French, whom he called his Subjects, to pay him Obedience. 1337.

To try to prevent the Evils, which a Quarrel of this nature might bring upon Chriſtendom, Benedict XII, who then filled the Papal Throne, uſed all his Intereſt with the two Kings. But as Edward was the Aggreſſor, the Pope ſent firſt to him two Cardinals, with Inſtructions to uſe all poſſible endeavours to perſuade him to Peace. Theſe two Legates diſcharged their Commiſſion with great Zeal, and were very urgent with Edward to put the Affair in Negotiation. They could not however help ſhewing ſome Partiality in favour of France, becauſe of Edward's Alliance with the Emperor, the Pope's profeſſed Enemy. Nevertheleſs the King let them know, their Mediation was agreeable to him, and he would make Peace, provided Terms were offered anſwerable to his Rights. He even promiſed to defer the execution of his deſigns till next March. But this was no great Favour, ſince it was then December. He ſpent the reſt of the Winter in preparing his Army and Fleet, and eſpecially in ſtrengthning the League with new Allies. Among whom, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the Count Palatime of the Rhine, the Duke of Auſtria, and the Dauphin of Viennois, who are all three reckoned by the Hiſtorians among the Allies of France. This gives occaſion to preſume they were firſt ingaged with Edward, but afterwards ſuffered themſelves to be gained by Philip. The Dauphin had entertained the Project of erecting his Dominions into a Kingdom: Which, probably, was the Reaſon of his joining with Edward, hoping without doubt that he would uſe his Intereſt with the Emperor to obtain his deſire. This Project not ſucceeding, he eſpouſed the Quarrel of France. The Earl of Hainault, being willing alſo to enter into the League, deſired, that Edward might have the Title of Vicar of the Empire, in order to have a pretence to join Forces with him, as General of the Emperor's Army. To ſatisfy the Earl, and in expectation of bringing other German Princes to the ſame Reſolution, Edward was pleaſed to demand that Dignity of the Emperor.

When he had taken all the Precautions ſuggeſted to him by Prudence, he departed from England, with a Fleet of five hundred Sail (5), and ſteered his Courſe towards Antwerp, where he was called by important Affairs. It was neceſſary he ſhould be near his Allies, that he might take with them all proper meaſures for the execution of his Deſigns. Altho' his Ambaſſadors had concluded Alliances in his Name with ſeveral Princes, there were ſtill many things to be ſettled with them, before they could aſſemble their Forces. This was properly what retarded ſeveral Months the opening of the Campain. But this delay was not entirely fruitleſs. During that time, Edward went and conferred at Cologne, with the Emperor (6), who ordered a Patent to be drawn up appointing him Vicar of the Empire, according to his deſire. This ſort of favor was attended with the Promiſe of a powerful Aſſiſtance, a Promiſe which was afterwards very lamely performed. The Cities of Flanders having entered into the League by means of James d'Arteville, were grown apprehenſive of being one day abandoned to the Vengeance of their Earl, and the King of France. It was therefore neceſſary for Edward to ſhew himſelf to the Flemings, in order to encourage them by his preſence. To that end he took a Journey to Ghent and granted the principal Cities ſeveral

The more diffident he was, the more Edward laboured to be aſſured of his Aſſiſtance. Beſides the Money with which he profuſely ſupplied him (2), he gave him hopes of the Honour of having, one day, for his Son-in-law the Duke of Cornwal, preſumptive Heir of the Crown of England. Morever, to make him perfectly eaſy, he was pleaſed to give it under his Hand, not to quit the Low-Countries till the War was ended (3).

He promiſes to make the Duke of Juliers a Peer of England. Ibid.

But all theſe Affairs, though of great moment, were not the ſole Cauſe of Edward's long Stay in Brabant. As his Expence was exceſſive (4), he endeavoured, during that time, to borrow Money of all the foreign Princes. He did not ſcruple even to apply to private Perſons, and take up ſuch Sums as they were willing to lend, though never ſo ſmall: Nay, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he pawned his Crown to the Archbiſhop of Triers [for fifty thouſand Florins.]

Birth of Prince Lionel. The Pope's Letters. p. 128. Walſing.

During Edward's Stay at Antwerp, his Queen was delivered there (5) of a Prince called Lionel. Here likewiſe he received a Letter from the Pope, repreſenting to him in ſtrong Terms, the Dangers he was expoſing himſelf to, by his Alliance with Lewis of Bavaria, who ſtood excommunicated. At the ſame time, he reproached him, for undervaluing himſelf, in receiving from the pretended Emperor, the Title of Vicar of the Empire, ſo much beneath him. But theſe Remonſtrances made little Impreſſion upon him. Though the Pope threatned to proceed to extraordinary Cenſures againſt him, he choſe rather to run that hazard, than interrupt the Execution of his Deſigns.

Edward enters Artois.

Every thing being ready to open the Campain, which had been retarded till September (6), Edward put himſelf at the head of forty thouſand Men, and encamped between Marchienne and Doway. Then he marched (7) towards le Cambreſis, and halted ſome time before the Walls of Cambray. Here he was informed, that Philip was advancing with a formidable Army, to give him Battle. As this War was immenſely expenſive, and it was his Intereſt to end it at once; as ſoon as he received this Intelligence, he paſſed the Schelde, in order to meet his Enemy. A few days after, the two Armies being encamped pretty near one another, about Vironfoſſe, Philip ſent a Herald to offer him Battle, on condition it ſhould be on a Plain where there was no Incumbrance. Edward accepted the Challenge, and left him to appoint the Time and Place. The 22d of October was fixed for the Deciſion of this famous Quarrel. But whilſt both Sides were preparing with equal ardour for Battle, Philip was diſcouraged by a Letter from Robert King of Naples. This Prince, who paſſed for a great Aſtrologer, foretold him ill ſucceſs, wherever he fought the Engliſh. At leaſt, this is what ſeveral Hiſtorians affirm; adding, that upon the Credit of this Prediction, Philip retired, not daring to venture a Battle. Others however maintain, with more likelihood, that this Letter would not have induced him to take ſuch a Step, if the great Men, who attended him, had not checked his Ardour by more prudent Counſels. It is ſaid, they repreſented to him, that in the Battle which was going to be fought, he hazarded no leſs than his Crown; whereas Edward ventured only Soldiers, moſt of whom were not his own; and, upon this Remonſtrance, he reſolved, though with great reluctance, to give his Enemy this ſmall Advantage. When Edward ſaw there was no likelihood of bringing Philip to a Battle, he marched into Hainault. This is Froiſſart's Account, who is accuſed by the French of being, on all occaſions, too partial to the Engliſh. Nangis, a French Hiſtorian, gives a quite contrary Relation, by ſaying, Edward retired firſt, not to hazard a Battle. This is not the only Inſtance of the like Contradiction among the Hiſtorians. It ſeems however, that on this occaſion it is not likely, Edward, who paſſed the Schelde to meet Philip, ſhould retire for fear of fighting. But Philip's Reaſons for not venturing a Battle are very ſtrong. The Honour of a King or General, conſiſts not in fighting upon every opportunity, but only at a proper Seaſon; and in not venturing the loſs of a Kingdom without extreme Neceſſity. Be this as it will, the firſt Campain ended without any Bloodſhed, except in Guienne, where the two Parties made War upon one another. But as nothing very remarkable happened, I ſhall not ſtay to relate the Particulars (8).

It was not poſſible for Edward to return to England ſo ſoon as he deſired, being detained in the Low-Countries by a troubleſome Affair, created by underhand Practices. The King of France, vexed to ſee the Advantages his Enemy reaped by his Alliance with the Flemings, found means, by the help of his Emiſſaries, to raiſe in the Cities of Flanders a Scruple for taking up Arms againſt their Sovereign Lord. This Scruple, inflamed by the Eccleſiaſticks, moſt of whom were in the Intereſts of France, had already made a deep impreſſion on the Minds of the People. Perhaps it would have cauſed in Flanders ſome Revolution prejudicial to England, had not James d'Arteville found a ſpeedy Remedy, by adviſing Edward to aſſume the Title of King of France. This Propoſal being debated in the King's Council, it was approved as a proper means to keep the Flemings in the League. And indeed, Edward reaped from it the Advantage he was made to expect. Purſuant to this Advice, he ſtiled himſelf King of France, and quartered with his own Arms the Flower-de-luces of France. He added this 1340. Motto, DIEU ET MON DROIT (1), declaring thereby, that he put his whole Confidence in God, and the Juſtice of his Cauſe. This new Title was not very ſurpriſing, ſince all his foregoing Proceedings were clear Evidences of his Deſign. Some time after, he refuſed Philip the Title of King, and forbid all his Miniſters to give him any other but that of Earl of Valois. Beſides, he had appointed the Duke of Brabant his Lieutenant-General in France, and by that, had ſufficiently ſhewn, he thought himſelf the true King; though he had not yet ventured to take the Name. Having broken the Ice on account of the Flemings, he made no ſcruple to uſe the Title of King of France in all Publick Acts, and to mark this Year as the firſt of his new Reign. At the ſame time he publiſhed a Declaration (2), notifying to the French, that the Kingdom of France being devolved to him by the Death of Charles the Fair, according to God's Will, which he would not oppoſe, he was reſolved to aſſume the Government. He gave his new Subjects all the uſual Promiſes on the like occaſions, and offered his Protection to ſuch as, after the Example of the Flemings, would own him for their Sovereign. The ſame day he publiſhed a Manifeſto, containing a particular Account of the pretended Injuries received from Philip de Valois, and the Offers made by himſelf in order to a Peace, that they might unite their Forces againſt the Infidels.

Though Edward had entered into Engagements with the Duke of Brabant, to ſtay in the Low-Countries till the War was ended, it was not poſſible for him to keep his Promiſe. His Affairs neceſſarily called him into England. But to ſatisfy the Duke, he left him in Hoſtage four Engliſh Lords (3) of the firſt Quality, beſides his Queen and the new-born Prince, who continued at Antwerp for Pledges of his Return. After this Affair was thus ſettled, he paſſed into England, where he arrived in February (4). Preſently after he ſummoned a Parliament (5), which, upon granting him a conſiderable Subſidy, obtained from him the Confirmation of Magna Charta. Before they broke up, the Lords and Commons preſented an Addreſs, praying that the Title of King of France, uſed in the Publick Acts, might have no Influence on the Affairs relating to England. This Requeſt was too reaſonable not to be immediately granted. Though he had not yet acquired one Foot of Land in France, this new Title was not diſpleaſing to the Engliſh, who fancied their King was become the Greater for it. But Pope Benedict was not pleaſed with it at all. He uſed his utmoſt Endeavours to perſuade the King to quit the Title, affirming, he had no Right, by reaſon of the Salic Law, concerning which Philip had taken care to inſtruct him to his Advantage. But his Exhortations were ineffectual.

Though the firſt Campain had produced no conſiderable Event, Edward's Preparations were a plain Indication, that he expected greater matters from the ſecond. He had increaſed his Fleet to three hundred (6) ſail of Ships fit for War, and his Army was much more numerous than the former. Every thing being ready about Midſummer (7), he embarked for Flanders, though he had Intelligence, that the French Fleet, conſiſting of four hundred Sail, waited for him in the way to Sluys. His eager deſire of acquiring Fame, cauſing him to receive the News with more Joy than Surprize (8), he reſolved to open a Paſſage through the Enemy, notwithſtanding their Superiority. He met them on the Coaſt of Flanders, as he expected, and without heſitation, began the Engagement. This was the greateſt and moſt memorable that had been yet ſeen in thoſe Seas, and the firſt wherein the King of England commanded in Perſon. The Ships, for the moſt part, grappling one another, both Sides fought without ſtirring, as if they had been at Land, from eight in the Morning, till ſeven at Night. If Edward's Valour filled the Soldiers with Admiration, his Conduct raiſed no leſs Wonder in the Mariners, who were amazed to ſee him give Orders with ſuch Prudence and Foreſight, that one would have thought he had commanded at Sea all his Life. The Preſence and Reſolution of the King, who appeared where-ever was moſt Danger, ſo encouraged his Men, that they fought with an aſtoniſhing Bravery. The French behaved, on their part, with great Courage; but, after ſuſtaining ſeveral Hours the Efforts of the Engliſh, they were forced at laſt to leap into the Sea, to avoid the Sword of their Enemies. Of the whole French Fleet, but thirty Ships eſcaped (9), the reſt being either taken or ſunk. So Edward's Victory could not be more compleat. The Engliſh pretend, the French loſt thirty thouſand Men. This grievous Misfortune was long unknown to Philip, no one daring to carry him the News, till his Buffoon, by an unluckly Jeſt, gave him occaſion to diſcover it (10).

Edward's good Succeſs in this Engagement, afforded him an opportunity, of peaceably landing his Troops in Flanders, where he aſſembled the fineſt Army that was ever commanded by any King of England. It conſiſted of one hundred and fifty thouſand Men, Engliſh, Germans, Flemings and Gaſcons. With theſe numerous Forces he beſieged Tournay (11), after detaching fifty thouſand Men, under the Conduct of Robert d'Artois, who poſted himſelf near St. Omer, to favour the Siege. Theſe laſt Troops were chiefly compoſed of the Militia of Flanders, who, knowing nothing of Military Diſcipline, went one day, without order, to the Number of eighteen thouſand, to attack the Suburbs of St. Omer, with deſign to plunder. The Duke of Burgundy, who had thrown himſelf into that Place, not being able to bear this Bravado, ſallied out upon them, and ſlew above three thouſand. This loſs would have been inconſiderable, had it not produced a fatal Effect. The ſame night, the Flemiſh Troops, ſeized with a panic Fright, quitted their Camp in great diſorder, and ſhamefully retired, ſome to their own homes, others into Edward's Camp. Some affirm, there was on this occaſion a Battle, wherein Robert d'Artois was entirely routed by the Duke of Burgundy. But Froiſſart, a cotemporary Author, who relates this Event in the abovementioned manner, ſeems more worthy of Credit, than after-Writers.

Mean time, Philip, at the head of an Army much ſtronger than Edward's, was advancing to the relief of Tournay. His deſign was not however to engage, but only to harraſs the Beſiegers, in order to oblige them to raiſe the Siege. Edward quickly perceiving Philip's Intent, was very ſenſible how difficult it would be to take the Town, whilſt the French Army was ſo near. Accordingly, to oblige his Enemy to alter his purpoſe, he ſent a Herald with a Letter (12), challenging him to ſingle Combat, or offering to decide their Quarrel by a hundred on each Side, or elſe by a general Battle. The Letter was directed, To Philip de Valois, without any other Title. Philip anſwered,

Widow

1340. Widow of the late Earl of Hainault. This Princeſs, who was retired to the Abbey of Fontenelle after the death of her Husband, came from her retreat on this occaſion, to try to reconcile the two Monarchs, one her Brother, the other her Son-in-law. She ſo managed it, that at length ſhe prevailed with them to conſent to a Truce, which was to laſt from the 20th of September, to the 25th of June the next Year. It was afterwards prolonged for two Years by the Pope's Mediation. As ſoon as the Truce was ſigned, Edward departed for England (1) with his Queen, who had lived three Years in the Low-Countries. She had been delivered there of two Princes, namely, Lionel [at Antwerp,] and John at Ghent, known afterwards by the name of the Duke of Lancaſter (2).

Truce between the two Kings. Knighton. Act. Pub. V. p. 205, 260, 281. Edward returns into England. Ib. p. 216.

It was a great Mortification to Edward to be obliged, by the Neceſſity of his Affairs, to make a Truce againſt his Inclination, and which in effect broke all his Meaſures. Three very urgent Reaſons compelled him to take this Step, which ſeemed ſo little agreeable to his vaſt Deſigns. Firſt, the defection of the Emperor and the Duke of Brabant, who had both receded from the League. Secondly, the exceſſive Charge of maintaining ſo numerous an Army, for which the Money that came from England in leſs Sums than he expected, could not ſuffice. Laſtly, it was only a Truce, which might in ſome meaſure ſave him the Shame of raiſing the Siege he had undertaken. Theſe Reaſons were not only ſufficient to induce him to ſign the Truce, but alſo indiſpenſably ingaged him to procure ſome Repoſe, in order to remedy the Inconveniences happened by the Levity of his Allies, and the exhauſting of his Treaſure. As for the Duke of Brabant, he allured him ſome time with the hopes of the fore-mentioned Marriage. He even demanded the Pope's Diſpenſation for it. But this Affair, whether obſtructed by the King himſelf, or the Court of Rome, came to nothing. Whereupon the Duke of Brabant finding himſelf amuſed, withdrew his Troops, without openly breaking however with the King. As to the Emperor, the Aſſiſtance Edward received from him was ſo inconſiderable, that he would not have been much weakned by that loſs. But the Emperor, in making a private Peace with France, on pretence that Edward had concluded a Truce without him, had at the ſame time revoked his Patent of Vicar General of the Empire. This unexpected Accident, which cauſed ſome of the German Princes to go from the League, obliged Edward to take other meaſures.

But Edward's chief Buſineſs was to conſider how to pay his Debts, which were very conſiderable. Moreover it was neceſſary to find means to continue the War when the Truce ſhould be expired, without being liable to the like Inconveniences. When he left England he ſettled his Affairs in ſuch a manner, that he did not queſtion to receive punctually the Money he wanted to pay his numerous Army. But he was no ſooner ingaged in the Siege of Tournay, but, contrary to his expectation, he was in want of Money, and found himſelf thereby in very great Streights (3). Upon his Arrival at London, he highly complained of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom he had left Prime Miniſter in his Abſence. He accuſed him of maliciouſly obſtructing the levying of the Subſidy granted by the Parliament, though it was by his Advice and Inſtances, that he had engaged in the Undertaking. Moreover he complained, that having begun the Siege of Tournay upon the Archbiſhop's Aſſurances that nothing ſhould be wanting, he ſaw himſelf abandoned when he had moſt need of Aſſiſtance. That the Archbiſhop had not only broke his Word, but likewiſe oppoſed all the Expedients offered to raiſe Money. In ſhort, that he was the ſole Cauſe of the Length and ill

His Aim was to raiſe a Commotion among the People. Probably, he would have carried his Revenge farther, if he had not perceived his Proceedings diſapproved by the Parliament. As he was afraid of being abandoned, he choſe, though ſomewhat of the lateſt, to caſt himſelf upon the King's Mercy. Edward very willingly received his Submiſſions, for fear of engaging in a Quarrel, which muſt have been prejudicial to him, by reaſon of his frequent occaſion for the Clergy's Aſſiſtance.

1341. The Archbiſhop ſubmits.

Some have imagined the Archbiſhop ſuffered himſelf to be gained by the Pope, who was diſpleaſed with the War, and very much biaſſed in favor of France. There appeared quickly after a ſenſible Proof of the Pope's Partiality in his putting all Flanders under an Interdict, becauſe the Flemings had been againſt the King of France their Sovereign Lord. The Flemiſh Clergy obſerved the Interdict ſo ſtrictly, that People were obliged to ſend into England for leſs ſcrupulous Prieſts to celebrate Divine Service. The Flemings received theſe Eccleſiaſticks without any Difficulty, and pretended to evade the Pope's Cenſures, by affirming they were built upon a wrong Foundation, ſince Edward was the real King of France, and Philip an Uſurper.

Benedict XII partial to France. He puts Flanders under an Interdict. Walſing.

The War undertaken by Edward againſt France had ſucceeded ſo ill, that all his Expences had not acquired him one Foot of Land in the Kingdom he had taken upon him to conquer. After ſo great, though fruitleſs Endeavours, there was no Appearance of his ever being able to exert the like. Conſequently, it would probably make him deſiſt from his Deſign. Beſides, the Truce affording his Enemy leiſure to prepare, he could have no hopes of ſurpriz' g him. And yet, it is hard to judge, whether the Negotiations ſet on foot for a Peace during the Truce, were ſincere on his Part, or intended only to amuſe his Enemy. Be this as it will, if he really deſigned to make Peace, he was not long in that Mind. The Proſpect of freſh Advantages from the Poſture of Affairs in the Duchy of Bretagne, ſoon made him reſolve to improve ſo favorable a Juncture. The ſhare England had in the Quarrel concerning the Succeſſion of that Dukedom, obliges me to give ſome Account of the Caſe, for the better Underſtanding of the Sequel.

Arthur II, Duke of Bretagne, left three Sons by his firſt Wife; namely, John II, who ſucceeded him, Guy Earl of Pontievre, and Peter. By a ſecond Wife he left a fourth Son called John, who was Earl of Monfort by his Mother. John II, and Peter had no Iſſue. Guy, who died in 1330, left a Daughter, named Joanna, who was given by her Uncle John in Marriage to Charles de Chatillon, Brother of Lewis Earl of Blois. He was generally called Charles de Blois. John II dying in 1341, there remained two of the Family, John Earl of Monfort, and Joanna his Niece, Wife of Charles de Blois. They both laid Claim to the Dukedom. Joanna by right of Repreſentation, as Daughter of Guy elder Brother of John de Monfort, and this laſt as Brother of the late Duke, and conſequently one Degree nearer than his Niece. He pleaded likewiſe the advantage of his Sex; a Reaſon of little weight, ſince Bretagne owned not the Authority of the Salick Law. But Charles had a great advantage over his Competitor; namely, his being Nephew to Philip de Valois, who was to decide the Affair. On the other hand, the Earl of Monfort had ſo managed, that immediately after the Death of the Duke his Brother, he got poſſeſſion of Bretagne, and cauſed the greateſt Part of his Subjects to ſwear Fealty to him: Nay, he was now gone to England, where he had privately done Homage to 1341. Edward, acknowledging him for King of France, and made an Alliance with him. By this Proceeding, of which Philip was informed, he entirely forfeited that Monarch's Favor, who had no great Kindneſs for him before. However, Philip willing to obſerve the cuſtomary Formalities, ordered the two Competitors to be ſummoned before the Court of Peers, to defend their Rights, and receive Judgment. Montfort very imprudently repaired to Paris, imagining, what he had done in England was ſtill a Secret. But at his firſt Audience, he found what he was to expect from the King; who plainly told him, he had no Pretenſions to Bretagne, and reproached him for his Homage to the King of England. Montfort confeſſed he had been in England to ſee his Friends, but denied the Homage. But Philip being better informed than he imagined, commanded him not to ſtir from Paris, and appointed a Day for the Judgment of the Proceſs. It was eaſy for Montfort to ſee, what danger both his Cauſe and Perſon were in. So, taking a ſudden Reſolution, he made his Eſcape from Paris, diſguiſed like a Merchant, and repaired to Bretagne. This did not hinder in his Abſence the Deciſion of the Affair, in favour of Charles de Blois, who was declared Duke of Bretagne, and forthwith admitted to Homage. It is pretended, that in this Judgment the Peers obſerved not all the Formalities requiſite in Cauſes of this nature, and that their Proceedings were not altogether regular. As to the main of the Affair, though this Deciſion was directly contrary to That in the Caſe of the Earl of Artois, they pretended, the diverſity of the Cuſtoms of the two Countries was the Reaſon; for in Bretagne, Repreſentation took place, but was not received in Artois. Be this as it will, Philip being highly provoked with the Earl of Montfort, for doing Homage to the King of England, confiſcated the Lands of Montfort; but to make up this Loſs, Edward gave him in England the Earldom of Richmond. Shortly after, John, eldeſt Son of Philip de Valois, being commiſſioned to execute the Decree given in favour of Charles de Blois, entered Bretagne, at the head of a powerful Army, and Montfort retired to Nantes, where he was immediately beſieged. Quickly after, the City being taken, and Montfort made Priſoner, he was conducted to Paris, and committed to the great Tower of the Louvre.

This Event would doubtleſs have ended the Quarrel between the two Candidates; but Margaret of Flanders, Wife of John de Montfort, undertook to ſupport her Husband's Intereſts, in ſpite of the ill ſituation of his Affairs. She came to London with her Son, a Child of four Years old, and renewed the Earl her Husband's Alliance with Edward. By this new Treaty ſhe poſitively engaged, to put into the hands of the Engliſh all the places ſtill in her power; and to be better aſſured of the Aſſiſtance of England, concluded a Marriage between her Son, and one of Edward's Daughters, and left the young Prince at the Engliſh Court, to be educated, or rather to be an Hoſtage. This Treaty procuring Edward an entrance into Bretagne, and by that means, an opportunity of attacking Philip from that quarter, he forthwith diſpatched Robert d' Artois thither (1). Robert quickly became maſter of Vannes, and then ordered Rennes to be beſieged. Whilſt his Troops were employed in the Siege, the Heads of the contrary Party, knowing he ſtaid at Vannes with a few Troops, inveſted the Town, and carried it by Storm. Robert being mortally wounded, with great difficulty eſcaped to Hennebond, where he died of his Wounds. Edward received the News of his Death with grief. He ſwore to revenge it; and kept his Oath but too punctually. Robert d' Artois's Expedition into Bretagne, gave Philip occaſion to complain, that Edward had violated the Truce, and to be even with him, he cauſed Hoſtilities to be renewed in Guienne. Thus the two Monarchs prepared again for War, by mutually accuſing one another of breaking the Truce.

The Earl of Northampton (2), who had taken the Command of the Engliſh Troops in Bretagne, after the Death of Robert d' Artois, was unable to make any Progreſs with ſo ſmall an Army. Mean time, it was of great moment to Edward, to become maſter of that Duchy. And therefore he reſolved to go thither in Perſon with more Forces (3). Upon his Arrival, he beſieged at once, Nantes, Rennes, Vannes, and Guingamp. Philip knowing how prejudicial to him the Settlement of the Engliſh in Bretagne might be, reſolved to drive them thence at any rate. To that end he raiſed an Army of fifty thouſand Men, under the Command of the Duke of Normandy, his eldeſt Son. The young Prince marching with the utmoſt expedition, had the good fortune to enter Bretagne, before any of the Places beſieged were taken. His approach obliged the King of England to raiſe theſe four Sieges, and draw all his Troops together, which were ſtill inferior to the French. The two Armies remained, the beſt part of the Winter, encamped near each other, but ſo well intrenched, that neither of the Leaders ſhowed any inclination to engage. The Duke of Normandy was unwilling to run any hazard, becauſe having done what he wanted, he was in hopes of ſtarving his Enemies. Edward cared as little to venture a Battle, unleſs forced, againſt an Army much ſtronger than his own. Whilſt theſe two Princes lay thus encamped, two Legates from Clement VI, the new Pope, had time to arrive, and negotiate between the two Crowns a Truce for three Years (4), wherein all the Allies on both ſides were included. They made the two Kings likewiſe promiſe to ſend Ambaſſadors to Avignon, to treat of a Peace by the Pope's Mediation (5).

Whilſt Edward was employed in his Wars with France, the Scots improved that Diverſion to try to recover their Liberty. Since Edward quitted Scotland, King David's Adherents had gained great Advantages over Baliol, who commanded the Engliſh Army, but had not ſufficient Forces to ſtop their Progreſs. Robert Stuart, Regent of Scotland for King David, maintained, by his Valour and Conduct, the Intereſts of the young exiled Prince. He was bravely ſeconded by William Douglaſs, and ſome other Lords, who ſtill retained an inviolable Fidelity for their lawful Sovereign. Though a Body commanded by Douglaſs, received a ſad Loſs, Robert ſtill continued to keep his ground. He even ſaw himſelf, ſhortly after, in a condition to beſiege Perth, or St. Johnſton, the ſtrongeſt Place the Engliſh had in Scotland. The Siege laſted three Months, by reaſon of the Beſiegers great want of Ammunition. But a ſeaſonable Supply from France enabled them at length to take the Place. This Loſs obliged Baliol to quit the Center of the Kingdom, and retire to the Borders, where he ſheltered himſelf, by means of the Places he had reſigned to the Engliſh. The Truce concluded before Tournay, wherein Scotland was included, obliged Stuart to lay down his Arms for ſome time. But no ſooner was the Truce broken, on account of the Affairs of Bretagne, but the Scots re-aſſembled and beſieged Sterling, of which they became maſters, after numberleſs Aſſaults without any Intermiſſion.

This Progreſs convincing Edward of his miſtake, in imagining that Kingdom was diſabled from giving him any Trouble, he reſolved to invade it once more by Sea and Land. To that purpoſe, he repaired to the Frontiers (6), where he waited for his Fleet, which was to join him at Newcaſtle. But a violent Storm, which laſted ſeveral days, rendered his Ships unſerviceable for the reſt of that Year. This ſad Accident hindered his entring Scotland, as it deprived him of the Proviſions and Ammunition, on board his Fleet. He could not expect to find any in the Enemy's Country, becauſe the Scots themſelves deſtroyed them, to deprive his Army of the means of ſubſiſting. However, their Ignorance of his State freed him from his preſent Difficulties. As they ſaw themſelves much inferior to that Prince, who threatned their Country with utter Deſolation, they humbly ſued for a Truce, which they thought themſelves very happy in obtaining. Edward took care not to refuſe it; but taking advantage of their Terror, would grant it only upon this condition; That they ſhould own him for Sovereign of Scotland, and renounce their Allegiance to King David, in caſe that Prince came not in Perſon into that Kingdom before May next enſuing, with an Army ſtrong enough to give Battle. This Condition put the King of France under a Neceſſity of aſſiſting his Ally, better than he had hitherto done, for fear of being deprived of the Advantages, procured by the frequent Diverſions of the Scots. Wherefore, he furniſhed King David with Men and Money, and ſent him into Scotland (7), where he levied a very conſiderable Army, conſiſting, as it is ſaid, of ſixty thouſand Men, Scots,

In a few days, he took the City, and put all the Inhabitants to the sword. He would have proceeded, but, upon Advice that Edward was hastening to give him Battle, he resolved to retire; his Generals representing to him, that he could not stay any longer in England, without exposing himself to the hazard of a Battle, which might a second time endanger his Kingdom. Whilst he was marching back to Scotland, the Garrison of Werk Castle, belonging to the Countess of Salisbury, falling upon some of his Troops that stayed behind, he was so incensed, that he resolved to take the Castle. He stormed it several times, but was bravely repulsed by the Countess's People, who was herself in the Place. This Resistance, and the News of Edward's Approach, made him desist. He could not retire more seasonably, since Edward came that very day to the Castle. He paid a Visit to the Countess of Salisbury (1), which has given occasion to some Historians to say, he fell desperately in Love with her. It would be easy to confute what they groundlessly advance; but as his Love, whether true or false, produced no remarkable Event, it will be needless to say any thing of it. Next day, Edward continued his march in quest of the Enemy, but being informed, the Scots were retired to Gedeour's (2) Forest, he ceased his Pursuit. As his Affairs were not yet in a good posture in Scotland, and this War was very unseasonable, with regard to the measures he was to take with France, he sent David an offer of a two Years Truce, which was accepted with Philip's Consent. This Truce helped the King of Scotland to fix himself more firmly in his Throne, and gave the King of England time to think of his other Affairs.

He concludes a Truce for two Years with David. Act. Pub. V. p. 379.

Edward's Thoughts for many Years were so wholly engrossed by Military Affairs, that he had not been able to find time to redress several Grievances complained of by the People, and which highly deserved a particular Attention. When the Truce with France and Scotland afforded him some Respite, he called a Parliament (3) to consult of means, to secure the Welfare and Tranquility of the Nation. During this Sessions, which lasted good part of the Winter, the Parliament made it their chief Business to enact divers Regulations, very beneficial to the People, and not opposed by the King. On the contrary, Edward very solemnly confirmed all the Liberties contained in the Magna Charta; shewing thereby, that he had no less at heart the Good of his People, than his own, or that of his Successors. Among the several Acts passed in this Parliament, one of the most important was the Statute of Provisors, that is, an Act against those who brought Provisions from the Court of Rome for Benefices. The former Popes very much abused the Power they assumed, to dispose of the Benefices of the Kingdom. Nay, without staying till they were vacant, they frequently conferred them on Persons, who were to take possession upon the death of the present Incumbents, which raised loud Complaints from the Patrons. Clement VI, proceeding, in this respect, farther than any of his Predecessors, the Parliament was forced to complain of it to him, but to manner of purpose. Instead of reforming this Abuse, which was the more intolerable, as all the Benefices were bestowed upon Foreigners, the Pope exhorted the King in a Letter, to withdraw the Complaints against the Provisions, which, in his Opinion, were an undeniable Prerogative of the Holy-See. This Letter shewing, it was in vain to expect any Redress from the Pope, the Parliament resolved to provide against this Evil by their own Authority. To that end, the fore-mentioned Statute was passed, whereby it was Death (4) for any Person, to bring for the future, the like Provisions into the Kingdom. Though this Statute extremely displeased the Pope, he thought fit to be silent, being informed that the King and Parliament were resolved to support it, and contemn his Censures, in Case he had recourse to them. However, not to suffer his pretended Right to be entirely lost, he feigned to take no notice of the Statute. But although he afterwards granted, from time to time, several Provisions, it was with such Caution, that the Abuse was considerably lessened during this whole Reign. On the other hand, the King, who had no mind to break entirely with the Court of Rome, was content with leaving the Statute in force, without a rigorous Execution. But in process of time, under Edward's Successors, the Popes returning to their former Courses, there was a necessity frequently to renew this Statute, which was called the Statute of Præmunire, containing, besides the Prohibition of Provisions, several other Cases concerning the Disputes with the Popes (5).

In this Parliament the King created Edward his eldest Son, Prince of Wales, and invested him with a Coronet, and a Ring of Gold: This Prince was then thirteen Years old, and gave great hopes of what he would one day prove.

Prince Edward created Prince of Wales.

Whilst Edward seemed wholly employed with domestick, he neglected not foreign, Affairs. His Mind was continually on the rack, to find means to renew the War with France, the moment the Truce was expired. He appeared however inclinable to Peace, and continued, at the Court of Rome, Negotiations, which daily met with fresh Obstacles. But, whether his View was only to amuse his Enemy by these Negotiations, or he expected them to be unsuccessful, he neglected not his Preparations for War. He had found so little Advantage in his Alliances with the Princes of Germany, and the Low-Countries, who had caused him to consume such immense Sums to no purpose, that he resolved to take another Course. To that end, he dispatched into the Low-Countries and Germany, Agents, with Power to treat with all sorts of Persons, that were willing to supply him with Men or Money. Besides that all these Aids, when drawn together, would produce the same Effect with much less Expence, he hoped to be able to dispose of his Troops more absolutely, than he had done those of the Princes. Moreover, his aim was to render Philip's intrigues more difficult, whereby he was perpetually endeavouring to corrupt his Allies. For the better accomplishing his Design, and to draw into his Kingdom Multitudes of foreign Lords, with whom he might in Person negotiate, he bethought himself of an Expedient, which could not fail of Success, because it was entirely agreeable to the Taste of that Age. He ordered Tournaments to be published, and gave an honorable Reception to all Persons of Distinction, that were pleased to be present, caressing them in such a manner, that they could never sufficiently admire his Politeness, Magnificence, and Liberality. To render these Entertainments the more solemn, and withal to free himself from the Ceremonies, to which the Difference of Rank and Condition would have obliged him, he caused a circular Hall of Boards to be run up at Windsor, two hundred foot in Diameter. There it was that he feasted (6) all the Knights at one Table, which was called the Round Table, in memory of the great Arthur, who, as it is pretended, instituted an Order of Knighthood by that Name. Next Year he caused a more solid Building to be erected, that he might continue yearly the same Diversions. During that time, he treated with these several Lords about the Aids wherewith each could furnish him, in proportion to his Forces. The Collection of the Publick Acts, is full of the Treaties with private Persons, managed either by himself, or his Agents. Philip could not see without Jealousy, Spaniards, Italians, Germans, Flemings, and Frenchmen themselves, flock to England to assist at the Tournaments. He suspected some hidden design in these Entertainments, and to break Edward's measures, caused the like to be published in his Dominions (7). This way of opposing his Enemy was in itself just and honorable; but soon after he used another means that was not so generally approved, and was attended with great Consequences. It is affirmed, that having drawn to Paris, under colour of a Tournament, Oliver de Clisson, and ten or twelve other Lords of Bretagne, who attended Charles de Blois, he commanded their Heads to be cut off, without any Formality of Justice. But it appears by a Letter from Edward to the Pope upon this occasion, that Philip did not allure these Lords to Paris, but apprehended them in Bretagne. As this Action was the Cause of breaking the Truce, it will be necessary to explain it; for there is no other way of knowing who was Author of the Rupture. Oliver de Clisson a Lord of Bretagne, having served Charles de Blois

1343. during the War, was taken Priſoner by Edward, who having probably gained him, conſented he ſhould be exchanged for an Engliſhman (1). Whether Philip had Proof of his having changed Sides, or only ſuſpected it, he ordered him to be apprehended in Bretagne, with ten or twelve Lords and Gentlemen, and conducted to Paris, where their Heads were ſtruck off. I believe I may venture to affirm, theſe Lords were apprehended in Bretagne, becauſe the Pope in his Anſwer to Edward's Letter, and in his vindication of Philip, to the utmoſt of his Power, ſaid not a word tending to the contrary. But perhaps ſome of theſe Lords or Gentlemen were ſeized at Paris, and the reſt in Bretagne, by Order of the King. What makes it ſo difficult to judge rightly of this Action of Philip's, is, that according to Froiſſart, Argentré, and all the French Hiſtorians, theſe Lords had all along eſpouſed the Quarrel of Charles de Blois, and yet Edward in his Letter to the Pope, calls them his Adherents (2). They muſt therefore have changed Sides, either publickly or privately, after the Truce, and this is difficult to know preciſely. It ſeems however, Edward would have had no reaſon to concern himſelf ſo much in this Affair, if theſe Lords had only been his private Adherents, whilſt outwardly they continued all along attached to the Intereſts of France. This, added to Edward's Letter to the Pope, ſeems to prove at leaſt, ſome of theſe Lords openly declared for the Earl of Montfort. Upon this Suppoſition, there is no doubt that Philip violated the Truce, in commanding them to be ſeized in Bretagne. But, on the other hand, if theſe Lords are ſuppoſed to have been only Edward's ſecret Friends ſince the Concluſion of the Truce, the two following Queſtions may be put. Firſt, whether Philip had a Right to cauſe them to be ſeized in Bretagne, during the Truce? Secondly, whether as Sovereign Lord of Bretagne, he might exerciſe ſuch a Power over theſe Lords, eſpecially as the putting them to Death in ſo illegal a manner, was rather a Murder than an Act of Juſtice? Be this as it will, Edward pretended that by this Action the Truce was violated, and Philip maintained, that Edward uſed this wrong pretence to break it.

But upon the Remonſtrances of Henry of Lancaſter, he altered his Reſolution. However, he ſent for Henry de Leon, one of the Priſoners, and told him with great Emotion, that though the Death of his Countrymen beheaded at Paris, was a ſufficient Reaſon to ſerve him in the ſame kind, he was unwilling to follow ſo bad an Example, or to revenge himſelf on the innocent, but intended to puniſh the Author himſelf of that Barbarity. Then he ſaid, though he might demand of him a Ranſom of thirty or forty thouſand Crowns, he would releaſe him for ten thouſand, on condition he would go in his Name and defy Philip, and declare to him, that having violated the Truce by this baſe Action, he muſt prepare for War.

These were not fruitleſs Menaces. Edward, in his Reſolution to puſh the War with more vigour than ever, ordered a Commiſſion to be drawn up, conſtituting the Earl of Northampton his Lieutenant-General in France; commanding him at the ſame time to defy Philip, and declare War againſt him by Sea and Land. Shortly after he ſent into Guienne, Henry of Lancaſter Earl of Derby (3), to begin Hoſtilities, till he ſhould be able to go thither himſelf, deſigning to exert himſelf moſt in that Province. Mean time, he ſent for John de Montfort into England, who had made his eſcape from Paris, and received his Homage for Bretagne. He received likewiſe the Homage of Jeoffrey de Harcourt (4), for his Lands in Normandy confiſcated by Philip; and promiſed by Letters Patent, either to recover his Eſtate, or give him an Equivalent in France or England. Shortly after, he publiſhed a Manifeſto, concerning all the Injuries received from Philip de Valois. After ſetting forth, he exhorted the French to own him for Sovereign, promiſing to exempt them from Taxes, and govern them according to the Laws and Cuſtoms obſerved in France, under St. Lewis his Predeceſſor. He forgot not to write to the Pope, to inform him of his Reaſons to renew the War. But the Pope's Anſwer plainly ſhowed him to be a partial Mediator. He not only excuſed Philip's Proceedings againſt the Lords of Bretagne, and charged Edward with being the firſt Violator of the Truce, but threatned alſo to exert his Apoſtolick Authority againſt him. This was ſufficient to convince Edward, he could expect no Favour from the Pope. Accordingly he addreſſed himſelf to him no more, but only for Form ſake, and to keep a Decorum (5).

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, Philip was trying to diſingage the Flemings from the Intereſt of England. Edward hearing of theſe Practices, ſuddenly paſſed into Flanders (6), where he ſtayed but three Weeks. At his Return, he pretended to have prevented the Miſchiefs, he had reaſon to fear from the Inconſtancy of the Flemings. But the Sequel ſhowed, he had flattered himſelf too much, or the Flemings had deceived him; ſince it is certain they never more gave him any Aſſiſtance.

Progreſs of the Earl of Derby. Froiſſart.

Mean time the Earl of Derby made a conſiderable Progreſs in Guienne, where he carried by Storm the Town of Bergerac, which was given up to be plundered (7). Hiſtory ought not to omit making honorable mention of the Generoſity of that General, ſeldom imitated by thoſe of our Days. Whilſt the Engliſh were buſy in plundering the Town, a Welſh Knight chanced to light upon the Receiver's Office. He found there ſuch a Quantity of Money, that he thought himſelf obliged to acquaint his General with it, imagining ſo great a Booty naturally belonged to him. But he was agreeably ſurprized, when the Earl told him with a pleaſant Countenance, that he wiſhed him Joy of his good fortune, and did not make his word to depend upon the Greatneſs or Smallneſs of the thing promiſed (8).

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, Edward loſt the Aſſiſtance of a powerful Ally, by the Death of James d' Arteville, who was torn in pieces by the Flemings (10). His Death entirely changing the face of Affairs in the Low-Countries, it was by no means proper to attack France from that quarter. For this reaſon Edward reſolved to carry the brunt of the War into Guienne. The Duke of Normandy had now entered that Province, at the head of ſixty thouſand Men (11), to ſtop the Progreſs of the Earl of Derby, and compleat the Conqueſt thereof. Upon the Approach of this formidable Army, the Earl left the Field, and retired to Bourdeaux. His Retreat giving the Duke of Normandy an opportunity of retaking ſeveral Places, he was at length engaged in the Siege of the Caſtle of Aiguillon, ſeated upon the Confluence of the Gironne and Lot. This Siege was very remarkable, as well for the vigorous Aſſaults of the Beſiegers, who for a whole Week, ſtormed the Town three times a day, as for the brave Defence of the Beſieged, who were not to be diſcouraged by ſo frequent Aſſaults. To relieve theſe brave Men, Edward haſtened his Preprrations, determining to go in Perſon, and oppoſe the Duke of Normandy's Progreſs (12).

1345. Every thing being ready for his Departure, he came to Southampton, bringing with him the Prince of Wales his eldeſt Son, about ſixteen Years old (1), who was to make his firſt Campaign. Before the Imbarkation of the Troops, he aſſembled his principal Officers, and "exhorted them ſo to behave, as ſhould render them worthy of his Eſteem, and the Rewards he deſigned for thoſe that diſcharged their Duty. He declared his Intention was to ſend back his Ships the moment he arrived in Guienne, and therefore it would be in vain to hope to ſee their own Country again, unleſs they returned victorious. He added, if any Man's Heart failed him, he need only ſpeak freely, and he ſhould inſtantly have his Leave to ſtay behind." This Speech being ſpread in the Army, the Soldiers cried out with one voice, they were ready to follow their King wherever he was pleaſed to lead them. So ſudden and univerſal a Reſolution, inſpiring him with great hopes, he imbarked his Troops with deſign to ſail for Guienne: But the Wind proving contrary, he was forceed to put back twice (2). Geoffry de Harcourt, who attended him, made uſe of this Juncture to perſwade him to land in Normandy, a very plentiful Country, which had been long exempted from the Calamities of War. Edward following his Advice, landed at la Hogue in le Cotentin, where he was by no means expected (3).

The moment he ſet foot on Shore, he knighted the Prince of Wales his Son, and ſeveral other young Lords (4), after which, he headed his Army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand five hundred Men at Arms. He divided his Troops into three Bodies, who marched ſeparately in the Day, but commonly rejoined in the Evening, in order to encamp all together. In their firſt marches, they revenged in a terrible manner, the death of the Lords beheaded at Paris. Valogne, St. Lo, Carentan, Harfleur, were the firſt Towns that felt the Fury of the Engliſh Arms. Ralph Earl of Eu, Conſtable of France, then at Caen, offering to oppoſe the Engliſh, with the Militia of the Country, ſerved only, by his being defeated and made Priſoner, for a happy Preſage of their future Victories. After the defeat of the Conſtable, Edward continued his march through the Biſhopricks of Liſieux and Evreaux, burning and plundering whatever came in his way. He halted not till he arrived at Poiſſi, where he ſtayed ſome Days to provoke Philip to engage, by ſending a Herald to him with a Defiance, which was not accepted. Philip had another deſign, and that was to incloſe him between the Seine and the Oyſe. Had this Project ſucceeded, the Engliſh Army would have been unavoidably ruined. But Edward perceiving his Intent, though ſomewhat of the lateſt, decamped from Poiſſi, in order to paſs the Somme, and take Shelter in Ponthieu; knowing his Enemy was advancing with an Army of a hundred thouſand Men. He marched a good way down the Somme, without finding any paſſage. At laſt, he was ſo happy as to diſcover the Ford of Blanchetaque, by means of a Priſoner (5), who was perfectly acquainted with the Country. Though this Diſcovery ſeemed at firſt a great Advantage, he quickly found the difficulties of his Retreat were not much leſſened. Philip foreſeeing, the Enemy might take that Rout to retire, detached Gondemar du Fay with a Body of twelve thouſand Men to guard that Ford, on which depended the Succeſs of his Deſigns. Edward ſaw himſelf therefore under a Neceſſity, either of forcing the Paſſage, or fighting with great diſadvantage his Enemy, who was cloſely purſuing him. Being come to a Reſolution, he ordered his Troops to advance, who, being animated by the Preſence of their King, caſt themſelves into the River with ſuch Intrepidity, that they began to vanquiſh their Enemies before they came to the Charge. One may eaſily imagine the difficulties which occur in ſuch a Paſſage, in the Face of the Enemy, for an Army which cannot enlarge its Front beyond the breadth of the Ford, and is obliged to march through the Water, and at the ſame time handle their Arms. But all this was not capable of ſtopping the Engliſh, who, in the Sight of their King, Witneſs of all their Actions, marched through all theſe Obſtacles, as to a certain Victory. It was not poſſible for the French to ſuſtain ſo furious an Attack. After ſome endeavours to repulſe the Engliſh, they were forced to abandon that important Paſſage, through which Edward immediately marched his whole Army. The ſame Evening (6) he encamped at Creſſy, whilſt Philip paſſed the Somme at Abbeville, but three Leagues from thence.

1347. Edward ſeeing himſelf ſo cloſely purſued, and perceiving it would be impoſſible to avoid fighting, ſtopped ſhort to expect his Enemies, and choſe an advantagious piece of Ground, where he drew up his Army. Philip being perſuaded, that Edward's Retreat was the effect of his Fear, did not queſtion, if he could but come up with him, he ſhould quickly vanquiſh him. Accordingly, not to afford him time to retire any further, he marched next day from Abbeville with deſign to attack him. The Engliſh Army was divided into three Bodies, of which the Prince of Wales commanded the firſt (7). The ſecond was led by the Earls of Northampton and Arundel (8) and the Lord Roſs. The King kept at ſome diſtance with the third (9), to aſſiſt thoſe that ſhould want it. Philip could not come in ſight of the Enemy till three in the Afternoon, having marched that Day three Leagues, ſo that it was almoſt four o' Clock when the Battle began. He had likewiſe divided his Army (10) into three Bodies, the firſt whereof conſiſted of Genoeſe (11), under the Command of Antonio Doria, and Carolo Grimaldi. As the chief Strength of his Infantry lay in theſe Troops, he would have them charge firſt. Juſt as the Battle was going to begin, a great and ſudden Rain ſlackening the Strings of the Genoeſe Croſs-Bows, they became unſerviceable. However, as they were now too far advanced, they ſaw themſelves expoſed to a Shower of Engliſh Arrows, which made them give ground. Charles Earl of Alenſon, the King's Brother, who ſupported them with a great Body of Horſe, ſeeing them give way, without knowing the Cauſe, imagined there was Treachery, and immediately ordered the Horſe to fall upon them, by which raſh Action he began to put the French Army in Diſorder (12). Mean time, the Earl never troubling himſelf about the Genoeſe, nor minding what paſſed behind him, attacked the firſt Body of the Engliſh, commanded by the Prince of Wales, and was received with a Firmneſs he little expected. He continued however his Endeavours, which only cauſed him to loſe his Life, valiantly fighting. By his Death the Body he commanded began by degrees to ſtagger, and as they could not be ſpeedily ſupported, by reaſon of the Diſorder cauſed by themſelves among the Genoeſe Troops, were at length put to Flight.

The Body commanded by Alenſon defeated.

The Prince of Wales having ſo great an Advantage in this firſt Onſet, Philip ordered a numerous Body of Horſe to advance, to repair the diſorder cauſed by the Defeat of the firſt. Thus the French had always the Superiority of Number, though the Engliſh ſtill kept their Ground. In all appearance the young Prince, who fought with an heroic Courage, determined to conquer or dye, would have been overpowered by Numbers, if the Earls of Northampton and Arundel had not come to his Relief. Their Approach drew thither more French Troops, the ſmall extent of the Field not permitting the two Armies to engage all at once. So the Fight was very obſtinate. The Valour of the Prince of Wales, which filled the Engliſh Generals with Admiration, made them at the ſame time extremely uneaſy with regard to his Perſon, becauſe of the ſuperior Number of the Enemies.

1346. mies. Apprehenſive that ſome Misfortune might happen to him in the end, they ſpeedily ſent the King Word, that it was time to come to the Prince's Relief, who was like to be oppreſſed by Numbers. Far from being moved at this Meſſage, Edward asked, whether his Son was ſtill alive? and being told, he was not only alive, but fighting with an aſtoniſhing Valour, replied to the Meſſenger, Tell my Generals, that as long as my Son is alive, let them ſend no more to me, for the Honour of this Day ſhall be his, and he muſt now merit his Spurs. This Anſwer inſpiring the Prince with freſh Courage, he broke through his Enemies who were ready to ſurround him. His Troops imitating his heroic Bravery, ſeconded him ſo well, that the French began to give ground, and at length to diſperſe in confuſion.

The King leaves the Honour of the Day to his Son. Ibid.

Philip had one Body left which had not yet engaged, at the head whereof he was himſelf. Towards this Body the Prince of Wales directed his Steps, after routing the other two; and in this laſt Action it was that he acquired the greateſt Honour. Philip, inraged to ſee his two Bodies routed and diſperſed, performed Wonders, to ſnatch the Victory from the young Heroe before it was compleat. The King of Bohemia, who, though blind, would be preſent at the Battle, cauſing his Horſe's Bridle to be tied to thoſe of two brave Knights, was ſlain according to his Wiſh, in fighting for France. His Standard, on which were embroidered in Gold, three Oſtrich-Feathers, with theſe Words, ICH DIEN, that is I SERVE, was taken and brought to the Prince of Wales, who, in memory of that Day, bore three Oſtrich-Feathers for his Creſt (1), with the ſame Motto. Mean time Edward, who ſtood with his Troops on a riſing Ground, watched the proper time to charge, being unwilling however to make too much haſte, for fear of robbing the Prince his Son of part of his Glory. But in this ſtate of inaction, he failed not to ſtrike Terror into the French, who ſaw him ready to fall upon them with Advantage. Philip for his part, after many fruitleſs Attempts to repulſe the Engliſh, rallied ſome of his Nobles and Men at Arms, and threw himſelf into the midſt of the Battle, in order to animate his Troops by his Example. It muſt be confeſſed, that on this occaſion he gave ſignal Proofs of an undaunted Valour. It was not till after being twice diſmounted, and wounded in his Neck and Thigh, that he ſuffered himſelf to be led, though with extreme Pain, out of the Field of Battle. His Retreat quite diſcouraging thoſe of his Men that ſtill maintained the Fight, they were entirely routed with the reſt of the Army. Then it was that a dreadful Slaughter enſued of the flying Troops, who were purſued till the Night was far advanced. It is affirmed, that in this memorable Battle, the Engliſh began for the firſt time to uſe Cannon, a thing yet unheard of in France. Four Pieces, planted on a little Hill, did great Execution among the French Troops, and ſtruck them with ſuch Terror, that the Succeſs of this Day is partly aſcribed to the Surprize of the French at this Novelty. France loſt in this Battle, the King of Bohemia, the Earl of Alenſon Brother of the King, the Duke of Lorrain, the Earl of Flanders, the Earl of Blois, fifteen other great Lords of the Kingdom, twelve hundred Knights, and above fourſcore Standards.

When Edward found, by the haſty Flight of the Enemies, that his Victory was certain, he advanced to ſhow his Son Marks of his extreme Satisfaction. Dear Son, ſaid he, embracing him in his Arms, You have acquitted yourſelf nobly this Day, and truly deſerve the Crown for which you have fought. The young Prince, out of Countenance at the King's Commendations, with a modeſt Silence, fell on his Knees, and asked his Father's Bleſſing, according to the Cuſtom practiſed in England. The Night of this glorious Day was ſpent by the Engliſh in Rejoycings. But the King publiſhed in the Camp expreſs orders, not to inſult over the Misfortunes of the vanquiſhed, exhorting his Army to return God Thanks for the Victory he was pleaſed to give them. On the morrow, ſome Troops, ſent to purſue the flying Enemy, meeting a Body of Militia, who, without knowing what had happened, were marching to Philip's Camp, ſlew ſeven thouſand. It is ſaid, the loſs France ſuſtained on the ſecond Day, was greater than that of the Battle, as well by the defeat of the Militia, as by the Slaughter, or taking of the Soldiers, who in flying, were diſperſed in the Country (2).

Edward continued ſome Days near the Field of Battle, to bury the dead, and take care of the wounded, as well thoſe of the Enemy, as his own. Then marching through le Boulonnois, he approached Calais, in order to beſiege it. This Place, which was exceeding ſtrong, was no leſs incommodious to the Engliſh, than Dunkirk has been in our days. In becoming maſter of it, he not only freed himſelf from a very troubleſome Neighbourhood, but alſo opened a way into France. He inveſted it on the 8th of September, and ſummoned the Governor to ſurrender, threatning, in caſe of refuſal, to put the Garriſon and Inhabitants all to the Sword. John de Vienne, the Governor, anſwered, He owned no other King of France but the Perſon that committed to him the cuſtody of the Town, in whoſe Service he was reſolved to live and die.

The King having taken an exact view of the Fortifications of Calais, found it would be very difficult to accompliſh the Siege by force; ſo from the firſt, reſolved to reduce the Place by Famine. For that purpoſe, he drew round the Town four Lines of Circumvallation, with regular Fortifications, reſolvedly bent not to relinquiſh his Enterprize till accompliſhed. The Governor, who ſaw the Preparations, foreſeeing the length of the Siege, took care to ſend away all uſeleſs Mouths, that he might not be expoſed to the Danger of wanting Proviſions. Though, according to the Maxims of War, Edward was not obliged to take pity of theſe Wretches, who were to the Number of ſeventeen hundred, he received them however into the Camp (3), and gave them leave afterwards to go where they pleaſed (4).

Froiſſart. Ibid.

Mean time, Philip, who was very uneaſy concerning this Siege, ſought all poſſible means to raiſe it. He ſaw but two proper for that purpoſe. The firſt, which was to attack the Lines of the Beſiegers, could not be ſoon enough put in practice, to hope the Town would hold out till he was able to relieve it. The ſecond was, to make a Diverſion in England by the Arms of the Scots. This being deemed the ſpeedieſt, he engaged the King of Scotland to make an Inroad into England. He did not queſtion its Succeſs, becauſe all the Engliſh Forces were employed in France. It was to be preſumed, the Alarm cauſed by this Invaſion, would raiſe ſuch Commotions in England, that Edward would be forced to raiſe the Siege he had undertaken. David, looking upon the Intereſt of France as his own, and readily following the Suggeſtions of Philip, put himſelf at the head of thirty thouſand Men (5), and advanced as far as Durham (6). This unexpected Invaſion, at ſuch a Juncture, alarmed the Engliſh, but however was not capable of diſheartening them. Young Lionel, left by the King his Father Guardian of the Realm, not being yet of Age to command an Army, Queen Philippa took upon her to repulſe the Enemy. To that end, heading the Troops, drawn together from all parts with wonderful Expedition, ſhe marched directly to the Scots, and offered them Battle. David was no leſs impatient to engage. He imagined nothing more eaſy, than to put to flight undiſciplined Troops, commanded by a Woman. But the Succeſs did not anſwer his Expectations. He not only had the mortification to loſe the Day, but alſo to ſee himſelf a Priſoner in the hands of the Engliſh (7).

But however Copland conveyed him away out of the Field a Priſoner. Upon his refuſing to deliver him up to the Queen (who ſtayed at Newcaſtle during the Battle) the King ſent for him to Calais, where he excuſed his Refuſal ſo handſomely, that the King ſent him back with the Reward of five hundred Pounds a Year in Land, where he himſelf ſhould chuſe it near his own Dwelling, and made him a Knight Banneret. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 5. p. 542. Froiſ. l. 1. c. 140, 141. Buchanan. l. 9.

Philip tries in vain to relieve Calais. Act. Pub. V. p. 562, 564. Froiſſart. Mezerai. Knighton. Walſing.

Mean time, the Siege, or rather Blockade of Calais, was ſtill continued by Sea and Land. Edward had ſent for ſeven hundred Ships to guard the Sea. As therefore nothing could be brought into the Town, it was at laſt reduced to Extremity. The ſad Condition of the Beſieged being diſcovered to the King by an intercepted Letter, he ſent it immediately to Philip, and withal bid the Meſſenger tell him, he had no time to loſe, if he intended to relieve the Place. Philip improving this Intelligence, ſpeedily took the Field, and approached the Engliſh Camp with an Army of one Hundred and fifty thouſand Men. He hoped to draw the Enemy out of his Intrenchments, by offering him Battle ſeveral times. But Edward was too wiſe to run any hazard, well knowing the Impoſſibility of forcing his Lines: Beſides, he had good reaſon to expect, the Town would quickly be at his Mercy. So, without being moved with all theſe Defiances, he conſtantly anſwered, his Buſineſs there was to take Calais, and if Philip thought fit to hinder him, he had only to take the moſt proper meaſures. Philip ſeeing he could not without manifeſt danger attack him in his Intrenchments, nor draw him into the open Field, ſent two Cardinals with Propoſals of Peace. He offered him Guienne, the Earldom of Ponthieu, and a Marriage between their Children. Edward made a jeſt of theſe Offers. He replied, Guienne and Ponthieu belonged to him; that he ſhould quickly be maſter of Calais, and ſo had no need of his Bounties. This Project not ſucceeding, Philip propoſed to him by a Herald, to decide their Quarrel by a Combat of ſix on each Side. The Herald adding, the King of France would appoint the Time and Place, the Earl of Derby made anſwer, That muſt be Edward then, ſince he is the true King of France. This Pretenſion alone, was ſufficient to cauſe the Propoſal to fall to the ground, to which it is certain Edward, in his preſent Circumſtances, had no Inclination. His ſole Aim was to take Calais, without putting that event to Arbitration. A few days after, he received a Recruit of ſeventeen thouſand Men, brought him by his Queen from England. If we may believe ſome Engliſh Hiſtorians, this Supply came very ſeaſonably, to enable him to have his Revenge of Philip. It is affirmed, he offered to fight him in open Field; to fill up his Trenches himſelf, and demoliſh his Works, provided he might have ſufficient Security that nothing ſhould be conveyed into Calais till after the Battle. It is added, that Philip refuſing this offer, choſe to retire. Thus much is certain, he did not think proper to attack Edward in his Intrenchments. So, the Beſieged deſpairing of being relieved, deſired at length to capitulate. A Capitulation, deferred till the laſt Extremity, could not be of any great Advantage. Accordingly, Edward refuſed the Beſieged all manner of Terms but That of Life, which he was willing to grant both to the Soldiers and the Inhabitants. However, he excepted, out of the laſt, ſix of the principal Burghers, to ſacrifice them to his Vengeance, leaving the Inhabitants to chuſe the Victims themſelves. This Severity cauſed a great Conſternation in the Town. It was very difficult to chuſe theſe ſix Perſons, and yet there was no time to loſe. Hiſtory ought not to paſs over in Silence the generous Action of Euſtace de St. Pierre, one of the chief Inhabitants. This brave Burgher ſeeing Fear and Deſpair painted on the Faces of his Countrymen, voluntarily offered himſelf to be one of the ſix. So uncommon a Magnanimity affected the reſt to ſuch a degree, that five more were quickly found, who, after his Example, devoted themſelves for the Preſervation of their Townſmen. Theſe ſix illuſtrious Burghers, bent to appeaſe the Conqueror's Rage, by the Sacrifice of their Lives, went out bare-footed, in their Shirts, with Halters about their Necks, and preſented to him the Keys of the Town. They found him ſo highly incenſed, that notwithſtanding the Interceſſion of the Prince of Wales, and of the great Men about him, he commanded them to be led to Execution. But if he had Reſolution enough to refuſe that favour to the preſſing Inſtances of his Son, he could not find in his Heart the ſame Inſenſibility for the Queen. This good Princeſs, moved with the Misfortune of theſe miſerable Men, caſting herſelf at his Feet, intreated him with Tears in her Eyes, to pardon them for Chriſt's ſake. How reſolved ſoever he might be, he could not behold at his Feet a Queen, whom he ſo tenderly loved, without feeling his Heart relent, and in ſpite of the Reſolution he had armed himſelf with, was overcome by her Intreaties. The Queen, not content with ſaving the Lives of theſe unfortunate Men, ordered Cloaths to be brought them; and after giving them an Entertainment in her own Tent, diſmiſſed them with a Preſent to each of ſix pieces of Gold. An Action which did then, and ever will, redound to the Honour of that generous Princeſs.

Thus the important Town of Calais, after a Year's Siege, became ſubject to the Dominion of the Engliſh (1).

A few days after Edward had made his Entry into Calais, he turned out all the Inhabitants, in order to people it with Engliſh. Probably, this Precaution was the means of England's keeping that Place two hundred Years. The Siege had been ſo long and fatiguing, that Edward thought himſelf obliged to give his Troops ſome repoſe, by conſenting to a Truce propoſed to him for one Year. Which done, he left a ſtrong Garriſon in Calais (2), and returned in triumph to England (3).

Never had the Engliſh Name been more glorious than at this time; and never had England enjoyed a more compleat Happineſs. If the Valour, Wiſdom, and good Fortune of the King, gave an extraordinary Luſtre to the Realm, the rare Qualities of the brave Prince of Wales, Heir-Apparent to the Crown, afforded no leſs hopes for the future. The prodigious Plenty which immediately followed Edward's Victories, ſeemed alſo to demonſtrate, that Heaven took a peculiar Care of the Engliſh (4).

1348. To add ſtill a freſh Luſtre to Edward's Glory, Ambaſſadors from Germany arrived the next Year, with offers of the Imperial Dignity. The Election of Charles IV, who was now crowned at Bonn, not being agreeable to all the Electoral Princes, ſome (5) were reſolved to make a new Choice. To that end, they caſt their Eyes on the King of England, whom the Battle of Creſſy, and taking of Calais, had rendered very famous. But Edward, who was not ignorant how much the acceptance of this Dignity, at a like Juncture, had coſt Richard, Brother of Henry III, was too wiſe to throw himſelf into the ſame Difficulties. Beſides, he had need of all his Forces and Endeavours to acquire the Crown of France, which to him ſeemed a more ſubſtantial Good. On theſe accounts, he refuſed the Honour intended him by the German Princes, and declined taking ſo great a Burden upon him (6).

Edward refuſes the Imperial Dignity. Act. Pub. V. p. 622. Knighton.

1339. During the Proſperity enjoyed by the Engliſh, it is no wonder that Eaſe and Plenty threw them into the Exceſſes, that are the uſual Attendants thereof. All the Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, an unbridled Debauchery at this time prevailed throughout the Kingdom; and the Women, laying aſide their Modeſty, the great Ornament of their Sex, ſeemed to glory in the Loſs of their Virtue. Nothing was more common, than to ſee them riding in Troops to our Tournaments, dreſſed like Cavaliers, with Swords by their Sides, and mounting their Steeds adorned with rich Trappings, without any regard to their Honour or Reputation. The Mens Exceſſes were no leſs ſcandalous. God permitted not theſe Diſorders to go long unpuniſhed. Philip corrupts the Governor of Calais. Froiſſart. Mezerai. Walſing.

Though this terrible Scourge had been no more favorable to France, Philip was making great Preparations to renew the War, with a reſolution to uſe all poſſible Endeavors to recover Calais. The loſs of that Place lay heavy upon his Mind, becauſe of the Conſequences which he plainly foreſaw. However, as he rightly judged, it would be very difficult to retake the Town by Force of Arms, he reſolved to uſe a ſurer way, by bribing the Governor. The Lords of Montmorency and Charny, to pleaſe their Maſter, very readily took upon them the execution of this Project, and the Ignominy of the Action. But what Mezerai ſays is not very likely, that they thought it no great fault to ſurprize the Town during the Truce. In all appearance, their Ignorance was not ſo great. However that be, they held private Intelligence with Aymeri de Pavia the Governor, who promiſed to deliver up the Place for twenty thouſand Crowns. This Sum being ſent him, he found means to introduce by degrees into the Town a hundred Men at Arms, and twelve French Knights, whom he concealed in the Caſtle (2). On the day appointed for the Performance of his Promiſe, the Lords of Charny and Ribaumont lay in Ambuſh near the two Gates of the Town, in order to ruſh in as ſoon as they were opened. So juſt were their meaſures, that they thought themſelves ſure of Succeſs. But they did not know all that had paſſed. A little before, Edward receiving ſome Intelligence of the Plot, ſent for the Governor to London, and promiſed him Pardon, on condition he would betray the French. The Villain, perceiving himſelf inevitably ruined if he refuſed to comply with the King, fully informed him of all the Circumſtances of the Plot, and the day agreed upon to let the Enemies into the Town. By this means Edward knowing how matters ſtood, ordered it ſo, that he came the Evening before to Calais, attended by the Prince of Wales, and eight hundred Men at Arms (3). On the morrow by break of day, he ſallied out at one Gate, and the Prince of Wales at the other, to attack the French, who little expected any ſuch thing. The King, who was pleaſed to fight on foot, under the Banner of the Lord Walter de Manny, ingaged in ſingle Combat with Euſtace de Ribaumont, a Knight of Picardy, by whoſe fierce Blows he was twice ſtruck down on his Knees. The ſpeedy Relief he received from his own Men, freed him from this danger, and even enabled him to defeat Ribaumont's Troop, and take him Priſoner.

Edward has notice of it.

Whilſt the King was thus employed, the Prince of Wales vigorouſly charged the Lord Charny, who, after a long Reſiſtance, was at length defeated, and taken Priſoner by the Prince. The French loſt in this Action ſix hundred Men, beſides a good Number of Priſoners, who, with their two Leaders, were brought into the Town, of which a few hours before they hoped to be Maſters (4). Though the way they had uſed was far from being honorable, Edward conſidering it was in obedience to their Sovereign, treated them very civilly. That very Evening he entertained the principal Priſoners with a ſplendid Supper, and was even pleaſed to come and ſee them whilſt at Table. He could not forbear upbraiding Charny with the infamous means he had uſed, to take from him by Treachery, and during the Truce, a Place that coſt him ſo dear, and was fairly won. Then addreſſing himſelf to Ribaumont, he greatly commended his Valour, and made him a Preſent of a String of Pearls of great value, which he wore in his Cap, as a Teſtimony of his Eſteem. He added, that hearing he was a great Admirer of the Ladies, he deſired him to wear it in their Company, telling him, they would not look upon him with leſs favorable Eyes. After ſeveral other obliging Expreſſions, he gave him his Liberty without any Ranſom. Before he left Calais, he made John de Beauchamp (5) Governor, not thinking it prudent to truſt any longer the Cuſtody of that important Place in the Hands of a Lombard, who had ſuffered himſelf to be bribed. But this was not all the Puniſhment the Traitor received for his double Treachery. The next Year, he had the misfortune to fall into the hands of the French, who cauſed him to be torn in Pieces with four Horſes.

The Attempt upon Calais failing, contrary to the expectation of the French, Philip diſowned the Authors. As Edward was not ready to renew the War, he was contented with that ſlight Satisfaction; ſo the Truce ſtill ſubſiſted, notwithſtanding the juſt Cauſe given by Philip to break it.

Inſtitution of the Order of the Garter. Walſing. Aſhmole.

Edward having nothing more to do at Calais, returned to England, where ſoon after he inſtituted the famous Order of the Garter (6). According to the common opinion, this Order owes its Origin to an Accident in itſelf of little Importance, but in regard to its Conſequences very remarkable, if it be true, that it gave Birth to the Inſtitution of this Order of Knighthood. It is ſaid, that Edward being at a Ball, where the Counteſs of Salisbury in dancing dropped her Garter, ſtooped to take it up; that the Lady imagining he had ſome other deſign, and ſhowing her Surprize, he ſaid to her, to clear himſelf, Honi ſoit qui Mal y Penſe, Evil to him that Evil thinks. It is added, that in Memory of this Accident, he inſtituted the Order of the Garter, to which he gave for Motto, the Words ſpoken to the Counteſs. An Origin, ſo little worthy of the Luſtre wherewith this Order has all along ſhone ſince its Inſtitution, appears at firſt ſight ſo very offenſive, that ſeveral ingenious Wits have endeavored to find out a more honorable. Some affirm, the Reaſon of Edward's inſtituting this Order, was, becauſe on the day of the Battle of Creſſy, he had given Garter for the Word. Others ſay, it was, becauſe on that day he ordered his Garter to be fixed at the end of a Lance for a ſignal of Battle. Laſtly, there are who advance, that Edward only revived and regulated an Order of Knighthood, begun by King Richard I, at the Siege of Acres in Paleſtine. They ſay, King Richard reſolving to ſtorm the Town, diſtributed to ſome of his principal Officers certain Leather-Strings to be tied round the Leg, to diſtinguiſh them during the Aſſault, and in memory of that Event, Edward inſtituted the Order of the Garter. But all this is ſaid without ſufficient Proof. Beſides, whatever Endeavors have been uſed to give this Order a different Origine from the firſt above-mentioned, nothing has hitherto been found ſatisfactory concerning the reaſon of the Motto, HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE. The Motto agrees very well with the firſt Circumſtance, but has no Connexion with thoſe ſubſtituted in its room. It is no leſs uncertain why the Knights wear the Garter on their Left rather than on the Right Leg, or why the Founder choſe to put the Order under the Protection of St. George. But this is certain, that great Prince's Deſign was to ingage the preſent and future Knights to diſtinguiſh themſelves by their Courage and Virtue. This of all the like Orders has beſt adhered to the Rules of its Inſtitution. More antient than thoſe of the Golden-Fleece (7), and Holy Ghoſt (8), it has never degenerated as to the Number, which has all along been twenty ſix, including the Sovereign of the Order, who is always the Perſon that wears the Crown of England. However glorious Edward had hitherto been, he diſdained not to hazard his Reputation, in an Affair which ſeemed below his notice. But the greatneſs of his Courage would not ſuffer him to weigh too nicely ſuch ſort of Conſiderations. The Merchants complaining of certain Spaniſh Ships infeſting the Coaſts of England, and doing them much Damage, he promiſed to clear the Seas of them. To that end, aſſembling ſuch of his Ships as were ſooneſt ready, he would go himſelf and give chace to the Corſairs. He fought and defeated them (2), took twenty of their Ships, ſunk many more, and diſperſed the reſt. This Action, though in itſelf of little Importance, ſeemed to him ſo glorious, that he cauſed a Gold Coin to be ſtruck, whereon he was repreſented in a Ship with his Cutlaſs in his Hand, in order to perpetuate the Memory thereof (3).

1350. Death of Philip de Valois. John ſucceeds. Mezerai. Walſing. Act. Pub. V. p. 690.

Philip de Valois lived not to ſee the end of the Truce made with Edward. He died the 22d of Auguſt 1350, leaving for Succeſſor his Son John, who renewed the Truce till Whitſontide 1354. But it was ill obſerved on both Sides. In Bretagne, Gaſcoigne, Picardy, frequent Hoſtilities were committed, which occaſioned mutual Complaints and even Repriſals, each Party throwing the Blame on his Enemy. The Earl of Derby, honoured with the Title of Duke of Lancaſter (4), was ſent to Calais with an Army, as if it had been open War. He made Inroads into the French Territories, and ravaged the Country from Calais to Terouenne. The greateſt Advantage Edward reaped by the Non-Obſervance of the Truce, was the Acquiſition of the Town of Guiſnes ſold him by the Governour. When King John complained of it, Edward replied, that his Father Philip, by attempting to purchaſe Calais, had taught the Engliſh Commanders that Buying and Selling was no Breach of a Truce (5).

The Flemings fall off from Edward.

This Advantage however did not balance the Loſs ſuſtained by Edward in Flanders, by the entire Defection of the Flemings. Hitherto they had been his Friends, but for ſome time paſt, the Face of Affairs was entirely changed in that Country. After the Death of the Earl of Flanders, ſlain at the Battle of Creſſy, the Flemings ſent Deputies to Philip de Valois, to demand the Son of their deceaſed Sovereign, under colour of putting him in poſſeſſion of his Father's Inheritance. Philip conſenting to their Requeſt, when they had the young Prince in their Power, they contracted him to one of Edward's Daughters. This Accident would doubtleſs have been very prejudicial to 1352. Philip, if the Earl himſelf had not freed him from this. The young Prince, who by Education was wholly attached to the Intereſts of France, not bearing the thoughts of marrying into the Family of his Sovereign's Enemy, privately withdrew from his Subjects, and caſt himſelf again into his Arms. From thenceforward the Flemings began by degrees to be diſingaged from the Intereſts of England. They even approved of the Marriage concluded by Philip between their Earl and the Duke of Brabant's Daughter, who had entirely forſaken Edward (6). Their Levity was the Cauſe that the Staple (7) of the Engliſh Wool, ſet up in their Country, was removed into England, to

The new King of France ſeemed to be extremely deſirous that the Truce might be changed into a firm and laſting Peace, to which Edward was not averſe. In the Negotiations on this occaſion, John offered to reſign to the King of England, Guienne, with the Earldoms of Artois and Guiſnes, to hold them in full Sovereignty, without Homage to the Crown of France (9). But preſently after, to his own, as well as to his Kingdom's Misfortune, he abruptly broke off the Negotiation, which ended only in prolonging the Truce till April the next Year.

1354. Project of Peace between the two Crowns. Walſing. Act. Pub. V. p. 772, 779, 851. p. 781.

It was not difficult to perceive that the King of France ſought only to gain time, to enable himſelf the better to maintain the War. Edward was very ſenſible of it, but had himſelf need of ſome reſpite, in order to ſettle ſome domeſtick Affairs of Importance. The Obſtinacy of the Scots in ſupport of their King, though a Priſoner, fully convinced him, it would not be eaſy to reduce Scotland, as long as he was at War with France. This Conſideration inclined him to patch up a Peace with the Scots, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity to renew the War. But this Peace could not be made without their King's Releaſe; ſo firmly did they inſiſt upon that Article. To ſettle this Affair, Edward appointed Commiſſioners (10) to treat with the Scots, concerning King David's Liberty. This Negotiation, which was prolonged for ſome time, ended at length in a Treaty concluded at Newcaſtle, July the 13th, 1354, whereby Edward promiſed to free David for a Ranſom of ninety thouſand Marks of Silver. This Treaty was ratified a little after by the Prince of Wales his Son, but was not executed for Reaſons mentioned hereafter. So David continued a Priſoner till 1357 (11).

Treaty about the King of Scotland's Liberty. Act. Pub. V. p. 733, 787, 791, 792, 799. VI. p. 31, 46, &c. Knighton.

When this Treaty was concluded, Edward conſidering from henceforth the Affairs of Scotland as of little moment, applied himſelf chiefly to thoſe of France. The Truce being about to expire, he inveſted the Prince of Wales his Son with the Duchy of Guienne; and ſending him thither, commanded him to renew the Hoſtilities (12). Some affirm, King John had now inveſted the Dauphin Charles his Son, with that Duchy, and thereby occaſioned a Rupture. But there is no mention of this Circumſtance either in the French Hiſtories, or in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Beſides, it is certain the War was not renewed till after the Expiration of the Truce. Whilſt the Prince of Wales was preparing to renew the War in Guienne, the King his Father landing at Calais (13), ravaged Boulonnois and Artois without oppoſition. Upon this News, the King of France ſpeedily aſſembled his Forces. At the ſame time, he ſent Edward a Defiance, offering to fight him alone, or at the head of their Armies: At leaſt, this is what the French Hiſtorians affirm; adding, that Edward declined it, and knowing John was approaching to give him Battle, retired into England. The Engliſh, on the contrary, maintain, the Defiance was ſent by Edward, and refuſed by John. The wonder is, that the Collection of the Publick Acts makes no mention of this Expedition of Edward, though 1354. whenever the Kings of England went beyond Sea, a Memorandum of the day, both of their departure and return, is hardly ever omitted. But ſince the Hiſtorians of both Nations ſpeak of Edward's going to Calais, a bare negative Proof is not ſufficient to invalidate their Teſtimony. However, if Edward returned ſo haſtily, it is certain, that very important Reaſons called him home. The Scots having taken Berwick by Surprize, it was very dangerous to leave in their Hands a Place of that Importance, which gave them at all times an Inlet into England. To retake this Town was the occaſion of Edward's haſtening his return (1).

The Scots ſurprize Berwick. Buchanan. Walſing.

Immediately after his Arrival he called a Parliament (2), complaining of the Treachery of the Scots, who, after a Treaty concluded and ratified, abuſed his good Faith, by the Seducements of the King of France. The Parliament knowing the Neceſſity of recovering Berwick, and the King's want of Money to continue the War with France, granted him fifty Shillings upon every Sack of Wool (3) ſold in the Kingdom. It is ſaid, this Subſidy amounted to more than three hundred and fifty thouſand Marks a Year, ſo conſiderable was the woollen Trade in thoſe Days. With this Aid the King quickly raiſed an Army, at the Head of which he advanced to the Borders of Scotland. Upon his Approach, the Scots quitted Berwick (4), after demoliſhing the Fortifications, which he revenged by ravaging their Country (5). This unexpected Rupture of the Scots ſurprized him the more, as he had juſt made a Treaty with them, for releaſing their King, and only ſtayed for the payment of the Ranſom agreed upon. This Proceeding of theirs quite altered the King's mind as to Peace, and cauſed him to take a new Reſolution, with reſpect to the Affairs of Scotland (6).

Aveſbury. Walſing. Edward retakes Berwick. Hect. Boeth. Walſing. Knighton.

1355. After Baliol's Expulſion, he ſtill kept the Title of King, but without any real Power, and in ſo ſervile a Dependence on the King of England, that he was looked upon only as a Subject. It is true, Edward left him the Command of his Troops, but they were ſo very few, that he was never able to make any Progreſs. So he ſpent his Days in a melancholy manner, with a Penſion of five Marks a Day, allowed him by Edward, and ſome Preſents for his extraordinary Expences. There are manifeſt Proofs of his great Dependence in the Collection of the Publick Acts, particularly in the frequent Pardons for hunting in Edward's Foreſts. He was therefore but the Shadow of a King, made uſe of hitherto by Edward to compaſs his Ends. It was needleſs for the King to wear the Maſk any longer, all his Proceedings plainly ſhewing he had been labouring more for himſelf than for Baliol. Laying aſide therefore the Scruples by which he had till then been reſtrained, or rather throwing off the Cloak under which he had concealed his Intentions, he cauſed that Prince to reſign all his Right to Scotland (7) for the yearly Penſion of two thouſand Pounds Sterling; a poor Recompence for a Crown, had it not been an imaginary Crown, which Baliol was very willing to part with. This Reſignation proved fatal to King David. He had thereby the Mortification to ſee himſelf more cloſely confined, and to loſe withal the hopes he had conceived of recovering his Liberty (8).

Charles de Blois releaſed. P. 746, 862. Knighton.

Charles de Blois Priſoner in England, ſince the Battle of la Roche de Rien, was more fortunate than the King of Scotland, at leaſt with regard to his Liberty, though it was purchaſed at a very dear rate. He articled with Edward to pay ſeven hundred thouſand Crowns for his Ranſom, and left his two Sons in Hoſtage for Security of Payment (9).

1356. Whilſt Edward was employed at home, the Prince of Wales ravaged the ſouthern Provinces of France, and particularly Languedoc. He made into that Province a ſudden Irruption, which rendered him Maſter of Carcaſſone and Narbonne, where he met with a very great Booty, and then returned to Bourdeaux. By his retreat, the Meaſures to oppoſe his Invaſion being neglected, he thought he might ſafely venture upon a ſecond. As ſoon as his Troops were a little refreſhed, he marched again (10) at the head of twelve thouſand Men, of whom not above three thouſand were Natives of England. He traverſed le Perigord and le Limouſin, entered Berry, and appeared before the Gates of Bourges. But the News of the King of France's approach, with ſixty thouſand Men, prevented his beſieging that Place, and even obliged him to take a Compaſs in order to retire to Bourdeaux. But John, foreſeeing his deſign, marched with ſuch Expedition, that he overtook him near Poictiers. It being impoſſible for the Prince to retreat, he reſolved to intrench himſelf at Maupertuis, in a Poſt incumbered with Vines and Hedges, and of a very difficult Acceſs. Two Legates ſent by the Pope to the two Princes, to perſuade them to Peace, uſed their utmoſt Endeavours to prevent an Engagement. They even induced the Prince of Wales to promiſe to repair all the Damages done in his Incurſion, and engage not to bear Arms againſt France for ſeven Years. John's Superiority cauſing him to reject theſe Offers, he expected the Prince, with his whole Army, ſhould ſurrender at diſcretion (11). This Condition not being reliſhed by the Prince, he generouſly replied, he had rather dye Sword in Hand, than be guilty of a thing contrary to his Honour, and the Glory of the Engliſh Name.

Offers of the Prince are rejected.

All hopes of Agreement vaniſhing, the Prince of Wales made a ſhort Speech to his Troops, telling them, "That "Victory depended not on Numbers, but on Bravery: "That for his own part, he was reſolved to conquer or "dye, and would not expoſe his Country to the diſ"grace of paying his Ranſom." All King John's Generals unanimouſly adviſed him to ſtarve this little Army, cooped up in the middle of an Enemy's Country, where they would quickly be in want of all Things. This Advice appeared to him too wary and inconſiſtent with his Impatience. He fancied, they would rob him of the tranſcendent Glory, he hoped to acquire by the Defeat of ſo renowned a Prince, to feed him with the imaginary Honour of conquering without fighting. So, full of the pleaſing Expectation of obtaining an eaſy Victory, and revenging his Subjects, he reſolved without delay to attack the Enemies. He committed at firſt a very great Error, in cauſing his Horſe to diſmount and begin the Fight. The Horſe, unaccuſtomed to charge on foot, were not able to break through the Engliſh, who had the Advantage of the Ground, in a Country full of Hedges, through which there was a neceſſity to paſs, in order to force their Intrenchments. The diſmounted Cavalry being repulſed with great loſs, the Infantry ſupplied their Place, and met the ſame Reſiſtance; notwithſtanding the King's Efforts, who maintained the Fight four Hours, encouraging his Troops by his Voice and Example, without fearing to expoſe his Perſon to the greateſt Dangers. What Efforts ſoever he made, it was not poſſible for him to rout this handful of Engliſh, whom the neceſſity of conquering, cauſed to fight deſperately; being moreover animated by the Example of the Prince, who performed that day Acts of Wiſdom and Valour, comparable to thoſe of the moſt renowned Generals. Of four Sons the King of France had with him, the three eldeſt retiring betimes, with eight hundred Lances, their Retreat did not a little contribute to diſcourage the reſt of the Army. Mean time, King John acted by deſpair, ſignalized himſelf in all the moſt dangerous Places, and drew upon him the braveſt of his Enemies. Though he ſaw himſelf forſaken, he inſpired the boldeſt with Terror. But, in all appearance, he would at length have ſunk under the Multitude of the Enemies that ſurrounded him, and left him no hopes of ſaving his Life, if Denis de Morbeck, a Knight of Artois, diſperſing thoſe who preſſed him the moſt vigorouſly, had not earneſtly perſuaded him to yield himſelf Priſoner. He would have been very glad to deliver his Sword to the Prince of Wales, but as the Prince was too remote, he was forced to ſurrender himſelf to Morbeck with Philip his fourth Son, about thirteen Years old, who had all along fought by his Side. In this unfortunate Day, ſo fatal to France, there were not above ſix thouſand Men ſlain, but among that Number were eight hundred Nobles, the Duke of Bourbon a Prince of the Blood, the Duke of Athenes Conſtable of France, the Marſhal de Neſle, and above fifty other great Lords of the Kingdom.

As the King, whoſe Thoughts were ſtill employed with his unfortunate Condition, was complaining of his Fate, the Prince ſaid to him, in a free, though modeſt
P. Æmyl. and unaffected manner, "That he had one great Reaſon to be comforted, that the Battle was not loſt by "his fault: That the Engliſh had found to their Coſt, "he was the braveſt of Princes; but that God alone "had diſpoſed of the Victory. And, (continued he) "if your ill fortune has thrown you into your preſent "Diſgrace, you may at leaſt reſt aſſured, that an inviolable Regard ſhall be preſerved for your Perſon; and "you ſhall find in me a very reſpectful Relation, if I "may be allowed to glory in that Title." So great a Modeſty in a young victorious Prince, little more than five and twenty Years of Age, melted the King into Tears, and filled the Hearers with Admiration. As ſoon as John had recovered himſelf, he turned to the Prince, and ſaid to him, with an Air of Satisfaction, "That "ſince it was his Deſtiny to be vanquiſhed and taken, "it was a great Comfort in his Misfortune, that he had "not behaved himſelf unworthily; and was fallen into "the Hands of ſo valiant and generous a Prince." On the morrow, ſolemn Thanks were returned to God, in the Engliſh Camp, for this great Victory. The Prince thanked his victorious Troops, with ſuch Expreſſions, as aſcribed to them the Honour of the Day, without the leaſt mention of himſelf. Then he marched for Bourdeaux, laden with an ineſtimable Booty, and ſo great a Number of Priſoners, that it would have been difficult for the Engliſh to defend themſelves, in caſe they had been attacked (1).

1357. Froiſſart. Pol. Virg. It is eaſy to conceive, the Joy this News ſpread over all England, and how great Edward's Satisfaction was in particular. God's Protection of the Prince of Wales being too viſible to be diſregarded, the King ordered publick Thankſgiving for this ſignal Victory, to be returned to God for eight Days together, in all the Churches of the Kingdom. The Prince of Wales ſpent the Winter at Bourdeaux, where two Legates from the Pope came, and preſſed him ſo earneſtly, that he conſented, with the Approbation of the King his Father, to a Truce for two Years, wherein all the Allies of both Crowns were included. In April following (2) he came into England, bringing his Priſoner with him. He was received there with exceſſive Joy, but conſtantly refuſed all the Honours that were offered him, being ſatisfied with thoſe paid to the captive King. When they made their Entry into London, the Prince of Wales rode on a little black Nag, by the King of France's Side, who was mounted on a ſtately white Courſer, adorned with coſtly Trappings. One would have thought that all the Pomp (3) diſplayed on this occaſion, was intended purely to do Honour to the captive King; ſo great care was taken to avoid all ſigns of his Diſgrace, and every thing that might be offenſive to his Eyes. Though Edward diſputed with him the Title of King of France, he treated him however like a King. The Sight of the captive Prince putting him in mind of the Inſtability of human Grandeur, he received him with as cordial Embraces, as if he had been his own Brother, or was come on purpoſe to pay him a Viſit. In this noble and generous manner, the Father and Son ſtrove with Emulation to comfort the unfortunate King, by all the Marks of Reſpect due to a great Prince, in whatever State Fortune may have placed him. It is reported, when Edward received the News of the Victory of Poictiers, he ſaid to thoſe about him, that his Satisfaction at ſo glorious a Succeſs, was not comparable to the Pleaſure cauſed by the generous Behaviour of the Prince. King John and Prince Philip his Son were lodged together in the Palace of the Savoy (4), with all the honorable Freedom they could deſire. The other captive Lords met with the ſame Treatment and Civilities. 1357.

He is received in an honourable manner. Froiſſart. Knighton.

Edward enjoyed then a ſo much greater Glory, as it was very uncommon, I mean of having Priſoners his two moſt potent Enemies; the King of France at London, and the King of Scotland at Odiam [in Hampſhire.] King David ſhould have had his Liberty long ſince, purſuant to the Articles agreed upon three Years before; but for the Reaſons above-mentioned, ſaw himſelf ſtill detained in Captivity. However, when he had leaſt Cauſe to expect any Favour from a victorious Enemy, who had juſt reduced Scotland to an irretrievable State, Edward was moved by the preſſing Inſtances of the Queen his Siſter, and agreed to renew the Treaty of 1354. To that end he granted Safe-conducts to Ambaſſadors from Scotland, who, during a ſhort Truce, obtained their King's Liberty, upon much the ſame Terms as in the firſt Treaty. They engaged to pay for his Ranſom a hundred thouſand Marks Sterling; namely, ten thouſand every Year, till the whole was paid; and for Security, the King of Scotland gave twenty Hoſtages. At the ſame time, a ten Years Truce was concluded between England and Scotland. David was releaſed (5) upon theſe Conditions, which he took care to ratify as ſoon as he came into his Kingdom, after an eleven Years Captivity. It ſeems that Edward, wholly taken up then with his vaſt Projects againſt France, had loſt all Thoughts of becoming maſter of Scotland. At leaſt he believed it beſt to defer the Execution of that Deſign, till a more convenient Seaſon.

Edward's late Truces with France and Scotland, having freed him from the trouble of foreign Affairs, he confined his Thoughts to the Government of his Kingdom. But as nothing extraordinary paſſed, he ſpent part of his time in Diverſions, of which the King of France and the other chief Priſoners always partook. The Tournament he held at Windſor on the 23d of April, 1358, to ſolemnize the Feaſt of St. George, Patron of the Order of the Garter, was the moſt ſumptuous and magnificent that had ever been ſeen in England. Whilſt England enjoyed a profound Tranquillity, France was in extreme Deſolation, by the inteſtine Troubles cauſed by the King's Impriſonment. Charles the Dauphin, John's eldeſt Son, held the Reins of the Government, by the Title of Lieutenant-General, afterwards changed into that of Regent. His Regency was ſo diſturbed by the Cabals of ſome reſtleſs Men, who found their Advantage in the Confuſion of Affairs, that it was not poſſible to think effectually of freeing their King. The Affairs of France were then in a deplorable Situation. Charles the Bald, King of Navarre, though ſprung Walſing. from the Family Royal of France (8), raiſed daily Commotions and Tumults in Paris, where he had a powerful Party (9). The Jaquery-War.

During all theſe Diſorders, King John, heartily tired of his Confinement in England, however eaſy it was, treated Himſelf with Edward concerning his Liberty. He could not obtain it without yielding to the Conqueror's Terms. But, as he was fully informed of the Diſturbances in France, he believed he could not purchaſe too dearly a Freedom, which might enable him to reſtore Peace in his Kingdom. Wherefore, he agreed with Edward upon a Treaty very diſadvantagious to France, whereby he reſigned ſeveral Provinces to the Crown of England. The General Aſſembly of the States being met upon this Occaſion in 1359, found the Conditions ſo hard, that they would not ratify the Treaty. By this Refuſal, the captive King ſaw all his hopes vaniſh. Mean while the States plainly perceiving, they had given occaſion to renew the War, offered the Regent all neceſſary Aſſiſtance to procure better Terms, by way of Arms.

1360. The Preparations for this freſh Expedition were prodigious. An Army of an hundred thouſand Men, tranſported to Calais (2), was a plain Indication of his Deſign, to make a powerful Effort to ſubdue France, whilſt the Troubles of that Kingdom offered him ſo fair an Opportunity. When his Forces were landed at Calais (3), he divided them into three Bodies. The firſt was commanded by the Duke of Lancaſter, who had lately given his only Daughter in Marriage to John of Gaunt the King's fourth Son (4). The Prince of Wales headed the ſecond, and the King himſelf commanded the laſt. With theſe numerous Troops, conducted by the three moſt famous Generals then in Europe, Edward marched into France without Oppoſition. The Dauphin not being ſtrong enough to venture to appear in the Field, was contented with providing his principal Towns with Ammunition, without hazarding a Battle with Forces ſo unequal to thoſe of the Enemy.

He goes over to Calais with a great Army. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 207. Walſing.

Mean time Edward traverſing Artois, entered Champagn, and approached Rheims in order to ſurprize the City, where ſome groundleſly affirm, he deſigned to be crowned. But miſſing his Aim, he fell upon Sens, which he eaſily took. The Duke of Burgundy perceiving himſelf unable to ſave his Country from plunder, obtained a ſeparate Truce for three Years, upon promiſe of paying two hundred thouſand Florins (5), and ſupplying the Engliſh Army with Proviſions. Le Nivernois followed the Example of Burgundy, but la Brie and le Gatinois were ravaged (6). Edward's Aim being to draw the French to a Battle, he neglected nothing to provoke them. For that purpoſe, he went, about the end of Lent, and encamped within ſeven Leagues of Paris, between Chartres and Mont le Herry. His Approach not being capable to draw the Dauphin out of Paris, he advanced to the very Gates of the City, without ſucceeding in his Deſign. Though the Smoak of the Villages ſet on fire by the Engliſh, might be ſeen from the Walls, the Dauphin, to whom was afterwards given the Sirname of the Wiſe, was too prudent to run any Hazard on this occaſion. Taught by the fatal Examples of the Kings his Father and Grandfather, he took care not to venture the Crown upon the Deciſion of a Battle, where he could have little hopes of Succeſs. As he knew Paris was able to maintain a long Siege, he kept himſelf ſhut up in the City, and all Edward's Inſults could not oblige him to alter his Reſolution. He tried however, to deliver France from the impending Danger, by offering certain Propoſals to his Enemy, but which were ſcornfully rejected. Edward thought he was in condition to give law, and preſcribe what Terms he pleaſed himſelf. He ſeemed at firſt to have formed the Deſign of beſieging Paris, but afterwards finding it too difficult an Undertaking, turned back towards la Beauce. Cardinal de Langres the Pope's Legate, attended him every where, and continually preſſed him to bound his Ambition, but theſe Remonſtrances were then ineffectual. Edward ſtayed ſome time in la Beauce, from whence he deſigned to lead his Troops to the Loire. Mean while, though his Army ſtill marched through very plentiful Countries, it was daily diminiſhed by Sickneſs. It was doubtleſs a great Mortification to that Monarch, to ſee the little Progreſs he had made with ſo numerous an Army. Though he was in the Heart of France, he could not flatter himſelf with any one certain Conqueſt. This perhaps was one Reaſon of his hearkening at laſt to the Legate's Sollicitations, though his Change is aſcribed to another Cauſe. One Day, as he lay encamped in the Country about Chartres, a ſudden and dreadful Storm aroſe, accompanied with Thunder and Hail of a prodigious Size, which killed ſix thouſand Horſes and a thouſand Men (7). So extraordinary an Accident was deemed by the Troops as a Sign of God's Wrath. The King himſelf ſeemed to be poſſeſſed with the ſame Opinion. It may be he was very glad, this Event furniſhed him with an Opportunity, to ſhew his Willingneſs to grant a Peace to France from a pure Motive of Generoſity, and thereby hide the Shame of not being able, with ſo fine an Army, to do any thing more than deſtroy the open Country. Be this as it will, in the midſt of the Storm, he turned his Face towards the Church of Chartres which he ſaw at a Diſtance, and [falling on his Knees] made a vow to conſent to a Peace upon equitable Terms. The Legate improving this Diſpoſition, earneſtly preſſed him to execute his generous Deſign, and prevailed with him to ſend Plenipotentiaries to Bretigny, a Village near Chartres, to treat of a Peace. Here it was the Dauphin and his chief Counſellors appeared (8) for France; and for England, the Prince of Wales, with ſuch Aſſiſtants as the King his Father appointed. In a few Days, a Treaty was concluded which gave ſome Intermiſſion to the Calamities of France. This Peace, which annulled all former Treaties, and ſerved for Foundation to new Rights, makes a very conſiderable Epocha in the Engliſh Hiſtory, with regard to the Differences between the two Crowns. Accordingly there is no underſtanding the Relation of the Events which enſued, without a perfect Knowledge of the Articles of this Treaty, which therefore it is abſolutely neceſſary to inſert (9).

TREATY

1356. Battle, the King ſupping in the Prince of Wales's Tent, preſſed him to ſit at Table with him; but he very civilly declining it, ſtood and talked with him all the while. As the King, whoſe Thoughts were ſtill employed with his unfortunate Condition, was complaining of his Fate, the Prince ſaid to him, in a free, though modeſt
P. Æmyl. and unaffected manner, "That he had one great Reaſon to be comforted, that the Battle was not loſt by "his fault: That the Engliſh had found to their Coſt, "he was the braveſt of Princes; but that God alone "had diſpoſed of the Victory. And, (continued he) "if your ill fortune has thrown you into your preſent "Diſgrace, you may at leaſt reſt aſſured, that an inviolable Regard ſhall be preſerved for your Perſon; and "you ſhall find in me a very reſpectful Relation, if I "may be allowed to glory in that Title." So great a Modeſty in a young victorious Prince, little more than five and twenty Years of Age, melted the King into Tears, and filled the Hearers with Admiration. As ſoon as John had recovered himſelf, he turned to the Prince, and ſaid to him, with an Air of Satisfaction, "That "ſince it was his Deſtiny to be vanquiſhed and taken, "it was a great Comfort in his Misfortune, that he had "not behaved himſelf unworthily; and was fallen into "the Hands of ſo valiant and generous a Prince." On the morrow, ſolemn Thanks were returned to God, in the Engliſh Camp, for this great Victory. The Prince thanked his victorious Troops, with ſuch Expreſſions, as aſcribed to them the Honour of the Day, without the leaſt mention of himſelf. Then he marched for Bourdeaux, laden with an ineſtimable Booty, and ſo great a Number of Priſoners, that it would have been difficult for the Engliſh to defend themſelves, in caſe they had been attacked (1).

1357. Froiſſart. Pol. Virg. It is eaſy to conceive, the Joy this News ſpread over all England, and how great Edward's Satisfaction was in particular. God's Protection of the Prince of Wales being too viſible to be diſregarded, the King ordered publick Thankſgiving for this ſignal Victory, to be returned to God for eight Days together, in all the Churches of the Kingdom. The Prince of Wales ſpent the Winter at Bourdeaux, where two Legates from the Pope came, and preſſed him ſo earneſtly, that he conſented, with the Approbation of the King his Father, to a Truce for two Years, wherein all the Allies of both Crowns were included. In April following (2) he came into England, bringing his Priſoner with him. He was received there with exceſſive Joy, but conſtantly refuſed all the Honours that were offered him, being ſatisfied with thoſe paid to the captive King. When they made their Entry into London, the Prince of Wales rode on a little black Nag, by the King of France's Side, who was mounted on a ſtately white Courſer, adorned with coſtly Trappings. One would have thought that all the Pomp (3) diſplayed on this occaſion, was intended purely to do Honour to the captive King; ſo great care was taken to avoid all ſigns of his Diſgrace, and every thing that might be offenſive to his Eyes. Though Edward diſputed with him the Title of King of France, he treated him however like a King. The Sight of the captive Prince putting him in mind of the Inſtability of human Grandeur, he received him with as cordial Embraces, as if he had been his own Brother, or was come on purpoſe to pay him a Viſit. In this noble and generous manner, the Father and Son ſtrove with Emulation to comfort the unfortunate King, by all the Marks of Reſpect due to a great Prince, in whatever State Fortune may have placed him. It is reported, when Edward received the News of the Victory of Poictiers, he ſaid to thoſe about him, that his Satisfaction at ſo glorious a Succeſs, was not comparable to the Pleaſure cauſed by the generous Behaviour of the Prince. King John and Prince Philip his Son were lodged together in the Palace of the Savoy (4), with all the honorable Freedom they could deſire. The other captive Lords met with the ſame Treatment and Civilities. 1357.

He is received in an honourable manner. Froiſſart. Knighton.

Edward enjoyed then a ſo much greater Glory, as it was very uncommon, I mean of having Priſoners his two moſt potent Enemies; the King of France at London, and the King of Scotland at Odiam [in Hampſhire.] King David ſhould have had his Liberty long ſince, purſuant to the Articles agreed upon three Years before; but for the Reaſons above-mentioned, ſaw himſelf ſtill detained in Captivity. However, when he had leaſt Cauſe to expect any Favour from a victorious Enemy, who had juſt reduced Scotland to an irretrievable State, Edward was moved by the preſſing Inſtances of the Queen his Siſter, and agreed to renew the Treaty of 1354. To that end he granted Safe-conducts to Ambaſſadors from Scotland, who, during a ſhort Truce, obtained their King's Liberty, upon much the ſame Terms as in the firſt Treaty. They engaged to pay for his Ranſom a hundred thouſand Marks Sterling; namely, ten thouſand every Year, till the whole was paid; and for Security, the King of Scotland gave twenty Hoſtages. At the ſame time, a ten Years Truce was concluded between England and Scotland. David was releaſed (5) upon theſe Conditions, which he took care to ratify as ſoon as he came into his Kingdom, after an eleven Years Captivity. It ſeems that Edward, wholly taken up then with his vaſt Projects againſt France, had loſt all Thoughts of becoming maſter of Scotland. At leaſt he believed it beſt to defer the Execution of that Deſign, till a more convenient Seaſon. The King of Scotland ſet at Liberty. Act. Pub. VI. p. 39—68. Buchanan. Walſing.

Knighton. Edward's late Truces with France and Scotland, having freed him from the trouble of foreign Affairs, he confined his Thoughts to the Government of his Kingdom. But as nothing extraordinary paſſed, he ſpent part of his time in Diverſions, of which the King of France and the other chief Priſoners always partook. The Tournament he held at Windſor on the 23d of April, 1358, to ſolemnize the Feaſt of St. George, Patron of the Order of the Garter, was the moſt ſumptuous and magnificent that had ever been ſeen in England. The Duke of Brabant, with ſeveral other ſovereign Princes, and an infinite Number of Knights of all Nations were preſent and ſplendidly entertained.

She died at the Caſtle of Riſings, aged ſixty three Years, after a twenty eight Years confinement (6). If the Marriage of this Queen was fatal to the King her Husband, it was no leſs ſo to France, ſince it proved the occaſion of a long and bloody War, which brought that Kingdom to the very Brink of Deſtruction.

Great Troubles in France. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 179. Walſing. Whilſt England enjoyed a profound Tranquillity, France was in extreme Deſolation, by the inteſtine Troubles cauſed by the King's Impriſonment. Charles the Dauphin, John's eldeſt Son, held the Reins of the Government, by the Title of Lieutenant-General, afterwards changed into that of Regent. His Regency was ſo diſturbed by the Cabals of ſome reſtleſs Men, who found their Advantage in the Confuſion of Affairs, that it was not poſſible to think effectually of freeing their King. The Affairs of France were then in a deplorable Situation. Charles the Bald, King of Navarre, though ſprung from the Family Royal of France (8), raiſed daily Commotions and Tumults in Paris, where he had a powerful Party (9). For that purpoſe, he went, about the end of Lent, and encamped within ſeven Leagues of Paris, between Chartres and Mont le Herry. His Approach not being capable to draw the Dauphin out of Paris, he advanced to the very Gates of the City, without ſucceeding in his Deſign. Though the Smoak of the Villages ſet on fire by the Engliſh, might be ſeen from the Walls, the Dauphin, to whom was afterwards given the Sirname of the Wiſe, was too prudent to run any Hazard on this occaſion. Taught by the fatal Examples of the Kings his Father and Grandfather, he took care not to venture the Crown upon the Deciſion of a Battle, where he could have little hopes of Succeſs. As he knew Paris was able to maintain a long Siege, he kept himſelf ſhut up in the City, and all Edward's Inſults could not oblige him to alter his Reſolution. He tried however, to deliver France from the impending Danger, by offering certain Propoſals to his Enemy, but which were ſcornfully rejected. Edward thought he was in condition to give law, and preſcribe what Terms he pleaſed himſelf. He ſeemed at firſt to have formed the Deſign of beſieging Paris, but afterwards finding it too difficult an Undertaking, turned back towards la Beauce. Cardinal de Langres the Pope's Legate, attended him every where, and continually preſſed him to bound his Ambition, but theſe Remonſtrances were then ineffectual. Edward ſtayed ſome time in la Beauce, from whence he deſigned to lead his Troops to the Loire. Mean while, though his Army ſtill marched through very plentiful Countries, it was daily diminiſhed by Sickneſs. It was doubtleſs a great Mortification to that Monarch, to ſee the little Progreſs he had made with ſo numerous an Army. Though he was in the Heart of France, he could not flatter himſelf with any one certain Conqueſt. This perhaps was one Reaſon of his hearkening at laſt to the Legate's Sollicitations, though his Change is aſcribed to another Cauſe. One Day, as he lay encamped in the Country about Chartres, a ſudden and dreadful Storm aroſe, accompanied with Thunder and Hail of a prodigious Size, which killed ſix thouſand Horſes and a thouſand Men (7). So extraordinary an Accident was deemed by the Troops as a Sign of God's Wrath. The King himſelf ſeemed to be poſſeſſed with the ſame Opinion. It may be he was very glad, this Event furniſhed him with an Opportunity, to ſhew his Willingneſs to grant a Peace to France from a pure Motive of Generoſity, and thereby hide the Shame of not being able, with ſo fine an Army, to do any thing more than deſtroy the open Country. Be this as it will, in the midſt of the Storm, he turned his Face towards the Church of Chartres which he ſaw at a Diſtance, and [falling on his Knees] made a vow to conſent to a Peace upon equitable Terms. The Legate improving this Diſpoſition, earneſtly preſſed him to execute his generous Deſign, and prevailed with him to ſend Plenipotentiaries to Bretigny, a Village near Chartres, to treat of a Peace. Here it was the Dauphin and his chief Counſellors appeared (8) for France; and for England, the Prince of Wales, with ſuch Aſſiſtants as the King his Father appointed. In a few Days, a Treaty was concluded which gave ſome Intermiſſion to the Calamities of France. This Peace, which annulled all former Treaties, and ſerved for Foundation to new Rights, makes a very conſiderable Epocha in the Engliſh Hiſtory, with regard to the Differences between the two Crowns. Accordingly there is no underſtanding the Relation of the Events which enſued, without a perfect Knowledge of the Articles of this Treaty, which therefore it is abſolutely neceſſary to inſert (9).

TREATY of BRETIGNY.

Edward, eldeſt Son to the King of France and England, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal, and Earl of Cheſter; To all thoſe who ſhall ſee theſe Letters, Greeting: We make you know, That after all the Debates and Diſorders whatſoever, moved or ſtirred between our Lord and Father, King of France and England, on the one Part; and our Couſins the King, his eldeſt Son, Regent of the Realm of France, and all thoſe it may concern on the other Part, for the Good of Peace, it is agreed, the eighth Day of May, 1360, at Bretigny near Chartres, in the manner following:

" I. THAT the King of England, with what he " holds in Gaſcoigne and Guienne, ſhall have for " him, and his Heirs for ever, all thoſe things which " follow, to hold them in the ſame manner the King of " France, or his Son, or any of his Anceſtors, Kings of " France, held them: That is to ſay, thoſe in Sove- " raignty in Soveraignty, and thoſe in Demain in Demain, " according to the time and manner hereafter declared. " The City, Caſtle, and Earldom of Poictiers, with the " whole Land and Country of Poictou; together with the " Fief of Thouars, and Land of Belleville; the City " and Caſtle of Xaintes, and the whole Land of Xain- " tonge, on this ſide, and beyond the River of Charente; " the City and Caſtle of Agen, and the Land and Coun- " try of Agenois; the City and Caſtle, and whole Earl- " dom of Perigort, and the Land and Country of Peri- " geux; the City, Caſtle, and whole Earldom of Limoges, " the Land and Country of Limoſin; the City and Caſtle " of Cahors, and the Land and Country of Cahorſin; " the City, and Caſtle, and Country of Tarbe, and the " Land, Country and Earldom of Bigorre; the Earldom, " Land, and Country of Gaure; the City and Caſtle " of Angoleſm, and the Earldom, Land, and Country " of Angoleſmois; the City and Caſtle of Rodes; the " Land and Country of Rovergne. And if there be " any Lords, as the Earl of Foix, the Earl of Ar- " magnac, the Earl of Liſle, the Earl of Perigort, " and Viſcount of Limoges, or others, which hold " any Lands within the Bounds of theſe places, they ſhall " do Homage to the King of England, and all " other Services and Devoirs due by reaſon of their " Lands, in the ſame manner they did in times " paſt (1).

" II. Alſo the King of England ſhall have all that " any of the Kings of England anciently held in the " Town of Monſtrel upon the Sea, with their Appurte- " nances.

" III. Alſo the King of England ſhall have all the " County or Earldom of Ponthieu entirely; ſave and " except, that if any thing of the ſaid County or Ap- " purtenances have been alienated by the Kings of " England for the time being, and to other Perſons " than the Kings of France, the King of France ſhall " not be obliged to render them to the King of Eng- " land: And if the ſaid Alienations have been made to " the Kings of France for the time being, without " mean, and he doth poſſeſs them at preſent, they are " entirely to be releaſed to the King of England; except " the Kings of France had them by exchange for other " Lands of the Kings of England, than both were to " releaſe. But if the Kings of England for the time being, " had alienated any thing to other Perſons than to the " King of France, and afterwards they came into his Hands, " he ſhall not be obliged to render them. Alſo if the " things aboveſaid owe Homage, the King of France ſhall " convey them to others, who ſhall do it for the King of " England: And if they do not owe Homage, the King " of France ſhall appoint a Truſtee or Tenant to perform " the Devoir, within one Year after he ſhall depart from " Calais.

" IV. Alſo the King of England ſhall have the Caſtle " and Town of Calais; the Caſtle, Town, and Seig- " neurie of Merk; the Towns, Caſtles, and Lordſhips " of Sangate, Colongue, Hames, Wale and Oye, with " Lands, Woods, Marſhes, Rivers, Rents, Lordſhips, " or Seigneuries, Advowſons of Churches, and all other " Appurtenances lying between the Meeſes and Bounds " following; that is to ſay, from Calais by the Courſe " of the River that goes before Graveling, and alſo by " the Courſe of the ſame River round about Langle, " and by the River which goes beyond the Peil, and " by the ſame River that falls into the great Lake of " Guiſnes, and ſo to Fretun, and from thence by the " Valley about the Hill Calculy, incloſing that Hill, and " ſo to the Sea, with Sangate and all the Appurte- " nances.

" V. Alſo the King of England ſhall have the Caſtle, " Town, and County, or Earldom of Guiſnes, with " all the Lands, Towns, Caſtles, Fortreſſes, Places, " Men, Homages, Lordſhips, Woods, Foreſts, and the " Rights of them, as entirely as the Earl of Guiſnes, " lately dead, had them at the time of his Death; and " the Churches and good People being within the Limits " of the County of Guiſnes, of Calais, and Merk, and " other places aboveſaid, ſhall obey the King of Eng- " land, as they obeyed the King of France, or Earl of " Guiſnes for the time being; all which things of Merk " and Calais, contained in this and the precedent Arti- " cle, the King of England ſhall hold in Demain, ex- " cept the Heritages of the Churches, which ſhall re- " main to them entirely wherever they be; and alſo " except the Heritages of other People, of the Country " of Merk and Calais, lying out of the Town of Ca- " lais, to the value of a hundred Livres of yearly Rent, " or under, of current Money of the Country, which " ſhall remain to them. But the Heritages and Habi- " tations being in the Town of Calais, with their Ap- " purtenances, ſhall be to the King of England in De- " main, to diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; and alſo the " Inhabitants in the County, Town, and Lands of Guiſnes, " ſhall enjoy all their Demains entirely, and ſhall wholly " be returned to them, ſaving what hath been ſaid con- " cerning the Borders, Meets, and Bounds in the prece- " dent Article.

" VI. Alſo it is agreed, the King of England and his " Heirs ſhall have and hold all the Iſles adjacent to " the Lands, Countries, and Places before-named; to- " gether with all other Iſles, which he holds at pre- " ſent.

" VII. Alſo it is agreed, the King of France, and " his eldeſt Son the Regent, for them, their Heirs and " Succeſſors, as ſoon as they can without Deceit, and at " furtheſt by the Feaſt of St. Michael, in one Year " after the ſame Feaſt next coming, ſhall render, " transfer, and deliver to the King of England, his Heirs " and Succeſſors, all Honours, Obediences, Homages, " Liegeances, Vaſſals, Fees, Services, Recogniſances, " Rights, mere, and mixt Empire, and all manner of Ju- " riſdiction, high and low, Reſorts, Safeguard, Collations " and Patronages of Churches, and all manner of Seig- " neuries, and Soveraignties, and all the Right they " have, or can have, appertains, or can appertain to " them, by what Cauſe, Title, or Colour of Right ſo- " ever, or to the Kings and Crown of France, by reaſon " of the Cities, Counties, Towns, Caſtles, Lands, Coun- " tries, Iſles, and Places before-named, and all their " Appurtenances and Dependances, and every one of " them, wherever they are, without retaining any thing " to them, or their Heirs and Succeſſors, or to the Kings " or Crown of France. And alſo, that the King, and " his eldeſt Son, ſhould ſend their Letters Patents to all " the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and all other Prelates of " Holy Church; and to the Earls, Viſcounts, Barons, " Noblemen, Citizens, and others of the Cities, Lands, " Countries, Iſles and Places before-named, that they " ſhould obey the King of England and his Heirs, and " their certain Command, in the ſame manner they had " obeyed the Kings and Crown of France; and by the " ſame Letters they ſhould quit and abſolve them after " the beſt manner they could, from all Faiths, Homages, " Oaths, Obligations, Subjections and Promiſes made by " any of them, to the Kings and Crown of France, in " what manner ſoever (2).

(1) The firſt Article was corrected; and inſtead of the Words, (thoſe in Sweraignty in Sovereignty,) were inſerted theſe, (thoſe in Fee in Fee.)

(2) This Article was corrected; the Word (Reſorts) being left out in the corrected Copy, and theſe Words or Sentence (and all manner of Seigneuries, and Soveraignties) and theſe Words or Sentence (without retaining any thing to them or their Heirs and Succeſſors, or to the Kings or Crown of France) alſo the laſt Words (in what manner ſoever.)

" VIII. Alſo

1360. " VIII. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of Eng-
" land ſhall have the Cities, Counties, Caſtles, Lands,
" Countries, Iſles, and Places before-named, with all " their Appurtenances and Dependences, wherever they " are; to hold to him, his Heirs and Succeſſors, heri-
" tably and perpetually in Demeſn, as the Kings of France
" held them, and in the ſame manner, ſaving what hath
" been ſaid above, in the Article of Calais and Merk;
" and alſo the Cities, Caſtles, Counties, Lands, Coun" tries, Iſles, and Places before-named, Rights, mere and
" mixt Empire, Juriſdiction and Profits whatever, which " any Kings of England held there, with their Appurte-
" nances and Dependences; any Alienations, Donations,
" Obligations, or Incumbrances, had, or done by any " of the Kings of France, in ſeventy Years from that " time, by whatſoever Cauſe or Form it was; all ſuch
" Alienations, Donations, Obligations or Incumbrances,
" are now, and ſhall be wholly annulled, repealed, and
" made void: And all things ſo given, alienated, or
" incumbred, ſhall be really rendred and delivered to " the King of England entirely, and in the ſame Con-
" dition they were ſeventy Years ſince, or to his ſpe-
" cial Deputies, as ſoon as they may without fraud;
" and at furtheſt, before Michaelmas next come twelve-
" months, to hold them heritably and perpetually, and
" to his Heirs and Succeſſors; except what is ſaid in " the Article of Ponthieu, which is to remain in its " force; and ſaving all things given and alienated to " Churches, which ſhall peaceably remain to them in
" all Countries before and after-named, ſo as the Parſons
" of the Churches pray diligently for the Kings as for " their Founders, wherewith their Conſciences ſhall be " charged.

" IX. Alſo, it is agreed, The King of England ſhall
" have and hold all the Cities, Counties, Caſtles, and " Countries above-named, which anciently the Kings of " England had not, in the ſame Eſtate as the King of " France, and his Sons hold them at preſent.

" X. Alſo, it is agreed, That if within the Limits of " the Countries the Kings of England anciently poſſeſſed,
" they ſhould now have any thing that was not then
" theirs, of which the King of France was in poſſeſſion,
" on the 19th of September, 1356, they ſhall be and re" main to the King of England, and his Heirs as
" aboveſaid.

" XI. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France,
" and his eldeſt Son the Regent, for them and their " Heirs, and for the Kings of France and their Suc-
" ceſſors for ever, as ſoon as they can without deceit,
" and at furtheſt before Michaelmas 1361, ſhall ren-
" der and deliver to the King of England, his Heirs
" and Succeſſors, and transfer to them all the Ho-
" nours, Liegeances, Obediences, Homages, Vaſſals, Fees, " Services, Recognizances, Oaths, Right, mere and
" mixt Empire, all manner of Juriſdictions, high and
" low, Reſorts, Safeguards, and Seigneuries, which can,
" or may belong in any manner to the Kings or
" Crown of France, or to any other Perſon, by reaſon
" of the King or Crown of France, at any time, in " the Cities, Counties, Caſtles, Lands, Countries, Iſles,
" and Places above-named, or in any of them, their " Appurtenances and Appendances whatſoever, or in
" Perſons, Vaſſals, Subjects, or whoſoever of them, be
" they Princes, Dukes, Earls, Viſcounts, Archbiſhops,
" Biſhops, and other Prelates of the Church, Barons,
" Noblemen, and others whoſoever, without reſerving
" or retaining any thing to them, their Heirs, and Suc-
" ceſſors, or to the Crown of France or others, what" ever it be, whereby they, their Heirs, and Succeſſors,
" or any Kings of France, or other Perſon, under pre-
" tence of the King and Crown of France, may chal" lenge, and demand any thing in time to come, from " the King of England, his Heirs and Succeſſors, or " upon any of the Vaſſals and Subjects aforeſaid, by
" reaſon of thoſe Countries and Places: Alſo all the " before-named Perſons, their Heirs and Succeſſors, ſhall
" for ever be the Liegemen and Subjects of the King
" of England, his Heirs and Succeſſors; and that he
" and they ſhall hold all the Perſons, Cities, Coun" ties, Lands, Countries, Iſles, Caſtles, and Places afore-
" named, and all their Appurtenances and Appendances,
" and they ſhall be and remain to them fully, perpe-
" tually, freely in their Seigneury, Sovereignty, Obe" dience, Liegeance, and Subjection, as the Kings of " France had and held them in any time paſt; and that 1360.
" the ſaid King of England, his Heirs, and Succeſſors, ſhall
" have and hold perpetually all the Countries before-named,
" with their Appurtenances and Appendances, and other " things before-named, with all perpetual Franchiſes and
" Liberties, as Sovereign and Liege Lord, as Neighbour
" to the King and Realm of France, without ac" knowledging any Sovereign, or performance of any " Obedience, Homage, Reſort, Subjection, and without " doing in any time to come any Service, or making
" Recogniſance to the King or Crown of France, for the " Cities, Counties, Caſtles, Lands, Countries, Iſles, " Places, and Perſons before-named, or for any of " them (1).

" Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France, and " his eldeſt Son the Regent, for them, and their Heirs,
" and for the Kings of France, and their Succeſſors for " ever, as ſoon as they can without fraud, and at fur-
" theſt before Michaelmas 1361, ſhall render and de" liver to the King of England, his Heirs and Succeſ-
" ſors, and transfer to them, all the Honours, Liegeances,
" Obediences, Homages, Vaſſals, Fees, Services, Recog-
" niſances, Oaths, Right, mere and mixt Empire, all " manner of Juriſdictions high and low, Safeguards and
" Seigneuries, which can or may belong in any manner,
" to the Kings or Crown of France, or to any other Per-
" ſon by reaſon of the King and Crown of France,
" at any time in the Cities, Counties, Caſtles, Lands,
" Countries, Iſles, and Places above-named, or in any of " them, their Appurtenances, and Appendences what-
" ſoever, or in Perſons, Vaſſals, Subjects, or whoſoever
" of them.

" XII. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France
" and his eldeſt Son, ſhall renounce expreſsly all Reſorts
" and Sovereignties, and all the Right they have or can " have in all thoſe things, which by this Treaty ought " to belong to the King of England. And in like man" ner, he and his eldeſt Son ſhall renounce expreſsly all
" thoſe things, which by this Treaty ought not to be" long or be delivered to him, and all demands he " makes of the King of France, and eſpecially to the " Name, and to the Right of the Crown of the King-
" dom of France, and to the Homages, Sovereignty,
" and Demeſn of the Duchy of Normandy, the Duchy
" of Tourain, the Counties of Anjou and Maine, the So-
" vereignty and Homage of the Dukedom of Bretagne,
" and the Homages and Sovereignties of the Country
" and County of Flanders, and all other Demands he " can or ſhall make of the King of France, for what
" Cauſe ſoever, except what by this Treaty ought to " remain, and be delivered to the King of England and " his Heirs; and one King ſhall part with, releaſe and " transfer to the other perpetually all the Right which " either of them hath, or can have, in all the things
" which by this Treaty ought to remain, and be deli" vered to each of them; and of the time and place
" where and when the ſaid Renunciations ſhall be made,
" the two Kings ſhall agree and appoint when they meet
" at Calais (2).

" XIII. Alſo, it is agreed, That to the end this Treaty
" may ſpeedily be accompliſhed, that the King of Eng-
" land, ſhall bring the King of France to Calais, within " three Weeks after Midſummer, (there being no juſt hin" drance) at his own Expence.

" XIV. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France
" ſhall pay to the King of England, three Millions of " Crowns of Gold, whereof two ſhall be of the value
" of a Noble of Engliſh Money; where ſix hundred
" thouſand Crowns ſhall be paid to him or his Deputies,
" within four Months after the King of France ſhall ar" rive at Calais, and within a Year following, four hun" dred thouſand Crowns to be paid at London, and ſo
" every Year four hundred thouſand Crowns to be paid
" there until the whole was diſcharged.

" XV. It is alſo agreed, That for the Payment of the " ſix hundred thouſand Crowns at Calais, and for the " delivery of the Hoſtages hereafter named, within four " Months after the King of France ſhall be come to " Calais, the Town, Caſtle, and Fortreſſes of Rochelle,
" the Caſtles, Fortreſſes, and Towns of the County of " Guiſnes, ſhall be rendered to the King of England,
" with all their Appurtenances, and Appendences; and the " Perſon of the King of France ſhall be delivered out of

(1) This Article was corrected, and at leaſt two Parts of three left out of the corrected Letter (as then called) or Copy, the whole Article there being no more than what follows in the next Paragraph.

(2) This Article was intirely left out of the Treaty corrected at Calais, when the two Kings met there.

1360. " Priſon, but he is not to arm himſelf or People againſt " the King of England, but is to accompliſh what was " to be done by this Treaty; and the Hoſtages are the " great Priſoners taken at the Battle of Poictiers, and theſe " following:

" That is to ſay, Monſieur Lewis Earl of Anjou, Mon- " ſieur John Earl of Poictiers the King's Sons, the Duke " of Orleans the King's Brother, the Duke of Bourbon, " the Earl of Blois, or his Brother, the Earl of St. Paul, " the Earl of Alenſon, or Monſieur Peter of Alenſon his " Brother, the Earl of Harcourt, the Earl of Portien, " the Earl of Valentinois, the Earl of Briene, the Earl " of Vaudemont, the Earl of Foreſt, the Viſcount Beau- " mont, the Lord of Coucy, the Lord of Fienne, the " Lord of Preaux, the Lord of St. Venant, the Lord of " Garencieres, the Dauphin of Auvergne, the Lord of " Hangeſt, the Lord of Montmorency, Monſieur William " de Craon, Monſieur Lewis of Harcourt, Monſieur John " de Ligny. The Names of the Priſoners taken at Poic- " tiers are theſe:

" Monſieur Philip of France, the Earl of Eu, the Earl " of Longueville, the Earl of Ponthieu, the Earl of Joigny, " the Earl of Sancerre, the Earl of Dammartin, the Earl " of Ventadour, the Earl of Salbruche, the Earl of Auxerre, " the Earl of Vendoſme, the Earl of Craon, the Lord of " Darnalt or Rual, the Marſhal of Danchan or d' An- " decham, the Lord of Aubigny.

" XVI. Alſo, it is agreed, That the Priſoners afore- " ſaid, which come to remain in Hoſtage for the King " of France, ſhall therefore be delivered out of Priſon, " without paying any Ranſom, according to Agreement, " made before the third of May paſt; and if any of " them be out of England, and not in Hoſtage at Calais, " within the firſt Month after the ſaid three Weeks after " Midſummer, without juſt hindrance, he ſhall not be " quit of his Impriſonment, but be forced by the King " of France to return into England, and there remain " Priſoner, or pay the Penalty by him promiſed and in- " curred, for not returning.

" XVII. Alſo, it is agreed, That inſtead of thoſe " Hoſtages, which ſhall not come to Calais, or ſhall " die, or ſhall remove out of the Power of the King of " England, the King of France ſhall deliver others of " the ſame Quality, as ſoon as may be, within four Months " after the Bayly of Amiens, and the Major of St. Omer, " upon the King of England's Certificate, ſhall have no- " tice thereof; and the King of France, upon his depar- " ture from Calais, may have in his Company ten of the " Hoſtages, ſuch as the two Kings ſhall agree upon, ſo " as thirty may remain.

" XVIII. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France, " within three Months after he ſhall be gone from Calais, " ſhall ſend thither, to remain in Hoſtage, four Perſons " of the Town of Paris, and two of every Town follow- " ing, of St. Omer, Arras, Amiens, Beauvais, Liſle, " Doway, Tournay, Reims, Chaalons, Troyes, Chartres, " Toulouſe, Lyons, Orleance, Compiegne, Rouen, Caen, " Tours, Bourges; the moſt ſufficient of theſe Towns for " the accompliſhment of this Treaty.

" XIX. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France " ſhall be brought from England to Calais, and remain " there for four Months, but ſhall pay nothing the firſt " Month for his Guard and Keeping; but for every one " of the other Months he ſhall remain there, he ſhall pay " ſix thouſand Royals, as they ſhall be then current in " France, before his departure from Calais, and ſo after- " wards for the time he ſtays there.

" XX. Alſo, it is agreed, That as ſoon as may be, " within a Year after the King of France is departed from " Calais, Monſieur John Earl of Montfort, ſhall have the " Earldom of Montfort, with all its Appurtenances, do- " ing Homage Liege to the King of France, and his De- " voir and Service in every Caſe, as a good and loyal Vaſ- " ſal Liege ought to do to his Liege Lord by reaſon of his " Earldom; and alſo his other Heritages ſhall be rendered " to him, that belong not to the Duchy of Bretagne, " doing Homage and other dues belonging to them; and " if he will demand any thing in any of the Heritages " belonging to that Duchy, out of the Country of Bre- " tagne, he ſhall receive good and ſpeedy reaſon from the " Court of France.

" XXI. Alſo, upon the Queſtion of the Demeſn of " Bretagne, which is between Monſieur John de Mont- " fort, and Monſieur Charles de Blois, it is agreed, That " the two Kings calling before them or their Deputies, " the principal Parties, they ſhall inform themſelves of " their Right, and ſhall endeavour to make them agree 1360. " about all that is in debate between them, as ſoon as " they can: And in caſe neither the Kings, or their " Deputies, can make an Agreement within a Year " after the King of France ſhall arrive at Calais, Friends " on both Sides may make the beſt Agreement between " them they can, and as ſoon as they can; and if they " cannot compromiſe the matter within half a Year, " they ſhall make report thereof, and what they find " concerning the Rights of each Party, and why the De- " bate remains between them, to the two Kings or their " Deputies, and then they, as ſoon as may be, ſhall make " an Accord, giving their final Sentence upon the Right " of each Party, which ſhall be executed by the two " Kings; and in caſe they cannot end the Controverſy " in half a Year, then the two principal Parties of Blois " and Montfort ſhall do what ſeems beſt to them, and " the Friends of one Part and the other, ſhall aſſiſt " which Part they pleaſe, without hindrance of the ſaid " Kings, or without receiving any Damage, Blame, or " Reproach from them; and if it happen that one of " the Parties will not appear before the Kings or their " Deputies, at the time appointed, and alſo in caſe the " Kings or their Deputies ſhall declare an Accord be- " tween the Parties, and ſhall give their Opinion of the " Right of one Party; and either of the Parties will " not conſent to, and obey the Declaration, then the " ſaid Kings ſhall be againſt him with their whole " Power, and aid the other which ſhall comply and " obey; but the two Kings ſhall not in any caſe, in their " proper Perſons or by others, make War upon one an- " other for the Cauſe aforeſaid, and the Sovereignty and " Homage of the Duchy ſhall always remain to the King " of France.

" XXII. Alſo, That all the Lands, Towns, Coun- " tries, Caſtles, and other Places delivered to the King, " ſhall enjoy ſuch Liberties and Franchiſes as they have at " preſent, which ſhall be confirmed by the ſaid Kings or " their Succeſſors, ſo often as they ſhall be duly required, " if they be not contrary to this Agreement.

" XXIII. Alſo, the King of France ſhall render, or " cauſe to be rendred, and confirm to Monſieur Philip " of Navarre, and to all his Adherents, after this time, " as ſoon as may be, without deceit, and at furtheſt " within a Year after the King of France ſhall be gone " from Calais, all the Towns, Fortreſſes, Caſtles, Lord- " ſhips, Rights, Rents, Profits, Juriſdictions, and Places " whatever, which he, in his own Right, or in Right " of his Wife, or his Adherents, held or ought to hold " in the Kingdom of France: And that he ſhall not " do them any Damage or Injury, or reproach them for " any thing done before that time, and ſhall pardon " them all Offences and Miſpriſions for the time paſt, " by reaſon of the War; and for this they ſhall have " good and ſufficient Letters, ſo as the ſaid Monſieur " Philip and his Adherents return to their Homage, " and perform their Duties, and be good and loyal Vaſ- " ſals.

" XXIV. Alſo, it is accorded, That the King of " England may give, for this time only, to whom he " pleaſes, the Lands and Heritages that were Monſieur God- " frey de Harcourt's, to hold of the Duke of Normandy, or " other Lords of whom they ought to hold, by Homage " and Services anciently accuſtomed.

" XXV. Alſo, it is agreed, That if any Man or Coun- " try, under the Obedience of one Party, ſhall, by reaſon " of this Agreement, go under the Obedience of the other " Party; he ſhall not be impeached for any thing done " in time paſt.

" XXVI. Alſo, it is agreed, That the Lands of the " Baniſhed, and Adherents of one Party and the other, " and the Churches of one Party and the other, and all " thoſe that are diſherited and outed of their Lands, or " charged with any Penſion, Tax, or Impoſition, or " otherwiſe in any manner charged by reaſon of the War, " ſhall be reſtored entirely to the ſame Rights and Poſ- " ſeſſions which they had before the War began; and that " all manner of Forfeitures, Treſpaſſes, or Miſpriſions, " done by them, or any of them in that time, ſhall be " wholly pardoned; and theſe things to be done ſo ſoon as " they well can, or at furtheſt within one Year after the " King ſhall leave Calais; except what is ſaid in the Arti- " cle of Calais and Merk, and the other Places named in " that Article; except alſo the Viſcount of Fronſac, and " Monſieur John Gaillard, who are not to be compriſed " in this Article, but their Goods and Heritages ſhall re- " main as they were before the Treaty.

" XXVII. Alſo,

1360. " XXVII. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France " ſhall deliver to the King of England, as ſoon as well " he may, and at furtheſt within one Year after his de- " parture from Calais, all the Cities, Towns, Coun- " tries, and other Places abovenamed, which by this " Treaty ought to be delivered to him.

" XXVIII. Alſo, it is agreed, That upon delivery of " the Towns, Fortreſſes, and whole County of Ponthieu; " the Towns, Fortreſſes, and whole County of Mont- " fort; the City and Caſtle of Xainctes; the Caſtles, " Towns, Fortreſſes, and all the King held in Demeſn " in the County of Xaintonge, on both ſides the River " Charente; the City and Caſtle of Angouleſme, and the " Caſtles, Fortreſſes, and Towns which the King of " France held in Demeſn in the Country of Angoulemois, " with Letters and Commands of releaſing of Faith and " Homage to the King of England, or his Deputies; He " at his proper Coſt and Charge ſhall deliver all the For- " treſſes taken and poſſeſſed by him, his Subjects, Adhe- " rents, and Allies, in the Countries of France, of Anjou, " of Maine, of Berry, Auvergne, Burgogne, Champagne, " Picardy, and Normandy, and in all other Parts and " Lands of the Kingdom of France; except thoſe in the " Duchy of Bretagne, and thoſe Countries and Lands " which by this Treaty ought to be and remain to the " King of England.

" XXIX. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of France " ſhall give up, and deliver to the King of England, his " Heirs, or Deputies, all the Towns, Fortreſſes, Caſtles, " and other Lands, Countries, and Places before-named, " with their Appurtenances, at his proper Coſts and " Charge: And alſo if he ſhall have any Rebels or Diſ- " obedient, that will not render and give up to the King " of England any Cities, Caſtles, Towns, Countries, Pla- " ces, or Fortreſſes, which ought to belong to him, the " King of France ſhall be bound to cauſe them to be de- " livered at his own Expence: And likewiſe the King " of England ſhall cauſe to be delivered at his Expence, " the Fortreſſes that by this Treaty ought to belong to " the King of France. And the ſaid Kings, and their " People, ſhall be bound to aid one another, when they " ſhall be required, at the Wages of the Party that ſhall " require it, which ſhall be one Florin of Florence a Day " for a Knight, and half a Florin for an Eſcuyer, and to " others according to that rate. And for the ſurplus of " the double Wages, it is agreed, That if the Wages be " too ſmall, in regard of the Rate of Proviſions or Vic- " tuals in the Countries, they ſhall be regulated by four " Knights choſen for that purpoſe, two of one Party, " and two of the other.

" XXX. Alſo, it is agreed, That all the Archbi- " ſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates, and Men of Holy " Church, by reaſon of their Temporalities, ſhall be " ſubject to that King under whom they hold their Tem- " poralities; and if they have Temporalities under both " Kings, they ſhall be ſubject to each King for the " Temporality they hold of him.

" XXXI. Alſo, it is agreed, That good Alliances, " Amities, and Confederacies be made between both the " Kings and their Kingdoms, ſaving the Conſcience and " Honour of one King and the other, notwithſtanding " any Confederacies they have made on this ſide, or be- " yond the Sea, with any Perſons, be they of Scotland, " or Flanders, or any other Country.

" XXXII. Alſo, it is agreed, That the King of " France, and his eldeſt Son the Regent, for them and " for their Heirs Kings of France, as ſoon as it may be " done, ſhall declare themſelves, and depart from all the " Confederacies they have with the Scots; and promiſe, " that they nor their Heirs, nor the Kings of France for " the time being, ſhall give or do to the King or Realm " of Scotland, nor the Subjects thereof, preſent and to " come, any Aid, Comfort, or Favor, againſt the King " of England, his Heirs and Succeſſors, nor againſt the " Kingdom, nor againſt the Subjects in any manner; " and that they make not other Alliances with the Scots " in time to come, againſt the Kings and Kingdom of " England. And in like manner, as ſoon as it may be " done, the King of England and his eldeſt Son ſhall " declare themſelves, and depart from all Alliances they " have with the Flemings; and promiſe that they nor " their Heirs, nor the Kings of England for the time " being, ſhall give or do to the Flemings preſent and to " come, any Aid, Comfort, or Favor againſt the King " of France, his Heirs and Succeſſors, nor againſt his " Kingdom, nor againſt his Subjects in any manner, 1360. " and that they make no Alliances with the ſaid Flem- " ings in time to come, againſt the Kings and Kingdom " of France.

" XXXIII. Alſo, it is agreed, That the Collations and " Proviſions made of Benefices, vacant in time of the " War, by one Party and the other, ſhall hold and be " good; and that the Coſts, Iſſues, and Revenues, re- " ceived and levied of any Benefices, or other things " Temporal whatever, in the Kingdoms of France and " England, by one Party or the other, during the Wars, " ſhall be quitted by one Party and the other.

" XXXIV. Alſo, That the Kings above-ſaid ſhall be " bound to cauſe to be confirmed all the Things above- " ſaid by our Holy Father the Pope; and they ſhall be " made ſure, and ſtrengthened by Oaths, Sentences, and " Cenſures of the Court of Rome, and all other Places, " in the moſt ſtrong manner that can be; and there ſhall " be obtained Diſpenſations, Abſolutions, and Letters from " the Court of Rome for perfecting this Treaty, and " they ſhall be delivered to the Parties, at fartheſt with- " in three Weeks after the King ſhall be arrived at Ca- " lais.

" XXXV. Alſo, That all the Subjects of the ſaid " Kings, which come to ſtudy in the Univerſities, and " Places of Study in the Kingdoms of France and Eng- " land, ſhall enjoy the Privileges and Liberties of thoſe " Places and Univerſities, as well as they might have " done before the War; or as they do at this pre- " ſent.

" XXXVI. Alſo, it is agreed, That to the end the " Things debated and treated of as above, may be more " firm, and valuable, there ſhall be made and given the " Securities which follow: That is to ſay, Letters (or " Inſtruments) ſealed with the Seals of both Kings and " their eldeſt Sons, the beſt that can be made or di- " rected by their Council. And the ſaid Kings and their " eldeſt Sons, and other Sons, ſhall ſwear, and alſo thoſe " of their Lineage, and other great Men of their King- " doms, to the Number of twenty on each ſide, That " they will obſerve and keep, and help in the keeping " of the things treated and agreed, inaſmuch as ſhall " concern them, and without Fraud or Deceit ſhall ac- " compliſh them, without ever doing any thing to the " contrary, and without any hindrance of the ſame. " And if there ſhall be any of the Kingdom of England " or France, which ſhall be Rebels, and will not agree " to the things above-ſaid, the ſaid Kings ſhall uſe the " Power of their Bodies, Goods, and Friends to bring " ſuch Rebels to Obedience, according to the Form and " Tenor of the Treaty. And farther, the ſaid Kings, " their Heirs and Kingdoms, ſhall ſubmit themſelves to " the coercion of our Holy Father the Pope, that he may " conſtrain by Sentences, Cenſures of the Church, and " all due ways, him that ſhall be Rebel, according to " Reaſon. And according to theſe Eſtabliſhments and " Securities aboveſaid, both Kings and their Heirs ſhall " by Faith and Oath, renounce all Wars and Contenti- " on. And if by Diſobedience, Rebellion, or Power of " any Subjects of France, or any juſt Cauſe, the King of " France or his Heirs, cannot accompliſh all the things " above-ſaid, the King of England, his Heirs, or any for " them, ſhall not make War againſt the King of France, " his Heirs, or Kingdom; but both together, ſhall en- " deavour to bring the Rebels to true Obedience, and " accompliſh the things above-ſaid. And if any of the " Realm, or Obedience of the King of England, will not " render the Caſtles, Towns, and Fortreſſes, which they " hold in the Realm of France, and obey the Treaty " above-ſaid, or for juſt Cauſe cannot do that which by " this Treaty they ought to do, the King of France, " nor his Heirs, nor any for them, ſhall make War upon " the King of England or his Kingdom; but both to- " gether ſhall employ their Power to recover the Caſtles, " Towns, and Fortreſſes; and that all Obedience and " Compliance may be given to the Treaty. And there " ſhall be made and given on both ſides, according to " the nature of the Fact, all manner of Security that " ſhall be known, or can be deviſed, as well by the " Pope, the College of the Court of Rome, as otherwiſe, " holding and keeping the Peace perpetually, and all the " things as above-agreed.

" XXXVII. Alſo, it is agreed, That by this preſent " Treaty, all others, if any have been made before, ſhall " be null and void, and never be any Advantage to ei-1360. "ther Party, nor cauſe any Reproach of one to the other "for not obſerving them.

"XXXVIII. Alſo, the preſent Treaty ſhall be ap- "proved, ſworn to, and confirmed by the two Kings, "when they ſhall meet at Calais; and after the King "of France ſhall be gone from thence, and be in his own "Power, within a Month next following, he ſhall make "Letters Patent of Confirmation, and ſend and deliver "them at Calais to the King of England, and receive "ſuch and the like from the King of England.

"XXXIX. Alſo, it is agreed, That neither King ſhall "procure, or cauſe to be procured, by himſelf or others, "any Injury, or Moleſtation by the Church of Rome, or "any of Holy Church whoever they be, to, or concern- "ing this Treaty, towards either of the Kings, their "Coadjutors, Adherents, and Allies, whoever they be, "or their Lands or Subjects, on occaſion of the War, or "other thing, or for Service the Coadjutors, Adherents, "or Allies of either ſide have performed; or if our Holy "Father will do it of himſelf, both Kings ſhall hinder it, "as well as they can, without Deceit.

"XL. Alſo, the Hoſtages that are to be delivered to "the King of England at Calais, the manner and time "thereof, the two Kings ſhall there direct (1).

Remarks on the Treaty of Bretigny.

After reading this Treaty, the Conditions whereof appear ſo hard for France, a Man can ſcarce forbear repreſenting to himſelf a triumphant King treading upon the Neck of his vanquiſhed Enemy, and obliging him to receive without Examination whatever Terms he is pleaſed to impoſe. Indeed this Idea is very juſt, provided it be not carried too far. But if we pretend to add that of an unjuſt Conqueror exacting from his Enemy, Conditions entirely repugnant to reaſon and Equity, we ſhall doubtleſs frame a wrong Idea of this famous Treaty; the Terms whereof are more moderate, than they appear at firſt ſight. For it muſt be remembred that almoſt all the Provinces reſigned by France to England, belonged formerly to Edward's Predeceſſors, and that not by Conqueſt, or Treaties extorted by Violence, but by a Right of Inheritance, immemorially received from their Anceſtors. Never were the Kings of France heard to complain, that the Dukes of Guienne, or the Earls of Poictiers had wreſted thoſe Countries from them by force. On the contrary, we have ſeen in the Hiſtory of the foregoing Kings, that Philip Auguſtus and St. Lewis diſpoſſeſſed by force of Arms John Lackland and Henry III, not only of the Provinces in queſtion, but likewiſe of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and Normandy. Moreover the Treaty by which they were ſurrendered to France, was made whilſt Henry III was in Captivity to the Earl of Leiceſter. Upon the Suppoſition of theſe Truths, it is eaſy to perceive the Foundation of this Treaty. Edward, improving ſuch favorable Junctures, aimed at the Recovery of what was before wreſted by France from his Anceſtors. It is true he required moreover Calais, the Earldom of Guiſnes, and the Sovereignty of the Provinces he recovered. To clear this Article, it muſt be obſerved, Edward had a Right to demand whatever belonged to his Predeceſſors, not to mention now his Claim to the Crown itſelf. In this belief, he thought, in leaving to France, Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, with the Homage of Bretagne, he gave an Equivalent for Guiſnes and Calais, and the Sovereignty of Guienne. And if to this Ceſſion be now added his Title to the Crown of France, which no doubt he deemed very plauſible ſince he made it the Ground of the War, I do not know whether there will be any great Cauſe to exclaim againſt the Unreaſonableneſs of this Treaty. Edward therefore cannot be blamed for being willing to recover Guienne and all its Dependencies, without condemning at the ſame time Philip Auguſtus and St. Lewis, who took by Force the greateſt Part of that Province from his Anceſtors; and Philip de Valois, who ſeized the reſt before the War was declared, upon the frivolous pretence of Edward's refuſing to obey his Order, forbidding all his Subjects and Vaſſals to harbour Robert d'Artois. If Edward had received that Prince at Bourdeaux, there would have been ſomething to object, but his being Vaſſal for Guienne could not rob him of the Privilege of acting as King of England. In fine, will it be ſaid, that the Kings of France abovementioned had a Right to re-annex to the Crown, Provinces that were part of the Kingdom under the ſecond Race? But Hugh Capet granted them in Fee to Lords, from whom they were devolved to the Kings of England by lawful Succeſſion. Wherefore it can only be pretended that Philip Auguſtus had juſt Cauſe to confiſcate Normandy, Poictou, Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and that Guienne was juſtly forfeited by Edward III. But all this is much eaſier ſaid than proved. If a Preſcription of ſeventy Years is alledged in favour of France, a much longer may be pleaded in behalf of the Kings of England, when theſe Countries were taken from them. 1360.

In fine, if any one ſtill imagines that Edward performed not his Vow, to conclude a Peace upon equitable Terms, let him add to the foregoing Remarks, the Conſideration of the State of the French Affairs at the time of the Treaty of Bretigny. King John was Priſoner at London, and the Dauphin ſhut up in Paris, from whence he durſt not ſtir. An Army of an hundred thouſand Engliſhmen was in the Center of the Kingdom, to which no conſiderable Body of Troops could be oppoſed. Edward was maſter of many Places taken by himſelf, or Generals, ſince his Invaſion. In ſhort, an univerſal Conſternation was ſpread all over the Kingdom, from whence the inteſtine Troubles deſtroyed all hopes of ever being able to expel the Engliſh. Theſe were very real Advantages which Edward actually enjoyed. He might therefore juſtly hope to become maſter of all France, and attain the end he propoſed to himſelf in beginning the War. What then prevented his improving ſo favorable a Juncture? Certainly it could be nothing elſe but willingneſs to be ſatisfied with a Part, when he might have expected the whole; and with a Part which he thought might with Juſtice be taken from France, by whom it was unjuſtly acquired. It is time now to return to the Occurrences, after the Peace of Bretigny (2).

John is conducted to Calais, This famous Treaty, negotiated in eight Days, was approved by both Kings. John was conducted to Calais in July (3), and ſtayed there four Months, according to Agreement. At his firſt Meal he was waited upon by Edward's four Sons, who ſhewed him all poſſible Reſpect, purſuant to the King their Father's Orders. Theſe four Months were ſpent in drawing up all the neceſſary Acts, as well for explaining as confirming and executing the Treaty, that they might be all ſigned the ſame Day. It was not till the 24th of October that the two Kings ſigned and ſwore the Treaty at Calais, where Edward came ſome days before. All matters concerning the Treaty being finiſhed, King John was releaſed on the 26th of the ſame Month. Juſt before his Departure, Edward gave him a ſenſible Mark of Friendſhip, in permitting him to carry with him Prince Philip his Son, taken at the Battle of Poictiers. Of all his Children this was his greateſt Favorite. And though of all the Hoſtages in Edward's hands, this was the chief, by reaſon of his Father's Affection for him, he very readily conſented, he ſhould be one of the ten that were to be freed by the XXII Article of the Peace of Bretigny. The two Monarchs upon parting gave mutual Tokens of cordial Love and Eſteem (4).

and is ſet at Liberty after ſwearing to the Treaty.

He ratifies the Treaty when in France. As ſoon as John arrived at St. Omer, he ratified by his Letters Patent, and voluntarily ſwore to, all the Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny. By that he ſhewed, no Violence had been uſed to oblige him to ſwear at Calais. The reſt of his Behaviour was agreeable to this firſt Step. He ſhewed upon all occaſions that his Intention was to perform his Engagements, and at laſt gave the moſt ſenſible Proof of it, by putting Edward in poſſeſſion of the Countries reſigned to him. There was only ſome Difficulty concerning the Earldom of Gaure in Gaſcogne, and the Territory of Belville in Poictou, about which the two Kings could not agree (5).

Act. Pub. VI. p. 230.

1361. John Chandos. The Peace between the two Crowns appearing thus firmly eſtabliſhed, Edward ſent [Sir John] Chandos into France, to command in his Name, in the Countries belonging to him, with the Title of Lieutenant-General. He could not make a better Choice (6). Chandos was one of the moſt accompliſhed Lords then in England;

(1) In the corrected Inſtrument or Letters of this Treaty, the Words (Reſort and Sovereignty) are always, and in all Articles, omitted, in reſpect to the King of England's enjoying them in the Places which were to be delivered to him, where, in the uncorrected Articles and Inſtrument, they are given to him.

(2) As ſoon as King Edward received the News of the Ratification of this Treaty by the Dauphin Regent of France, he raiſed his Camp from Bretigny, and marching to Calais, came over to England, and landed at Rye, May 18. Du Cheſne, p. 692. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. VI. p. 196.

(4) All things being thus brought to a Concluſion, King Edward embarked at Calais, October 31. and landed at Dover the next Morning.

1361. which is no ſmall Commendation, conſidering the time. As affable and temperate in Peace, as he was brave in War, he was a Subject every way qualified for ſo great an Employ. As the King deſigned to gain the Affection of his new Subjects, he had taken care to ſend them for Governor, a Perſon whoſe Prudence was extremely proper to produce that Effect. Moreover, he ſettled upon him a very conſiderable Salary, which enabled him to keep a ſplendid Court at Niort in Poictou, where he reſided; and inveſted him with Power to pardon all ſorts of Crimes; that both by his outward Luſtre, and the Diſtribution of his Favours, he might procure for his Maſter the Love of the newly conquered People (1).

Edward reſtores to the Priories their Lands.

When Edward ſaw he was like to enjoy a laſting Peace, he reſtored to the Alien-Priories (2) the Lands taken from them twenty Years before, towards the Charges of the War. A thing very uncommon, to ſee Princes freely make Reſtitution of what they have once acquired.

Death of the Duke of Lancaſter. Dugdale's Baron. Knighton.

The Plague ſtill raged in England this Year. Among the reſt, it deprived the Kingdom of the Duke of Lancaſter, the moſt eſteemed of all the Engliſh Lords. He was commonly called the Good Duke. Accordingly, his Death was extremely lamented. He founded the Collegiate-Church of Leiceſter, and in the ſame Place an Hoſpital for three hundred poor Men, which ſtill ſubſiſts to this Day (3).

Marriage of the Prince of Wales. Walſing.

The Prince of Wales, who never thought of marrying during the War, took this peaceable Time to eſpouſe Joanna of Kent, his Couſin, Counteſs Dowager of Holland. This Princeſs was Daughter of Edmund Earl of Kent, beheaded in the beginning of this Reign, by the Intrigues of Queen Iſabella and Mortimer. She was commonly called Joanna the Fair, by reaſon of her great Beauty.

1362. Edward makes Guienne a Principality. Act. Pub. VI. p. 384. Walſing. Knighton.

The next Year, the King being pleaſed to give publick Marks of his Eſteem and Affection for the Prince his eldeſt Son, who had raiſed to ſo great a height the Glory of the Engliſh Name, erected for him the Duchy of Guienne into a Principality, under the Name of the Principality of Aquitaine. Then he ſolemnly inveſted the Prince with it, obliging him only to pay yearly, in lieu of all Service, an Ounce of Gold to the Crown of England (4).

Publick Acts to be in Engliſh. Walſing.

Edward ſpent the reſt of this Year in making ſeveral wiſe Regulations with his Parliament, concerning domeſtick Affairs (5). Such, for example, was the decreeing that for the future, in the Courts of Juſtice, and in all Publick Acts (6), the Engliſh Language ſhould be uſed inſtead of the French or Norman, introduced by William the Conqueror.

A General Pardon. Id.

In this Parliament the King declared, that being arrived to his fiftieth Year, he would have it ſolemnized as a ſort of Jubilee. To that end, he granted a general Pardon for all Offences whatever, Treaſon itſelf not excepted (7); He confirmed alſo Magna Charta, which was confirmed ten ſeveral times in this Reign.

Edward confers Titles on his Sons. Id.

After Edward had performed what he thought neceſſary for the Publick, he was pleaſed likewiſe to do ſomething for his Family, by creating Lionel, his third Son, Duke of Clarence: John of Gant, his fourth Son, Duke of Lancaſter: And the fifth, called Edmund, Earl of Cambridge. In fine, after eſtabliſhing the Staple of Wool at Calais, he was pleaſed to ſpend the reſt of the Winter in Entertainments and Diverſions. He took a Progreſs into ſeveral Counties, attended by the principal Nobility, and the French Hoſtages, who partook of all the Recreations which the People ſtrove to divert their Sovereign with.

1363. The Prince of Wales goes and keeps his Court at Bourdeaux. Walſing. Froiſſart.

In the beginning of the Year 1363 (8), the Prince of Wales departed for his Government of Acquitaine. He reſided at Bourdeaux, where he kept a Royal Court, beloved and reſpected by all his Subjects, who were very happy in being governed by ſo great a Prince (9).

1363. King John returns to England. Act. Pub. VI. p. 430. Pretended Reaſons of his Return. Froiſſart. Mezerai.

This ſame Year was remarkable for King John's Return into England, where it is pretended he came to yield himſelf Priſoner again, to atone for the Fault committed by the Duke of Anjou, his ſecond Son, in withdrawing from Calais without leave. At leaſt, this is the Reaſon generally given of this extraordinary Proceeding. Some add, he had a mind to confer in Perſon with Edward about the Cruſade, of which he was declared General by the Pope. There are Hiſtorians, who have made no ſcruple to advance a much leſs noble motive of his Return. They pretend, his Paſſion for the Counteſs of Salisbury, was the real Cauſe of this Journey, to which other Motives ſerved only for a Pretence. But this is a romantick Notion, without any Foundation (10). Whatever enquiry has been hitherto made, the real Occaſion of this Prince's Return is ſtill a Secret. That of Love is the moſt unlikely; and that of repairing the Fault of the Duke of Anjou, though adopted by the Generality of Hiſtorians, is, I think, groundleſs. To clear this matter, it will be neceſſary to relate ſome particulars which belong to the Hiſtory, and which I have reſerved for this Place, though they were tranſacted between the Treaty of Bretigny, and the Time I am now ſpeaking of.

Among the thirty Hoſtages in the Hands of Edward, beſides the Burghers of ſeveral Cities, there were four Princes of the Blood; namely, Philip, Duke of Orleans, King John's Brother; Lewis, Duke of Anjou; John, Earl of Poictiers, afterwards Duke of Berry; and the Duke of Bourbon. Theſe four Princes, commonly ſtiled, The Lords of the Flower-de-Luce, being tired of England, fought all poſſible means to return into their Country. This however was no eaſy thing, ſince upon theſe four Hoſtages Edward chiefly relied for the full Performance of the Treaty of Bretigny, and particularly for the Payment of King John's Ranſom. Nevertheleſs, by their Sollicitations, they agreed with him for their Liberty, upon the following Terms: I. That the King ſhould releaſe theſe four Princes, provided, that before the firſt of November, the Territory of Belville, and Earldom of Gaure were reſigned to him, with two hundred thouſand Florins. II. That before the Departure of the Princes, certain Lands in Poictou ſhould be given him for Pledge. III. That in caſe the firſt Article was not executed by the Time agreed on, the Lands given in Pledge ſhould remain to the King for ever, and the four Princes be obliged to ſurrender themſelves in Hoſtage as before. There were ſome other Articles, but of no uſe in clearing this Fact. John ratified this Agreement, and the four Hoſtages were conducted to Calais, where they continued upon their Parole, till the Execution of the firſt Article. They had liberty to go out of the Town whenever they pleaſed, and even to ſtay away three Days, provided they came and lodged within the Walls on the fourth. It appears by Edward's Letter to the Prince of Wales, inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this Agreement was not executed, and thereby the Princes deſpaired of recovering their Liberty ſo ſoon (11). The Duke of Anjou, more impatient, and leſs ſcrupulous than the reſt, took advantage of his Permiſſion to go out of Calais, to make his eſcape, and returned no more. Four other leſs conſiderable Hoſtages followed his ill Example. This is the Foundation whereon it is aſſerted, that King John came and ſurrendered himſelf Priſoner at London; namely, to repair the Fault of the Prince his Son. But as nothing in the Collection of the Publick Acts gives the leaſt hint, that this was the motive of his Voyage, there is great reaſon to queſtion it. Beſides, King John was by no means obliged to take this Step, even tho' all the Hoſtages had made their Eſcape; his whole Engagement conſiſting only in ſending the ſame Hoſtages, or others of the like Quality in their room (12). Now it is not ſaid, that the Duke of Anjou abſented himſelf from his Father's Court, and con-

1363. sequently it was eaſy to ſend him back. In ſhort, if John returned to London as a Priſoner, he would by that very thing have freed all the Hoſtages, ſince they were detained at preſent only as Security for the Payment of his Ranſom. All the reſt of the Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny were executed, except that relating to Gaure and Belville, which required not ſo great Security. And yet, during John's three Months ſtay at London, there was never any talk of releaſing the Hoſtages. Froiſſart, whoſe Teſtimony is urged, does not ſay, John ſurrendred himſelf Priſoner again, but only that one of the Motives of his Voyage was to excuſe, and not to repair, the Duke of Anjou's Fault. Theſe
C. 220. are the Hiſtorian's own Words: I was then informed, and true it was, that King John purpoſed and deſired to go and ſee King Edward, his Brother, in England, and could not be diſſuaded from his purpoſe, though he was ſufficiently adviſed to the contrary: And being told by ſeveral Barons and Prelates, he was going to commit a great Indiſcretion, he replied, He had found ſo much Honour in the King of England and his Sons, that he did not queſtion their proving his true and faithful Friends on all occaſions; and moreover, he had a mind to excuſe the Duke of Anjou his Son, who was returned into France. Here is nothing importing, that John returned to England to yield himſelf Priſoner, and therefore it is plainly a groundleſs Aſſertion. As for the third Motive, namely, his deſire to confer with Edward about the Cruſade, it is much more probable. But after all, this is only a Conjecture, which cannot be entirely relied on (1).

John is honourably received in England. Froiſſart. c. 221. Knighton.

When Edward heard, John was landed at Dover (2), he ſent the Princes his Sons, with a great Retinue of Nobles, to receive him, and conduct him to London, where he paid him all the Reſpect due to his Rank and Merit. The Kings of Scotland and Cyprus, who were then in England, made his Reception the more ſplendid. The former was come to pay Edward a Viſit, and the latter to deſire his Aid againſt the Infidels. Upon ſo uncommon an occaſion, Edward took a Pleaſure in entertaining his illuſtrious Gueſts, with all poſſible Magnificence, and with all the Diverſions he could think of. The Mayor of London made a ſplendid Entertainment for the four Kings, in the Name of the City. The Sumptuouſneſs of a Wine-Merchant. Stow's Survey. Sumptuouſneſs of Sir Henry Picard, Citizen and Wine-Merchant, ought not to be paſſed over in Silence. He invited all the four Kings, with their Retinues, to a Feaſt at his own Houſe (3), where they were magnificently entertained. King John lodged in the Palace of the Savoy, as before, and was ſtill treated at the King's Expence. About the middle of March, three Months after his Arrival at London, he was ſeized with a Diſtemper of which he died the 8th of April 1364, to Edward's great Grief, who had a ſingular Eſteem for his Virtue. There is aſcribed to this Prince a Saying, worthy to be had in eternal Remembrance by Poſterity: Though Faith and Truth were baniſhed from the reſt of the World, they ought, however, to be preſerved in the Mouth of Kings. It is pretended, this was ſaid on the occaſion of his returning into England; but it may, with much more likelihood, be aſcribed to his ſincere Performance of the Treaty of Bretigny, in ſpite of the Obſtacles thrown in his way by ſome of his Counſellors (4). Charles V. his Succeſſor, followed not the ſame Maxims.

1364. Death of King John. Froiſſart, ibid. Walſing. Knighton.

Edward's good Fortune not only ſhed its Influence on himſelf and his Subjects, but alſo on his Allies. This ſame Year, John de Montfort his Son-in-law, won the famous Battle of Avray, againſt Charles de Blois his Competitor, who was ſlain. This Victory decided the Quarrel between the two Houſes, who were contending for the Duchy of Bretagne, and produced the Treaty of Guerande, whereby Bretagne was aſſigned to John de Montfort, who did Homage for it to the King of France (5). Bertrand du Gueſclin, who ſerved Charles de Blois, and became afterwards very famous, was taken in this Battle by Sir John Chandos, General of the Engliſh Troops in Montfort's Service. 1364. Battle of Avray, which put Montfort in Poſſeſſion of Bretagne. Froiſſart. l. 1. c. 229. Walſing. Knighton.

The Engliſh Name was then famous in all Parts of the World. Some gallant Engliſhmen who had attended [Guy de Luſignan] King of Cyprus into the Eaſt, performed Wonders, and returned loaded with Honours and Riches taken from the Infidels. At the ſame time, Thomas Hackwood an Engliſhman, who departed from England a Journeyman Taylor, taking afterwards to Arms, ſignalized himſelf in the Italian Wars, by his Valour and Conduct, which raiſed him to the higheſt Poſts. He gained ſuch Honour and Reputation for reſtoring in thoſe parts military Diſcipline, which was almoſt entirely loſt, that after his Death the Florentines erected in their City, a black Marble Statue, in memory of the Services he had done them (6). John Chandos and Robert Knollet diſtinguiſhed themſelves likewiſe in a very ſingular manner, in all Edward's Wars with France. The Fame of the Engliſh not only reached beyond the Alps, but flew alſo over the Pyrenæan Mountains, as we ſhall ſee preſently (7). 1365. Exploits of ſome Engliſhmen in the Eaſt. Fortune of Thomas Hackwood. Edward's great Acquiſitions in France, made Pope Urban VI, think the preſent Juncture very proper, to demand the Tribute promiſed by King John Lackland to the Roman Church, and of which there was thirty Years Arrears due. In this belief he was pleaſed to require the Payment, but with ſo much Haughtineſs, that he nominated, even beforehand, Commiſſioners to ſummon Edward before him in caſe of refuſal. The King's great Spirit not brooking ſuch haughty Proceedings, he cauſed the Pope's Demand to be laid before the Parliament (8), where it was declared, "That the King of England, "had not Power to bring his Realm in ſuch Servitude, "without the conſent of Parliament: That, if Neceſſity "forced King John to ſuch a proceeding, his Engage-"ment was null, as being contrary to his Coronation-"Oath." This auguſt Aſſembly, not content with ſo particular a Deciſion, came alſo to this vigorous Reſolution: "That, if the Pope ſhould attempt by any means "whatever, to proſecute his unjuſt Pretenſions, the Na-"tion ſhould with all their Power oppoſe him." The Firmneſs of the Parliament cauſed the Pope to deſiſt, and had not only a preſent Effect, but prevented the Kings of England from being ever after troubled, upon that occaſion. 1366. Urban IV, proudly demands the Arrears of his Tribute. O. Raynald. The Parliament declares King John's Engagement to be void. Rot. Parl. 40 Edw. III, N. 1.---3.

The Prince of Wales lived three Years in Guienne without exerciſing his Valour, and even without any Proſpect of doing it a good while. On a ſudden he was drawn out of this State of Tranquillity, by the Sollicitations of Peter King of Caſtile, ſirnamed the Cruel, who was lately expelled his Dominions. Never did Prince give his People greater Cauſe of Diſcontent. Cruel to exceſs, and of an unbounded Avarice, he illegally put to Death his Affairs of Caſtile. Froiſſart. l. 1. c. 231. Mezerai.

For all which, upon his Requeſt, Edward entirely forgave him, and cauſed the Gold and Arms to be ſeized. But this ſeems to be an improbable and malicious Story, inconſiſtent with the Character of this Prince, who was deemed one of the braveſt, and moſt liberal and ſincere Princes of his Time. His Body was carried into France, and buried at St. Denys.

(6) When, upon the Delivery of the Towns to the French King by the Treaty of Bretigny, the Officers and Soldiers were ordered to depart, ſome Engliſh, and many more Germans and Flemings, refuſed to obey thoſe Orders; and being reſolved to maintain themſelves by War, great Numbers of common Soldiers of all Nations flocked to them, and increaſing to ſixteen thouſand Men, ravaged France in a miſerable Manner. At length dividing themſelves into two Bodies, one Part marched to Avignon, and by their ravages grew ſo formidable to the Pope that he publiſhed a Cruſade againſt them; but that coming to nothing, he ingaged the Marquiſs of Montferrat to hire theſe Adventurers, to aſſiſt him in his Wars againſt the Viſcount of Milan. The Marquiſs accordingly treated with their Captain Sir John Hawkwood an Engliſhman, and agreeing with him, Hawkwood went with his Men into Italy, to the great Joy of the French King. Hawkwood was a Tanner's Son of Eſſex, and being bound Apprentice to a Tailor in London quitted his Trade, and went a Soldier into France, where he was knighted for his Valour, and going into Italy (as was ſaid) was ſo much in favour with the Duke of Milan, that he gave him his natural Daughter in Marriage. After the Duke's Death, he ſerved the Commonwealth of Florence, and performed ſuch great Actions for them, that dying in their Service, they erected a Monument for him in the Cathedral of that City. The Tranſlator ſerving as Chaplain to Sir Charles Wager, in the late Expedition to Italy on Don Carlos's Account, and being at Florence, took particular notice of this Monument. He is painted on the Wall of the Church on Horſeback in Armor, the whole of a green Colour, with theſe two lines under his Horſe's Feet.

1366. great Men, with the ſole View of confiſcating their Eſtates. He minded only the gratifying his Paſſions, without any regard to Honour or Conſcience. His Barbarity was grown to that height, that he poiſoned Blanche de Bourbon his Wife, Siſter of the Queen of France, to marry Maria de Padilla, whom he had long kept as his Miſtreſs. Of his five Baſtard-Brothers, the eldeſt had lately been ſacrificed to his Suſpicions, and the other four were in Danger. Henry Earl of Treſtamare, one of theſe Brothers, ſeeing himſelf every moment threatned with the ſame Fate, rebelled againſt Peter, and ingaged in his Quarrel the King of Arragon, with the principal Caſtilian Lords, who could no longer bear the Tyranny of their Sovereign. His Enterprize being at firſt unſucceſsful, he was repulſed by the Tyrant, and forced to fly to the King of France, who promiſed him Aid. Beſides King Charles's deſire to revenge the Death of the Queen his Siſter-in-law, he was very glad to find Employment for a great Number of idle Soldiers, who, ſince the late Peace ſwarmed in France, and committed great Diſorders (1). With this view, he raiſed for Henry's Aſſiſtance an Army, the Command whereof he gave to John de Bourbon Earl of Marche, the Queen's Couſin-German, and was pleaſed that du Gueſclin, whoſe Ranſom he paid to Chandos, ſhould be of this Expedition.

With theſe Troops, and the Aſſiſtance of the Caſtilians, Henry marched through Arragon into Caſtile, where the Tyrant ſaw himſelf immediately forſaken by all his Nobles, except one ſingle Knight. This Defection putting it out of his Power to withſtand his Brother, he would have retired into Portugal, but was denied Entrance. In this Diſtreſs, he choſe to go out of Spain, by way of Bayonne, from whence he repaired to Bourdeaux, to implore the Aid and Protection of the Prince of Wales. If the young Heroe had reflected on the Unworthineſs of the Prince who deſired his Aſſiſtance, he would doubtleſs have refuſed his Requeſt. But conſidering, on this Occaſion, only the Honour of reſtoring a depoſed King, and perhaps weary of an unactive Life, he undertook to replace him on the Throne. To that end, he levied an Army of thirty thouſand Men, and marched at their Head towards Spain, loaded with Promiſes (2) from the Caſtilian, and big with Expectation of gathering freſh Laurels (3). As he had no other way to enter Caſtile but through Navarre, he had taken care to ſecure a Paſſage, by a Treaty with the King of that Country (4). So he marched without oppoſition to the Frontiers of Caſtile. Henry, who was now crowned at Burgos, receiving Advice of the March of the Engliſh Prince, advanced towards Navarre with a powerful Army, to oppoſe his Paſſage. He might very poſſibly have executed his Deſign, conſidering the Superiority of his Forces, had he been ſo wiſe as to avoid a Battle. This the Prince of Wales was moſt apprehenſive of, and therefore to provoke him, ſent him a very inſulting Defiance, which Henry could not forbear to accept. The two Armies approaching each other, the Battle was fought near Nejara (5), a little Town on the Frontiers of Caſtile. As the Fields of Creſſy and Poictiers had ſeen the Prince of Wales perform Wonders, that of Nejara was likewiſe Witneſs of his heroic Actions, which after a long Struggle, made Victory incline to his Side. The Spaniſh Army reinforced with a ſtrong Body of French Troops, was entirely routed. Bertrand du Gueſclin, with the Marſhal D' Endreghen were taken Priſoners. Henry having no refuge left in Caſtile, after the loſs of his Army, retired into Arragon, from whence he repaired to Languedoc, to implore the Aid of the Duke of Anjou the Governor.

Peter thanks the Prince for the Victory. Act. Pub. VI. p. 531. 1368.

Peter was at firſt ſo grateful, that preſently after the Battle, he threw himſelf at the Prince of Wales's Feet, to thank him for reſtoring him to his Kingdom. The Prince of Wales lifting him up immediately, and holding him in his Arms, ſaid, "It was to God alone he was "indebted for the Victory, and not to a Prince who was "only a weak Inſtrument in his hand." The Conſequence of this good Succeſs was the Reſtoration of Peter to the Throne from whence he had been driven. It was now time for that Prince to think of performing his Promiſes, and rewarding the brave Soldiers, who had ventured their Lives in his Service. But as he was no leſs perfidious than cruel, after long feeding them with hopes of Proviſions and Money, he repaid them with black Ingratitude. Want ſoon bred among the Soldiers a Mortality, which ſwept away great Numbers, and the fear of loſing the reſt obliged the Prince, who ſaw himſelf baſely amuſed, to retire extremely diſſatisfied. He was even forced to ſell his Plate, to provide for the more preſſing occaſions of his Army, till he could entirely ſatisfy them. But this was not all the Miſchief cauſed by this fatal Expedition. During the Prince's ſtay in Spain, he contracted a Diſtemper of which he never recovered. 1368.

But repays him with Ingratitude. The Prince returns to Guienne. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 238.

Thus ended the Enterprize of the Prince of Wales, an Enterprize glorious indeed, if the Succeſs only be conſidered, but not very honorable as to the Cauſe he eſpouſed, ſince it was ſolely to reſtore to the Throne the baſeſt of Princes. Heaven afterwards took care to revenge the Engliſh and Caſtilians. Du Gueſclin paying his Ranſom, went and joined Henry again, and both together laboured, with the Aſſiſtance of France, to bring a freſh Army into the Field. As ſoon as they were ready, they re-entered Caſtile, and made ſo great a Progreſs, that they were ſoon in condition to beſiege Toledo. Peter flying to the Relief of that City, was defeated and forced to retire to the Caſtle of Montiel, where he was immediately inveſted. As he ſaw his Caſe to be deſperate, he reſolved to go to Du Gueſclin in his Tent, imagining he would procure him tolerable Conditions, or help him to make his Eſcape. Unhappily for him, he found Henry his Brother there. The two Princes falling firſt to Reproaches, and then to Blows, Henry threw his Brother to the Ground, and ſtabbed him with his Dagger. After that he cauſed himſelf to be once more acknowledged King of Caſtile, without any oppoſition.

Cataſtrophe of Peter. Ib. c. 240.

Edward III has appeared hitherto on the Theatre of the World, as one of the moſt glorious Princes that ever ſwayed Scepter. If he had finiſhed his Courſe before the Revolution I am going to ſpeak of, perhaps it would have been difficult to find an Inſtance of a Reign more conſtantly fortunate. But his latter Years will preſent us with a very different Scene from thoſe we have ſeen. Fortune grew weary of favouring this Monarch in his old Age, after careſſing him ſo much in his younger Days. She robbed him before his Death of all his glorious Conqueſts, which were purchaſed ſo dearly, and theſe Loſſes were attended with many other Vexations. This is what remains to be conſidered in the Sequel of this Reign (6).

Difference between the end, and beginning of Edward's Reign.

Lionel Duke of Clarence Edward's third Son, being contracted to Violanta Daughter of John Galeazzo Duke of Milan (7), went to conſummate his Marriage, with a ſplendid Retinue, and many young Noblemen who attended him to do him honour. For ſome time there was nothing but Entertainments and Diverſions, which were daily renewed in favour of a Prince whoſe Alliance was ſo honorable to the Duke of Milan. Theſe Diverſions ſo laviſhly procured him, haſtened his end. Five Months after his Marriage, he died in Montferrat in the thirty ſecond Year of his Age. By his firſt Marriage with the ſole Heireſs of the Earl of Ulſter in Ireland, he left a Daughter called Philippa, of whoſe Poſterity I ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak hereafter (8).

Edward's Trouble for the Loſs of his Son was quickly followed by another, of which he was no leſs ſenſible. The Treaty of Bretigny was ſo diſadvantagious to France, that Charles V, who had himſelf made it, probably conſented to it only with Intention to break it, the firſt opportunity. The French were no better diſpoſed. This quickly appeared in all the Difficulties cauſed by them when the reſigned Provinces came to be delivered to the King of England. King John was the only Perſon that acted with Sincerity, and it was he, that by his own Authority prevented theſe Obſtacles from being carried

As they were moſt Engliſh, the King of England was deſired to reſtrain them by his Authority, who calling them home by Proclamation, they replied, as they held nothing in England of the King, ſo neither for him, nor any one elſe, would they leave their Garriſons and Livelihood, got with ſo much labour. Walſ. p. 178.

1369. too far. Charles his Son and Succeſſor, whom the French firname the Wiſe, was not of ſo ſcrupulous a Temper. He was no ſooner on the Throne, but he tried to evade what remained unexecuted of the Treaty. He even neglected to do Edward Juſtice upon the Duke of Anjou's Eſcape, nor delivered up the Earldom of Gaure. The Judgment upon the Affair of Belville, referred to Arbitrators, was delayed on ſeveral pretences. King John's Ranſom was not paid, or if Charles paid any thing after his Acceſſion to the Crown, it was but a ſmall part in reſpect of what was yet due. Mean time Edward, who had ſtill in his hands the Dukes of Berry and Orleans, and ſeveral other Hoſtages, could not imagine, that Charles thought of renewing the War, and believed his Inability to be the only Cauſe of all theſe Delays. Affairs proceeded thus ſlowly from the Death of John, till his Succeſſor was able to take juſt meaſures, to accompliſh his Deſigns. He ever pretended a Willingneſs to complete the Execution of the Treaty, and, under colour of paying his Father's Ranſom, to which he was bound, he heaped up Money very liberally ſupplied by the States, well knowing for what it was intended. With this Aid he engaged ſeveral German Princes in his Intereſt, and when he thought matters ripe, ſought a pretence to break with England.

When Edward was meditating a War with France, he believed it proper to attach to his Service the principal Lords of Guienne, by ſeveral Grants which he revoked immediately after a Peace. This Proceeding ſo exaſperated theſe Lords, that they wanted only a favorable Opportunity to ſhow their Reſentment. In all appearance, they would have long waited in vain, if Charles had not given them private Intimation that they ſhould be ſupported. As ſoon as they were ſure of his Protection, nothing was wanting but a pretence to complain; and they were not long without having one, as they thought, ſufficiently plauſible, to authorize them to throw off the Maſk.

The Prince of Wales lays a Tax on Guienne. Froiſſart. l. 1. c. 239, 240.

The Prince of Wales having laid upon Guienne a Tax [called Feuage, or Chimney-Money] in order to pay the Arrears due to the Troops levied for the Spaniſh War (1), inadvertently furniſhed his Enemies with the deſired Opportunity to declare themſelves. The Lord d'Albret, the Earls of Armagnac, Cominges, Perigord, and Carmaing, incouraging their Vaſſals to complain of this new Tax, received their Complaints, brought them to the Prince, and addreſſed him upon that occaſion. Their Remonſtrances were ill received, both becauſe the Prince was in want of Money, and by reaſon of the Haughtineſs wherewith they were made. This was the very thing the Lords wanted. On pretence they could not have Juſtice from their Prince, they applied to the King of France, whom they ſuppoſed to be ſtill Sovereign Lord of Guienne, and prayed him to grant them Letters of Appeal to his Parliament. Charles not thinking proper to declare himſelf yet, cheriſhed this Diſpoſition, and in the mean time, kept them at Paris. The Journey of theſe Lords, and their long Stay at the Court of France, gave the Prince of Wales ſome Suſpicion. He writ Letter after Letter to the King his Father, to warn him that ſomething was contriving at Paris againſt him, but theſe Warnings were to no purpoſe. The King and his Council imagining, the warlike Prince tired with an idle Life ſought occaſion to renew the War, were regardleſs of his Remonſtrances.

Walſing.

Whilſt Edward relied on the Sincerity of the French, his Son's Diſtemper daily growing more dangerous, turned at laſt to a real Dropſy. The Prince's ill State of Health, and the King his Father's Infirmneſs, haſtened the Reſolutions of the King of France. As he ſaw there could not be a more favorable Juncture to execute his Deſigns, he granted the Gaſcon Lords, the Letters of Appeal they required; pretending, notwithſtanding his Oaths, and all his Father's Reſignations and Renunciations, that he was ſtill Sovereign of Guienne. He built his Pretenſions upon Edward's not having ſent his Renunciation to the Crown of France, purſuant to the Treaty of Bretigny. But that Renunciation being only a Conſequence of the full Performance of the Treaty, Edward did not think himſelf, as indeed he was not, bound to make it, till the whole was executed. However he had abſolutely quitted the Title of King of France (2), a clear Evidence that he had no ill Intentions. Beſides, Charles himſelf had not been more punctual to renounce the Provinces yielded to England by the Treaty of Bretigny. Theſe reciprocal Renunciations were conſidered as the Seal of the Treaty, after the two Kings ſhould be ſatisfied concerning the Execution. However that be, Charles uſed this Pretence to ſummon the Prince of Wales to appear before the Court of Peers, to anſwer for his pretended Tyranny upon the People of thoſe Provinces (3). The Prince's high Spirit not ſuffering him to bear this Affront without ſhowing his Reſentment, he replied, he would not fail to appear, but it ſhould be at the head of ſixty thouſand Men. Mean while Charles was amuſing Edward, by expoſtulating with him, as if he were deſirous the Affair ſhould be put in Negotiation. Edward anſwered by giving Words for Words, not imagining they really deſigned to diſpute his Sovereignty of Guienne, ſo clearly ſettled in the Treaty of Bretigny, and much leſs that France was able to renew the War. But he prepoſterouſly flattered himſelf. It was not the Sovereignty of Guienne only that Charles deſigned to diſpute, he pretended moreover that the Treaty of Bretigny was void, becauſe Edward had not prevented certain Plunderers (4) that came out of his Dominions, from entering France, and becauſe he had not evacuated all the Towns that were to be reſtored. On theſe Pretences he ordered War to be proclaimed by a Footman, becauſe the Prince of Wales had ſeized thoſe that brought him the Summons. Shortly after, he publiſhed an Edict confiſcating all the Lands held by the Engliſh in France, and annexed them to the Crown.

He proclaims War. Id. c. 246.

The Praiſes beſtowed on this Prince by the French Writers for ſo wiſely improving the Junctures that offered to recover his Dominions, deſerve ſome Reflection. It is true, he acted with Prudence, if Sincerity and Honeſty are to go for nothing. The good Succeſs his Conduct was crowned with, freed France for a time from her unfortunate Condition. But if we conſider it cloſely, this Prudence is real Perfidiouſneſs. For even ſuppoſing Edward had not executed any one Article of the Treaty, his Non-performance did not give Charles a Right to proclaim War againſt him. The King his Father and himſelf had expreſsly renounced, with an Oath, all violent Methods in caſe of Non-execution. Beſides, he had not himſelf performed all the Articles of the Treaty, ſo that all he could reaſonably demand, was a Compenſation. But it was an open renouncing of good Faith, to annul the whole Treaty, on pretence that ſome Articles remained ſtill to be performed by England, when he himſelf left ſeveral unexecuted. Moreover, his Pretences of a Rupture were ſo frivolous, that the French Hiſtorians not being able to relate them preciſely, confine themſelves to Generals, without mentioning Particulars. The moſt plauſible Pretence alledged by Froiſſart, is this, The Prince of Wales not having wherewithal to pay the Troops lately returned from Spain, ſix thouſand Men disbanding themſelves, and afterwards joining again, committed great Ravages in Guienne. The Prince deſiring them to depart his Dominions, they threw themſelves into the neighbouring Provinces of France, and plundered them unpuniſhed, the French not being able to hinder them. Suppoſing the Thing to be as Froiſſart relates it, it was not now practicable for the Prince of Wales to go into France and quell theſe roving Plunderers, who had entered that Kingdom. It appears however, he did all that lay in his Power, ſince he impoſed on his Dukedom the Feuage-Tax, in order to pay his Troops. But Charles made this very Thing a pretence for a Rupture, whence it is evident he only ſought occaſion to quarrel. The ſame Hiſtorian ſays further, that Charles ordering the Treaty of Bretigny to be examined in his Council, the chief Debate ran upon the Article, whereby the two Kings renounced all violent methods in caſe of Non-execution. He adds, he was adviſed upon that foundation to proceed to a Rupture, becauſe Edward never ceaſed to make War upon France. But he does not ſay, How or Where, neither mentions any particulars. However, from what that Author relates, it is very eaſy to infer, that before the Treaty was examined, Charles had reſolved upon War, and, that this Examination was only made to find ſome Pretence. Mezerai ſays, the occaſion of the Rupture was, Edward's not withdrawing all his Troops out of the Kingdom; but does not name any one Place where theſe Troops remained. Thus it is manifeſt, the French Authors were at a loſs what to alledge.

Art. XXXVI.

From what has been ſaid, it may be eaſily concluded, that Charles's Wiſdom was not a very ſcrupulous Virtue; whether he ſigned the Treaty with an Intention to break it, or formed not that deſign till a favorable opportunity offered. It is therefore the Effect, and not the Cauſe, which made this Prince's Conduct to be ſo much admired. Had he been as unſucceſsful, as he was fortunate, he would have re-plunged France into a gulph of 1369. Misery, and thereby justly incurred the blame of the whole World, and doubtless, of those very Writers who have given him so great Commendations.

Miſery

State of Affairs between the two Crowns.

Before I enter upon the particulars of this second War, it will be farther necessary to consider, how matters stood between the two Crowns, at the time of the Rupture. The French complained, Edward had not ceased to make War against France, nor withdrawn all his Troops out of the Kingdom, pursuant to his Engagements. But these are general Complaints, containing no particular Fact. Besides, it is not very likely, that Edward, to whom this Treaty was so advantagious, would have furnished France with a pretence to break it. The Treaty it self shews, the English Monarch's Engagements were inconsiderable, in respect of the advantages he reaped by it. This gives occasion to presume, that being a Prince of great Abilities, as all must own, he could not be so unwise as to raise any Obstacles himself against the execution of so advantagious a Treaty. As for the pretended Injury done the Gascons by the Prince of Wales, it is evident from the Treaty, that Charles had no right to interpose.

It was not the same with respect to the English, whose Complaints appear much more just. It is true, King John, whose Sincerity can never be too much commended, performed the Treaty to the utmost of his power. He was no sooner returned into his Dominions, but he ratified every Article, separately, by particular Acts. Then, not content with the swearing himself to the observance thereof, he obliged the Dauphin his Son, who was to succeed him, to take the same Oath. So that all defects in his Engagements, by reason of his Captivity, were removed by his Ratifications, when at full Liberty in his own Territories. Performance was a still more authentick Confirmation than Promises or Oaths. He put Edward in possession of the Lands resigned by the Treaty, without any reserve, and particularly those held of Guienne. If he had not meant to give up the Sovereignty with the Lands, it is not credible that he, and the Prince his Son, should make no exception of that Sovereignty, either in the Treaty it self, or in any of the Ratifications of each particular Article. At least they would not have neglected to make a Protestation, when Edward erected Guienne into a Principality, and invested the Prince his Son, without the participation of France. Indeed, there was a Dispute between the two Kings, concerning two inconsiderable Territories, but not to quarrel for such a Trifle, the matter was put to Arbitration. As for the Ransom, King John's Inability was the sole Cause of his not paying it at the time appointed. Edward was so well satisfied of that Prince's Sincerity, that he made no scruple to prolong the time of Payment, in order to give him some respite. This Moderation was the reason why at the time of King John's Death, there remained still to pay, two hundred thousand Crowns of the first Million. Moreover, in expectation, that John, or the Dauphin his Son, would pay him in time, Edward was not so strict with regard to the Hostages as he should have been. I have observed he readily consented, that Prince Philip, afterwards Duke of Burgundy, should be one of the Ten to be released by the XVIIth Article of the Treaty, tho' it was in his Power to give one of less Distinction. All the rest had in England all the Liberty they could reasonably desire. The Collection of the Publick Acts is full of Licences granted them, to go and take care of their private Affairs in France. The Duke of Anjou, the Earls of Grandpré and Brenne, the Lords of Clere and Derval abused this favour, and all Edward's Instances could not procure him the least Satisfaction upon that Article.

Ib. p. 484, 562.

The Affair of Belville being put to Arbitration, Edward relying on the Sincerity of the French, and the Justice of his Cause, made no scruple to enter into an Engagement, to which he was not obliged. He was pleased, even after the Duke of Anjou's Escape, to promise to release the Duke of Berry, and the Earl of Alenson, in case the matter in dispute was decided in favour of France. He even carried his Generosity so far, as to give these two Princes leave to return home, contenting himself with taking their word, that if the Affair was determined in his favour by the Arbitrators, they would come back to England and remain in Hostage, only till he was in possession of the Territory in dispute. These two Princes embraced his Generosity, and returned to France. Mean while, the Affair was left undecided, and the Hostages thought no more of returning. 1369. p. 492, 544.

Charles d' Artois made his Escape without taking Leave.

The Lords of Luxemburg, Estampes and Hengest, died in England, and Charles sent not other Hostages in their room, though he was often required.

The Earl of Harcourt had leave for a certain time, and returned no more. Act. Pub. VI. p. 473.

Guy de Blois did the same thing; but agreed afterwards with Edward, by giving him Soissons. p. 568.

Montmorency, Boucherche and Maulevrier, had leave to go to France, but took care never to return. It is likely, however, they gave the King some Satisfaction, since we do not find any Complaint against them in the Collection of the Publick Acts, from whence I have taken these particulars. Ib. p. 551, 568.

As for the other Hostages of less note, and the Burgesses of the Towns, whereof Toulouse neglected to send Her's, Edward generously gave some their Freedom, and the rest compounded for their Ransom, or died in England.

As for King John's Ransom, there still remained unpaid, near two Millions. It is true, Edward received of Charles, at several times, about three hundred thousand Crowns, which, added to what was paid by the King his Father, amounted to little more than the first Million, which was due seven or eight Months before.

It appears then, that Edward was the only Person wronged, and yet Charles pretended, the Treaty of Bretigny was void, by the Non-Performance of some Articles on the part of England; Articles, which no Historian has distinctly mentioned. Upon this foundation he asserted, that France, restored to her antient Right, might justly confiscate the Provinces resigned to England. After these Remarks, which seemed necessary for clearing this Fact, it is time to resume the thread of the History.

Froissart, l. 1. c. 246.

Edward was extremely surprized to find that Charles who passed not for a Warrior, durst attempt to enter into competition with a Prince that had gained so many Battles. He was still more astonished, shortly after, when he heard that the Earldom of Ponthieu was seized (1), and the principal Cities of Guienne were in Arms against him. He summoned a Parliament (2), which granted him a great Aid to maintain so necessary a War, wherein he was unwillingly engaged. By the Advice of this Parliament, he re-assumed the Title of King of France, which he had relinquished since the Peace (3). After obtaining this Aid from his Subjects, and a positive Promise to support him as long as the War should last, his first Care was to send Troops to the Prince of Wales, to recover the Cities of Guienne. Then he dispatched the Duke of Lancaster, his fourth Son, to Calais, with a powerful Army. But the Duke's Progress ended only in ravaging the open Country, without making any Conquest.

The renewal of the War was not the only thing that disturbed Edward's Repose this Year. The Loss of his Queen was to him a very great increase of Affliction. He had lived with her forty Years in perfect Union, and had by her twelve Children. This good Queen was likewise extremely lamented by the People, Limoges revolts. Ibidem.

Guienne was in no better ſtate. The Prince of Wales, who, becauſe of his Illneſs, could do little more than give Directions, ſaw himſelf extremely weakened by the Revolt of the chief Towns depending on his Principality of Aquitain. Limoges, a City of great importance, was ſurprized by the French, or rather deſired to change Maſters. The Diſloyalty of the Inhabitants ſo incenſed the Prince, that he reſolved to make them an Example. To that end, having received a Supply of Troops, brought him by the Duke of Lancaſter and the Earl of Cambridge, he beſieged the Town, took it by Storm, and put all the Inhabitants to the Sword.

This was the laſt warlike Exploit of that great Prince, whoſe Diſtemper obliged him to be carried in a Litter. At laſt, finding himſelf utterly unable to act, he reſolved to return into England. He had ſtill ſome ſmall hopes, that his native Air would reſtore him to his Health. After reſigning to the King his Principality of Aquitain (4), which he could no longer govern, he departed, leaving the Command of the Army to the Duke of Lancaſter. Before his Departure, he had the Vexation to ſee Edward his eldeſt Son die (5), in the ſeventh Year of his Age. He was a Prince of great Hopes, and ſeemed much more like his Father and Grandfather, than his younger Brother Richard, who ſucceeded them. The Prince of Wales took his Son Richard with him, in order to have him educated in England.

Death of the King of Scotland. Robert Stuart ſucceeds. Buchanan. Act. Pub. VI. p. 696.

David King of Scotland died laſt Year (6), leaving his Crown to Robert Stuart his Nephew, Son of his eldeſt Siſter. Robert was no ſooner on the Throne, but he made an Alliance offenſive and defenſive with France againſt England. But this League was kept ſecret, Charles not having then occaſion for this Aid, which doubtleſs he reſerved for a more urgent Occaſion (7).

The Duke of Lancaſter and Earl of Cambridge marry the two Daughters of Peter the Cruel. Froiſſart. Walſing.

The Departure of the Prince of Wales entirely ruined the Affairs of the Engliſh in Guienne. The Duke of Lancaſter and Earl of Cambridge, perceiving that with ſo few Troops they could not hope to reduce the revolted Towns, or effectually withſtand the French, reſolved to return into England to ſollicite freſh Supplies. Before they departed, they married the two Daughters of Peter the Cruel, King of Caſtile, expelled and ſlain by Henry his Baſtard-Brother. The Duke of Lancaſter eſpouſing Conſtantia the eldeſt, immediately aſſumed the Title of King of Caſtile and Leon, thereby ſhewing, he deſigned to proſecute his Wife's Right (8). This Proceeding obliged Henry to unite more cloſely with France. As it was his Intereſt to help as much as poſſible to humble England, he reſolved to aſſiſt Charles with all his Forces.

Gueſclin gets the better of the Engliſh.

But this advantage could not balance thoſe gained by du Gueſclin upon England in Guienne, and the neighbouring Provinces. This brave General, whom Charles had drawn from the King of Caſtile's Service, to make him Conſtable of France, beat the Engliſh every where. After driving them out of Limoſin, Perigord, and Rovergne, he carried his Progreſs ſo far, that he found himſelf able to march into Saintonge, and at length to lay Siege to Rochelle, with the Aſſiſtance of a Fleet ſent by the King of Caſtile, to block up the Town by Sea. When Edward received this News, he ſpeedily ſent the Earl of Pembroke with forty Ships to throw Succours into the Town. This Precaution ſeemed ſufficient to ſave Rochelle; but for ſome time nothing had proſpered with the Engliſh. The Earl of Pembroke (9) being about to ſail into the Port, met the Spaniſh Fleet, commanded by Admiral Boccanegra a Genoeſe, who fiercely attacked him. The Fight laſted two days, and ended at length in the entire Defeat of the Engliſh Fleet (10), the Admiral and many Officers being taken and ſent bound into Spain. This Loſs compleated the Ruin of the Engliſh Affairs. Rochelle however might have ſtill held out, had it not been for the Treachery of the Mayor (11). This Magiſtrate, who held intelligence with the Beſiegers, found means to cauſe the Garriſon to be drawn out of the Citadel, under colour of a Muſter, and by means of a forged Order of the King, which the Governor (12) not being able to read, took for real. When the Garriſon was come out, the Mayor ſhut the Gates, and would not ſuffer them to reenter. Whereupon the Town capitulated, and obtained ſuch advantagious Terms (13), that ſhe rather became free than changed Sovereign.

The Loſs of Rochelle alarming Edward's Adherents in thoſe parts, du Gueſclin improved his advantages. He marched into Poictou, where he took ſeveral Towns, and at length formed the Siege of Thouars, where the principal Lords of the Country were retired. The Siege was ſo vigorouſly carried on, that the beſieged were at laſt forced to capitulate, and promiſe to return to the Obedience of France, if the King of England or one of his Sons did not come before Michaelmaſs, with an Army ſtrong enough to give Battle. Such Capitulations were very common in thoſe days, when good Faith was more eſteemed than at preſent. Accordingly, they are no longer practiſed. The Loſs of Thouars was of too great Conſequence to leave that Place un-relieved, eſpecially as the King's Honour was concerned. Edward's extreme deſire to ſave that Town, and with it the reſt of Poictou, cauſed him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours. In a very ſhort time he aſſembled a Fleet of four hundred Sail (14), with which he would have gone in Perſon to raiſe the Siege (15). But the Winds conſtantly refuſing to aſſiſt him on this occaſion, all his endeavours proved fruitleſs. He was ſix Weeks at Sea, without being able to reach Poictou. At laſt he was forced to return to England after great Fatigues and a vaſt expence, which almoſt drained his Treaſury. He was ſcarce come to London when he heard the French were maſters of all Poictou (16).

Edward's Affairs proſpered little better in Bretagne, though the Duke his Son-in-law did his utmoſt to promote them. The People were weary of War, and were troubled to ſee, that, ſolely for the Intereſt of the Engliſh, they were going to be plunged again into their late Calamities. On the other hand, the Lords of Bretagne, bribed by French Penſions, oppoſed with all their Power their Prince's Deſigns, and treated as Enemies, the Troops ſent thither by Edward to ſupport the War. In this ſituation, the Duke, whoſe Heart was entirely Engliſh, had it not in his Power to ſerve the King his Father-in-law as he wiſhed, or to perform his late Treaty. Thus embarraſſed, he reſolved to go himſelf into England, and ſollicit a Supply capable of procuring him greater Authority in his own Dominions. Edward was very ſenſible of the Importance of this Demand, but could not do every thing (1). He was obliged therefore to ſend back the Duke of Bretagne with fair Promiſes only, whilſt he turned all his thoughts to reſtore the Affairs of Guienne, which touched him more nearly (2).

From thence he advanced into upper Guienne, with Deſign to expel the Duke of Anjou, who had taken ſeveral Towns. He offered him Battle, which the French Prince accepted. The time and place were now appointed, but the two Generals receiving advice of a Truce concluded between the two Crowns, both retired (6).

But the Pretenſions of the two Monarchs being too oppoſite, for a Peace to be ſo eaſily made, their Negotiation ended only in a Prolongation of the Truce to April 1377. As ſoon as the Truce was ſigned, the Duke of Lancaſter led back his Troops into England (8).

1376. Truce prolonged. Ib. p. 89, 200.

Though the Conſequences of this laſt War were no leſs conſiderable than thoſe of the former, ſince France recovered in this, whatever ſhe loſt in the other, yet, the particulars are very far from being ſo entertaining. In the firſt, Edward's Conqueſts were rendered illuſtrious by a naval Engagement, where the King commanded in Perſon. The Battle of Creſſy, where all the Nobles of both Kingdoms fought in the preſence of the two Kings, and gained by a Prince of ſixteen Years old, is one of the moſt moving Scenes in Hiſtory. The Conqueſt of Calais, in the ſight of an Army of a hundred and fifty thouſand Men, is no leſs capable of affecting the Reader. The Victory of Poictiers, obtained by an Army of twelve thouſand againſt ſixty thouſand, and the taking of King John, are Events which command our Admiration, and quicken our Attention. In a word, the firſt War was ended by the moſt important and ſolemn Treaty, ever made between the two Crowns. In the ſecond, there was not one general Action. The two Kings, contenting themſelves with directing their Affairs in the Cabinet, never appeared at the head of their Armies. As for the Sieges, excepting thoſe of Limoges and Rochelle, there was ſcarce one worth mentioning. The Towns loſt by the Engliſh, were taken or ſurprized with a wonderful Rapidity. Some even ſurrendered before the Enemy's Approach. The Loſſes therefore of the Engliſh may be truly called a Defeat, which affords but few particulars proper to ſatisfy the Reader's Curioſity. For this reaſon, I have not inſiſted upon a Detail, which muſt have been tedious. It ſuffices to obſerve, that at the time of the laſt Treaty, England had loſt whatever was acquired by the Treaty of Bretigny, except Calais alone. So true is it, that Acquiſitions gained by force of Arms, ought not to be relied on, as has been, and is daily confirmed by numberleſs Inſtances. Sooner or later, a ſuperior Force finds means to wreſt them from the Conqueror, or his Children. Thus France loſt in the Reign of John, what was conquered upon the Engliſh by Philip Auguſtus and St. Lewis, and thus Edward III. loſt the Conqueſts made by himſelf in France. We ſhall ſee in the courſe of this Hiſtory, that one of Edward's Succeſſors amply retrieved all theſe Loſſes; and the French, in their turn, recovered, quickly after, whatever was taken by the ſame Prince. Such Examples, frequently occurring in Hiſtory, ought to teach Princes to moderate their Ambition; but few are ſo wiſe as to profit by theſe Examples. If we inquire into the natural Cauſes of this Revolution by which Edward loſt what he had acquired by the Treaty of Bretigny, they will appear to be very obvious. The Revolt of the Gaſcons, the Prince of Wales's Diſtemper, Edward's old Age, his too credulous Reliance on the King of France's Sincerity, the Prudence of Charles the Wiſe, who, without ſtirring from the Cabinet, managed the whole War, the Conduct and Bravery of Bertrand du Gueſclin, were the Inſtruments in the hand of Providence, to produce this Revolution.

Edward falls in Love with Alice Pierce. Walſing.

The Engliſh were in ſome meaſure comforted for all their Loſſes, by the Tranquillity enjoyed by the Truce. The King himſelf appeared to lay aſide his martial Inclinations, for others, which ſomewhat endangered his Reputation. In his old Age he fell in Love with one Alice Pierce (9). His Paſſion had ſuch an Aſcendant over him, that it made him guilty of Weakneſſes unbecoming ſo great a Prince. The Money raiſed for the War, was quickly conſumed by this greedy She-Favorite. From thence followed an univerſal Diſcontent throughout the Kingdom. Wholly employed with pleaſing his Miſtreſs, the King thought only of procuring her Diverſions. Entertainments were daily made with immenſe Expence. Taxes were the more grievous, as the Nation was entirely drained by continual Wars. They were extremely troubled, to ſee the Money deſigned for the Payment of the publick Debts, ſquandered away in Vanities. Above all, a Tournament held in Smithfield, gave great offence, where Alice Pierce, to whom her old Lover had given the Name of Lady of the Sun, appeared by his Side in a triumphant Chariot, and attended by many Ladies of Quality, each leading a Knight by his Horſe's Bridle. When the King's Coffers were empty, he called a Parliament (10) to demand a Subſidy. But he had the mortification to ſee that his People, who ſo powerfully aſſiſted him in his glorious Undertakings, had not the ſame Zeal, to provide for uſeleſs Expences. Before the Subſidy was granted, the Parliament bitterly complained of the ill-management of his Miniſters, particularly of the Duke of Lancaſter, whom the King his Father had chiefly intruſted with the Adminiſtration of Affairs. They even petitioned the King to remove from his Perſon the Duke of Lancaſter his Son, Alice Pierce (11), Latimer Lord Chamberlain, and others that were moſt in his favour. This Petition was made with ſuch warmth, that the King perceiving he could not reject it without danger, granted their requeſt, leaſt in their turn the Parliament ſhould refuſe him the Money he wanted. It was not queſtioned, but the Prince of Wales had privately induced the Parliament to take this Step, in order to re-

1376. move the Duke of Lancaſter, who was in too great Credit with the King. As the Prince found he muſt die, he could not reflect without uneaſineſs, that he was going to leave his young Son Richard to the Mercy of an ambitious Uncle, who might uſe his his Credit to take the Crown from him. And indeed, Richard, by reaſon of his Youth, was incapable of oppoſing the Duke's Deſigns, in caſe they ſhould tend, as it was ſuſpected, to the procuring himſelf to be declared the King's preſumptive Heir, after the Death of his elder Brother. This obliged the Prince of Wales to ſeek, for his Son, the Protection of the Parliament, as the only means to ſupport him in his juſt Rights. For the ſame reaſon, probably, the Parliament (1) petitioned the removal of the Duke of Lancaſter. During this Seſſion, Edward, now in the fiftieth Year of his Reign, cauſed a general Pardon to be publiſhed, which pleaſed the whole Nation exceedingly.

Death of the Prince of Wales. His Character. Walſing.

A Sorrow no leſs univerſal quickly followed this Joy. It was cauſed by the Death of the Prince of Wales, the moſt excellent Prince England had ever produced. He was poſſeſſed of all Virtues in an eminent degree. A good Soldier, and a great General, brave without Fierceneſs, bold in Battle, but very affable in Converſation, and of a Modeſty which could never be ſufficiently admired. Ever ſubmiſſive and reſpectful to the King his Father, whom he never once diſobliged. Generous, liberal, pleaſed with rewarding Merit wherever he found it, he wanted no Qualification requiſite to form a perfect Hero. The Engliſh commonly called him, The Black Prince, not for his warlike Exploits, as ſome have imagined, but becauſe he were Black Armour. The News of his Death was received with unconceivable Grief, though it was long expected. The Parliament was willing, on this occaſion, to expreſs their juſt Sorrow for the loſs of ſo great a Prince, who had gained the Affection and Eſteem of the whole Nation, by attending his Corps to Canterbury, where he choſe to be interred (2). This renowned Prince died in the forty ſixth Year of his Age, lamented by the King his Father, who ſhewed upon this occaſion leſs Firmneſs, than he had done in all his other Misfortunes (3). The King of France himſelf, though he had little reaſon to be ſorry, gave him Marks of his Eſteem, by ordering a ſolemn Service to be celebrated at Paris, at which he was pleaſed to be preſent in Perſon. Prince Edward left but one legitimate Son, about ten Years old, and two natural Sons, who made no great Figure in Hiſtory (4).

1377. The King recalls the Duke of Lancaſter and Alice Pierce. Walſing.

The Engliſh were the more ſenſible of their late loſs, as it was ſoon followed by a freſh occaſion of Sorrow. The King recalled to Court thoſe that were removed from his Perſon. Peter de la Mare, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons (5), who, in preſenting the above-mentioned Petition to the King, had ſpoken a little too freely againſt Alice Pierce, was, at her Sollicitation, confined in Nottingham-Caſtle. The Duke of Lancaſter reſumed his old Poſt, and all the other Miniſters were reſtored to their former Offices. However, though he gave the Duke of Lancaſter this expreſs Teſtimony of his Affection and Confidence, Edward would not give him occaſion to expect, he deſigned him for his Succeſſor. On the contrary, to prevent all Diſputes after his Death about the Succeſſion, he created Richard his Grandſon [Duke of Cornwal] and Earl of Cheſter, and preſently after, conferred on him the Title of Prince of Wales (6). But not content with diſcovering his Intention, he cauſed all the Nobility to take their Oath to him, as to the Heir Apparent of the Crown. Finally, for fear his Uncles might entertain hopes of aſcending the Throne to his Prejudice, he was pleaſed to put him as it were in poſſeſſion of the Rank he deſigned him for, by cauſing him to take place of them in all publick Solemnities. Thus did that wiſe Prince take meaſures to prevent the Diſſentions, which might ariſe after his death in his Family, concerning the Succeſſion; pleaſing himſelf withal in honouring the memory of a Son he had tenderly loved, and perfectly eſteemed, by doing Juſtice to young Richard (7).

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting at Court, John Wickliff, Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Oxford, began to publiſh his Belief upon ſeveral Articles of Religion, wherein he differed from the common Doctrine. Pope Gregory XI, being informed of it, condemned ſome of his Tenets, and commanded the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Biſhop of London, to oblige him to ſubſcribe the Condemnation, and in caſe of Refuſal, to ſummon him to Rome. It was not eaſy to execute this Commiſſion. Wickliff had now many Followers in the Kingdom, and for Protector, the Duke of Lancaſter, whoſe Authority was very little inferior to the King's. Nevertheleſs, to obey the Pope's Order, the Archbiſhop held a Synod at St. Paul's in London, and cited Wickliff to appear. Accordingly, he appeared, accompanied by the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Lord Percy, Marſhal of England, who believed their preſence neceſſary to protect him. After he had taken his Place, according to his Rank, and been interrogated by the Biſhop of London, he would have anſwered ſitting, and thereby gave occaſion for a great Diſpute. The Biſhop inſiſted upon his ſtanding, and being uncovered, and the Duke of Lancaſter pretended, Wickliff was there only as Doctor, to give his Vote and Opinion, and not as a Party accuſed. The Conteſt grew ſo high, that the Duke of Lancaſter proceeded to Threats, and gave the Biſhop very hard Words. Whereupon the People that were preſent, thinking the Biſhop in danger, took his part with ſuch heat and noiſe, that the Duke and Earl Marſhal thought fit to withdraw, and take Wickliff with them. Their withdrawing appeaſed not the Tumult. Some Incendiaries ſpread a Report, that at the inſtance of the Duke of Lancaſter, it was moved that day to the King in Council, to put down the Office of Lord Mayor, take away the City Privileges, and reduce London under the Juriſdiction of the Earl Marſhal. This was ſufficient to enrage the People. They ran immediately to the Marſhalſea, and freed all the Priſoners. But they did not ſtop there. The Mutineers, whoſe number continually increaſed, poſted to the Duke of Lancaſter's Palace in the Savoy, and miſſing his Perſon, plundered the Houſe, and dragged his Arms along the Streets. The Duke was ſo provoked at this Affront, that he could not be pacified but by the removal of the Mayor (8) and Aldermen, whom he accuſed of not uſing their Authority to reſtrain the Seditious.

Troubles on account of Wickliff. Walſing. Stow's Survey.

To return to Wickliff. The Biſhops being met a ſecond time, the Doctor declared before them his Sentiments concerning the Sacrament of the Euchariſt, explaining the Eating of the Body of Chriſt, much in the ſame manner as Berengarius had done before him. Though his opinion was contrary to the Doctrine of the Church in thoſe days, the Biſhops not daring to proceed rigorouſly againſt him, were contented with injoining him Silence. It is ſaid, he promiſed to obey, but however, the Diſpute was revived in the following Reign.

Wickliff explains his Notions of the Euchariſt.

Let us conclude this Reign with Edward's laſt publick Action, who, in an Aſſembly of the Knights-Companions of the Garter at Windſor, conferred that Order on Richard his Grandſon. This was the only Honour he could yet give him, after declaring him his Succeſſor. Shortly after, this great Prince, who was now indiſpoſed, fell ſo dangerouſly ill, that his Death was believed to approach. Before he left the World, he had the mortification to ſee the World leave him. Alice his Favourite

I do not pretend to give a compleat Genealogy of y.e Posterity of Edward III. down to K. James I. It would be an endless piece of work. For as in England the Women & their Descendants have a right of Succeeding to the Crown, when it comes to their turn, to make therefore a compleat and exact Genealogy, it would be necessary in it to comprehen all the Women descended from Edward III, with all their Posterity, both Males & Females, which would take in the Genealogys not only of the noblest Families of Europe, but also of most of the best Families of England. That would indeed be proper, but very difficult to be done. When Philip II K. of Spain was preparing to invade England, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, he had a Genealogy drawn, wherby it appeared that he was sprung from John of Gant Duke of Lancaster the 3.d Son of Edward III. by Philippa & Catherine two of this Dukes Daughters, one of which married John I King of Portugal, & the other Hen: III King of Castile. There are still several Families in England that are descended from Edward III by Lionel Duke of Clarence his 2.d Son, and Edmund Duke of York his 4.th Son. But it would be impossible to place em all in one Genealogical Table. I have therefore set down here no more than I thought necessary for the understanding this History.

When ſhe ſaw he was dying, ſhe ſeized every thing of value ſhe could find, even to the Rings on his Finger, and withdrew. His Courtiers and Chaplains ſhowed no leſs Ingratitude. They all deſerted him, without vouchſafing to warn him of the little time he had to live, and of the account he was ſhortly to give of his actions to God. There was only one ſingle Prieſt, who accidentally ſeeing him forſaken in his laſt Agonies, came near the Bed to comfort him. He addreſſed to him ſome Exhortations, to which the dying King endeavoured to reply; but his Words were not articulate enough to be underſtood. The only Word diſtinctly pronounced, was the name of Chriſt, juſt as he fetched his laſt breath. Thus died this illuſtrious Prince at Shene, (now Richmond,) in the ſixty-fifth year of his Age, and the fifty-firſt of his Reign (1).

Death of Edward.

His Character.

After relating the principal actions of Edward III, in the Hiſtory of his Reign, it will be neceſſary, in order to compleat the character of this famous Prince, to give ſome account of his Perſon, and accompliſhments of Body and Mind. He was very tall, but well-ſhaped, and of ſo noble and majeſtick an aſpect, that his very looks commanded reſpect and veneration. Affable and obliging to the good, but inexorable to the bad; there are few Princes to be met with in Hiſtory, in whom were ſo well mixed the Duties of a Sovereign with thoſe of an honeſt Man, and a good Chriſtian; though in this laſt reſpect, his conduct was not altogether blameleſs. His converſation was eaſy, and always accompanied with gravity and diſcretion. Friend of the Poor, the Fatherleſs, the Widow, and all who were unhappily fallen into misfortune, he made it his buſineſs to procure them ſome comfort in their affliction. Never had King before him beſtowed honours and rewards with more judgment, and greater regard to true merit. Though his valour was acknowledged and admired by all the World, it never made him proud. Never did he ſhow greater ſigns of humility, than in the courſe of his Victories, which he conſtantly aſcribed to the ſole protection of Heaven. He knew how to maintain the Prerogatives of the Crown, without incroaching on the Privileges of the People. In all the former Reigns, there had not been enacted ſo many advantagious Statutes to the Nation, as in this. Edward always agreeing with the auguſt Body of the Nation's Repreſentatives, made that harmony inſtrumental to curb the deſigns of the Court of Rome, which never dared to quarrel with him. The Glory of the Prince of Wales his Son, added a new Luſtre to his own; and his conſtant Union with his Queen increaſed his happineſs. As he was never too elate in proſperity, ſo in adverſity he was never too much dejected. His moderation appeared no leſs in his loſs of the Provinces, that had coſt him ſo much Toil and Treaſure, than in his Victories, which had gained him the Poſſeſſion. In a word, he might be reckoned an accompliſhed Prince, if his ambition had not cauſed him to break, in a diſhonourable manner, the Peace made with Scotland, in order to diſpoſſeſs a minor King, who beſides was his Brother-in-law. Some add likewiſe the rupture with France, and his pretenſions to the Crown of that Kingdom, which they term extravagant, and wholly aſcribe to an ambitious motive. The following Diſſertation will help the Reader to judge of this conduct. As to his weakneſs in falling in love in his old Age, with Alice Pierce, that blemiſh is much leſſened by the many noble qualities which rendered him ſo praiſe-worthy. One might in ſome meaſure excuſe him, by ſaying, he conſidered this paſſion, at firſt, as an amuſement only, to divert him in his troubles, and knowing little of Love in his youthful days, took not ſufficient care to keep himſelf from it in his old Age (2). 1377.

His Iſſue.

Philippa of Hainault, his Queen, brought him twelve Children, ſome of whom died before him. Edward Prince of Wales, his eldeſt Son, left but one Son, who aſcended the Throne after his Grandfather. William, his ſecond Son, died an Infant (3). Lionel, Duke of Clarence, who ended his days in Italy, left only a Daughter called Philippa, by his firſt Wife, an Iriſh Lady (4). John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, was twice married in his Father's lifetime, and had Children, of whom I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the following Reigns. Edward's fifth Son was Edmund, ſirnamed of Langley, the place of his birth. He was created Earl of Cambridge by the King his Father, and afterwards Duke of York, in the Reign of Richard II, his Nephew. William, ſirnamed of Windſor, died young (5). Thomas of Woodſtock, the ſeventh Son, was made Duke of Buckingham by Richard II, and afterwards Duke of Glocester.

Iſabella, eldeſt Daughter of Edward, was married to Ingelram de Coucy Earl of Soiſſons (6). Joanna was firſt contracted to the Duke of Auſtria, and afterwards to Pedro (7) the Cruel, King of Caſtile, before he was King; and died at Bourdeaux as ſhe was going to Spain to conſummate her Marriage. Blanch lived but few years (8). Mary was married to John de Montfort, Duke of Bretagne, and died in 1363. Margaret was Wife to John Haſtings, Earl of Pembroke (9).

(6) Who was by Edward III created Earl of Bedford, 1366. This Iſabella was buried in the Church of the Friers Minors without Aldgate, leaving Iſſue, Mary de Coucy, Wife of Robert de Barr, and Philippa de Coucy, Wife of Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, Marquiſs of Dublin, (a Title before unknown in England) and Earl of Oxford, who forſaking her, married one Lancerona, a Joyner's Daughter, (as is reported) who came with King Richard II's Wife out of Bohemia. He died at laſt in great want at Louvain, 1352; and his Corps was brought home, and interred at Earl's Colne in Eſſex.

(7) She was married by Proxy, and entitled Queen of Spain, but died of the Plague as ſoon as ſhe came into Spain; ſo that the King her Spouſe coming to meet her, to ſolemnize the Nuptials, accompanied her to Church, only at her Funeral, in 1348. She was born in the Tower, 1335. All our Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, ſhe was contracted to Alphonſo XI. King of Caſtile; but that it was to his Son Pedro, ſirnamed the Cruel, is undeniably manifeſt from Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 5. p. 475---478, 498-- 503, 601 --607, 612. &c.

(8) She was called de la Tour, becauſe born in the Tower of London. She was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey, 1340, and her Figure of Alabaſter lies as above-mentioned in Note (5).

(9) This John Haſtings being ſent to raiſe the Siege of Rochel, fell into the Hands of the Spaniards, and after two Years Captivity, was ſold to a Nobleman of France, with whom agreeing for his Ranſom, he was at his Departure poiſoned at a Banquet, 1375, without Iſſue by this Wife, being the firſt Subject who followed the Example of King Edward III, in quartering Arms, as may be ſeen in his Eſcutcheon, on the North-ſide of Edward III's Tomb; upon which he bears quarterly, Or, a Manch Gules, by the Name of Haſtings; and, Barry of twelve pieces Argent and Azure, an Orle of eight Martlets Gules, being Valence, impaling, France ſeme and England quarterly. Sandf. Genal. p. 180.

By a Charter-Mint to the Abbot of Reading, it ſeems that there was not any greater Piece coined, till after the twelfth Year of Edward III, than a Penny. For the Charter runs thus: "Rex dilecto ſibi Johanni de Flete cuſtodi Cambii noſtri Londini: Cum per Cartam noſtram conceſſerimus dilectis nobis in Chriſto------Abbati & Monachis de Radyng quod & ipſi & Succeſſores in perpetuum habeant unam Monetariam & unum Cuneum, &c. ------ Vobis Mandamus quod tres Cuneos de duro & competenti Metallo, unum, viz. pro Sterlingis, alium pro Obolis, & tertium pro Ferlingis, pro monetâ apud dictum Locum de Radyng facienda, de Impreſſione & Circumſcriptura quas dictus ----Abbas declarabit, &c.------ T. I. de Shardelve apud Weſtm. xvii. die Nov. Regni noſtri xii" But in the eighteenth of his Reign, we find the Standard of Gold Coins, was the old Standard or Sterling of twenty three Carats, three Grains and a half fine, and half a Grain allay. And for the Silver Coins, the old Sterling of eleven Ounces, Two-penny Weight fine, and eighteen Penny Weight allay. The ſame in 20th, 23d, 27th, 30th, 46th of his Reign. In the eighteenth Year, every Pound Weight of Gold of this Standard, was to be coined into fifty Florences, at ſix Shillings a-piece, which made in Tale fifteen Pounds, or into a proportionable Number of half and quarter Florences. This was by Indenture between the King, and Walter de Dunſtower, Maſter and Worker. Theſe Florences were ſo called from the Florentines, who (in the Year 1252) firſt minted ſuch Pieces; ſo that Florenus was generally uſed all over Europe, for the chief Gold Coin, as it is now for the beſt Silver. Fabian calls the Floren, a Penny; the Half-Floren, a Half-penny; and the Quarter, a Farthing, of Gold. This Iſabella was buried in the Church of the Friers Minors without Aldgate, leaving Iſſue, Mary de Coucy, Wife of Robert de Barr, and Philippa de Coucy, Wife of Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, Marquiſs of Dublin, (a Title before unknown in England) and Earl of Oxford, who forſaking her, married one Lancerona, a Joyner's Daughter, (as is reported) who came with King Richard II's Wife out of Bohemia. He died at laſt in great want at Louvain, 1352; and his Corps was brought home, and interred at Earl's Colne in Eſſex.

(7) She was married by Proxy, and entitled Queen of Spain, but died of the Plague as ſoon as ſhe came into Spain; ſo that the King her Spouſe coming to meet her, to ſolemnize the Nuptials, accompanied her to Church, only at her Funeral, in 1348. She was born in the Tower, 1335. All our Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, ſhe was contracted to Alphonſo XI. King of Caſtile; but that it was to his Son Pedro, firnamed the Cruel, is undeniably manifeſt from Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 5. p. 475---478, 498--503, 601--607, 612. &c.

(8) She was called de la Tour, becauſe born in the Tower of London. She was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey, 1340, and her Figure of Alabaſter lies as above-mentioned in Note (5).

(9) This John Haſtings being ſent to raiſe the Siege of Rochel, fell into the Hands of the Spaniards, and after two Years Captivity, was ſold to a Nobleman of France, with whom agreeing for his Ranſom, he was at his Departure poiſoned at a Banquet, 1375, without Iſſue by this Wife, being the firſt Subject who followed the Example of King Edward III, in quartering Arms, as may be ſeen in his Eſcutcheon, on the North-ſide of Edward III's Tomb; upon which he bears quarterly, Or, a Manch Gules, by the Name of Haſtings; and, Barry of twelve pieces Argent and Azure, an Orle of eight Martlets Gules, being Valence, impaling, France ſeme and England quarterly. *Sandf. By a Charter-Mint to the Abbot of Reading, it ſeems that there was not any greater Piece coined, till after the twelfth Year of Edward III, than a Penny. For the Charter runs thus: "Rex dilecto ſibi Johanni de Flete cuſtodi Cambii noſtri Londini: Cum per Cartam noſtram con-" ceſſerimus dilectis nobis in Chriſto-------Abbati & Monachis de Radyng quod & ipſi & Succeſſores in perpetuum habeant unum Monetarium & " unum Cuneum, &c. ------ Vobis Mandamus quod tres Cuneos de duro & competenti Metallo, unum, viz. pro Sterlingis, alium pro Obolis, & ter-" tium pro Ferlingis, pro monetâ apud dictum Locum de Radyng facienda, de Impreſſione & Circumſcripturâ quas dictus ------Abbas declarabit, &c.------" T. But in the eighteenth of his Reign, we find the Standard of Gold Coins, was the old Standard or Sterling of twenty three Carats, three Grains and a half fine, and half a Grain allay. And for the Silver Coins, the old Sterling of eleven Ounces, Two-penny Weight fine, and eighteen Penny Weight allay. The ſame in 20th, 23d, 27th, 30th, 46th of his Reign. In the eighteenth Year, every Pound Weight of Gold of this Standard, was to be coined into fifty Florences, at ſix Shillings a-piece, which made in Tale fifteen Pounds, or into a proportionable Number of half and quarter Florences. This was by Indenture between the King, and Walter de Dunſtower, Maſter and Worker. Theſe Florences were ſo called from the Florentines, who (in the Year 1252) firſt minted ſuch Pieces; ſo that Florenus was generally uſed all over Europe, for the chief Gold Coin, as it is now for the beſt Silver. Fabian calls the Floren, a Penny; the Half-Floren, a Halt-penny; and the Quarter, a Farthing, of Gold. And theſe Words are often met with in old Hiſtories and Accompts, applied to ſe-

A DISSERTATION on the SALIC LAW, And the DISPUTE between PHILIP of Valois and EDWARD III.

BY the Salic Law is generally meant at preſent, a fundamental Law of the Monarchy of France, which excludes the Females and their Deſcendants from the Succeſſion to the Crown. This is the Idea commonly annexed to the Term Salic Law. In this ſenſe alſo it is that Bodin ſays, this Law was the foundation of the Monarchy; Marca, that it was a Privilege and Cuſtom peculiar to the French; Thuanus, that it was the Palladium of France. I might cite numberleſs other French Authors, who ſpeaking of the Salic Law, conſider it only as a Law relating particularly to the Succeſſion of the Crown of France. This Idea is the reaſon that moſt People, verily believing it was never thought otherwiſe ſince the Eſtabliſhment of the Monarchy, cannot underſtand how Edward III, Son of a Princeſs of France, could, with the leaſt colour, diſpute the Crown of France with Philip de Valois, deſcended from Father to Son, from Hugh Capet. But they who reaſon thus, are not aware, they take for granted a thing not conteſted indeed at preſent, but which at the time of this famous diſpute, was the only point in queſtion between the two Kings. Since that point was decided, the preſent notion of the Salic Law is juſt and certain, but I will venture to ſay it was then doubtful, and this is what I hope to demonſtrate very clearly.

Bod. de la Rep. l. 1. 8. Marc. de Jur. p. 1. c. 28, N. 31. De Thou. l. 110.

By the Salic Law, Edward, the next Male Heir of Charles the Fair, was deprived of the Succeſſion, and the Regency; or to ſpeak more properly, the Crown was adjudged to a more diſtant relation. It will therefore be neceſſary, for the better underſtanding this proceſs, to know what is meant by the Salic Law, which is in every one's mouth, which ſo few have any knowledge of, and concerning which the French themſelves are not agreed, though they reckon it a fundamental Law of their Monarchy.

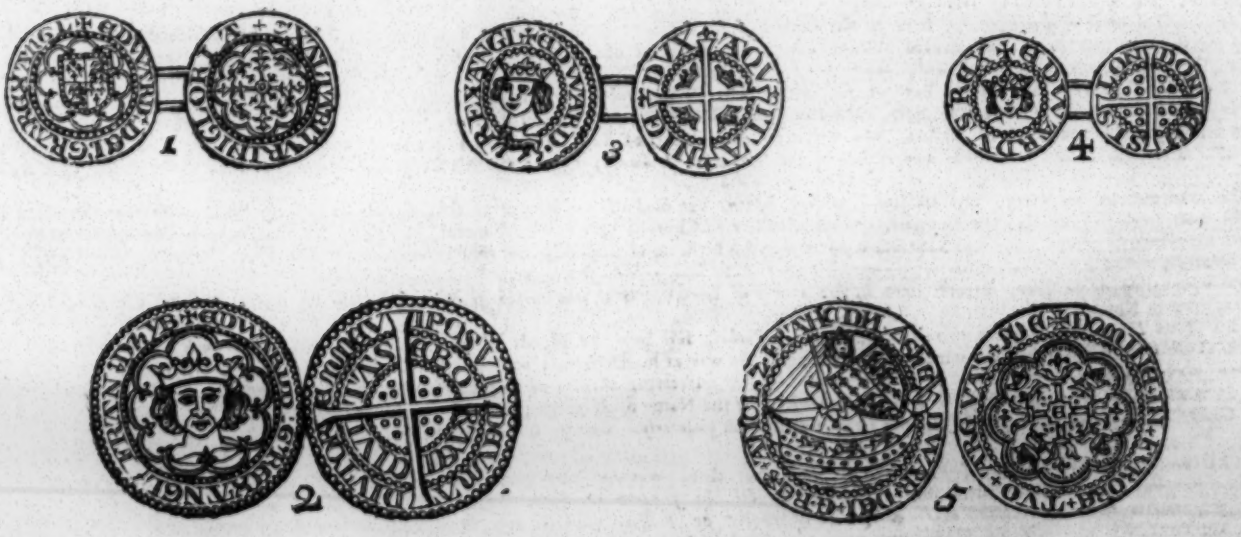
Some, as the famous Jerom Bignon, ſay we are not to look for the Salic Law among Records, ſince it is a Law of Nature, and if there are any Nations where it does not take place, they are examples more worthy of veral Coins, as Reals, Angels, &c. where is to be underſtood by Denarius, the Whole; by Obolus the Half; and by Quadrans the fourth Part or Farthing. In the ſame eighteenth Year, a Pound Weight of Gold of old Standard, was to contain thirty nine Nobles and a half, at ſix Shillings and Eight-pence a piece, amounting in the whole to thirteen Pounds, three Shillings and Four-pence in Tale, or a proportionable Number of half and quarter Nobles. Which was by Indenture between the King and Percival de Perche. By this Indenture the Trial of the Pix was eſtabliſhed. Theſe were indiſputably the firſt Gold Coins, and are ſo beautiful and rare, that they merit the Eſteem of Medals, being inſcribed, EDWARD. DEI. GRA. REX. ANGL. The Florens did not much differ from the Roſe-Nobles in weight, and whether they differed at all in the Impreſſion is uncertain.----In 20 Edw. 3. a Pound Weight of Gold of the old Standard, was to make by Tale forty two Nobles, at ſix Shillings and Eight-pence a-piece, amounting to fourteen Pounds; and a Pound of Silver of the old Sterling, was to make twenty two Shillings and Six-pence; and Percival de Perche was Maſter.----27 Edw. 3. His Penny, and Half-penny, (called ſometimes Mailes) and Farthings, were like thoſe of his Predeceſſors, but diſtinguiſhed by the Name EDWARDVS. (Fig 4.) Thoſe of Ireland in a Triangle. It is remarkable, what Biſhop Tonſtal obſerved of the Gold of this Reign, that it came neareſt to that of the antient Romans, or, that four Roſe-Nobles weighed an Ounce, and were equivalent to the Roman Aurei both in weight and fineneſs; and ſix Noble-Angels made an Ounce, which were anſwerable in all Points to the old Roman Solidus Aureus. Likewiſe in Silver Coins, that an old Sterling Groat was equivalent to the Roman Denarius, the Half-Groat to the Quinarius, and the old Sterling Penny to the Seſtertius Nummus; Seſtertium (in the Neuter Gender) a thouſand Seſtertii, to five Pounds Sterling, when three Shillings and Four-pence went to the Ounce; but now to ſeven Pounds ten Shillings, according to Sir Thomas Smith's Account, when five Shillings goes to the Ounce.



of wonder than imitation (1). Some pretend, that Pharamond the firſt King of the Francs decreed by an expreſs Law, that the Females ſhould not ſucceed to the Crown, which has ever ſince been inviolate. Others attribute this Law to Clovis. Mezerai pretends the Succeſſion of the Males to the Crown of France was not eſtabliſhed by a written Law, but by an inviolable cuſtom. This confuſion of Ideas, which makes the Salic Law to be conſidered, one while as a Law of Nature, another while as a poſitive and expreſs Law, and ſometimes as a mere cuſtom, renders this matter obſcure; which I ſhall endeavour to clear, in order to give the Reader a true notion of the famous conteſt between the two Kings.

Before the Francs ſettled in that part of Gaul they have ſo long poſſeſſed, they were diſperſed by Troops, in Germany and the Low-Countries, from whence they received ſeveral names, according to the different Parts they inhabited. Some were called Salians, from the River Sala, which ran through the Country (2). Others were diſtinguiſhed by the names of Chamavi, Catti, Attuarians, Ripuarians, or Ribarols. Each of theſe Colonies had Laws, common, no doubt, to all the Francs, and probably particular ones too. The Laws of the Salians and Ripuarians are ſtill extant. Among the Salian Laws we find this:

This Law, as it is eaſy to obſerve, concerns private Inheritances, and the Title de Alodio, under which it is placed, puts it out of diſpute. Accordingly, this is the opinion of numberleſs Authors, as well French as others, whoſe names it would be needleſs to repeat. Mezerai was doubtleſs of the ſame opinion, ſince he ſaid, the Succeſſion of the Males to the Crown was not eſtabliſhed by any written Law. All that can be alledged with any plauſibleneſs, by thoſe who ground the Excluſion of the Females upon the above-mentioned Paragraph of the Salian Law, is, that the Succeſſion to the Crown is included in the Law, which ſettled the Succeſſion to the Inheritances of the noble Families. This opinion is alſo embraced by Father Daniel in his Hiſtory of France. He pretends, that the rule concerning the Succeſſion to the Crown, is contained in that particular Article of the Salian or Salic Law, which includes all the Laws of the Salian Francs. What this able Hiſtorian ſays, in the Reign of Clovis, being of great ſervice to clear up this point, I ſhall tranſcribe part of it here, in order to ſave the Reader the trouble of conſulting him.

T. I. p. 7. &c. Edit. d' Amſt. 1720.

" It was then, probably, that Clovis publiſhed the famous Salic Law. I am ſenſible moſt of our Hiſtorians aſcribe the honour of it to Pharamond; but I follow here the opinion of one of our beſt Criticks. [Hadr. de Valois.]

" Many ſpeak and hear of this Law without knowing what it is. It is a common notion, that it concerns ſolely or chiefly the Succeſſion of the Males to the Crown of France, by determining the qualifications of thoſe who may put in their Claim. This notion is wrong in ſeveral reſpects. Of the ſeventy two Articles, this Law conſiſts of (3), there are but three or four Lines of the ſixty ſecond relating to this point. Beſides, they do not particularly concern the Succeſſion of the Males to the Crown; but belong in general to all the noble Families, whoſe Rights they regulate, as well as thoſe of the Royal Family. The words run thus: As for the SALIC LAND, no part ſhall deſcend to the FEMALE, but all ſhall go to the MALE.

" By Salic Land is meant the Lands of the Nobles of the Nation, and moreover, according to ſome, the Lands of Conqueſt, ſuch were almoſt all thoſe of the French Monarchy on this ſide the Rhine. What has chiefly occaſioned this popular notion, was the great Diſpute formerly between Philip de Valois and Edward III, King of England -------- Beſides this famous Conteſt, the little uſe made of this Law at preſent, which is ſeldom cited by our Lawyers upon other accounts, was the reaſon of this common perſuaſion of its being thus limited. But in reality, it contained numberleſs regulations concerning all ſorts of matters.

" I am apt to believe, what we now have of the Salic Law, is only an Abſtract of a larger Code, abridged on purpoſe, that the People and Judges might more eaſily learn the ſubſtance and principal points. What makes me believe this, is, that in the preſent Book of the Salic Law, the Salic Law it ſelf, is quoted with certain Forms not to be found in that Book. ------- And this moreover leaves no room to queſtion that it was at firſt compoſed in the Language of the Francs, and afterwards the Abſtract tranſlated into Latin for the uſe of the Gauls, to whom it was to be common in ſeveral Articles, with the Francs. This is the Abſtract or Abridgment that has been tranſmitted to us."

Thus we have three different opinions, given by three learned Criticks concerning the Salic Law, the Law I mean which renders Women incapable of ſucceeding to the Crown. Bignon ſays, it is a Law of Nature which ought to be common to all Nations. According to Father Daniel, by the Salic Law we are to underſtand, an Abridgment of the Salian Laws publiſhed by Clovis. As for the particular Law ſettling the Succeſſion to the Crown of France, he pretends it is a mere Chimera, a vulgar Error, and adds, without alledging however any proof, that the Excluſion of the Females with reſpect to the Crown, derives its whole force from that particular paſſage of the Salic Code (4), which ſettles the Inheritance of the noble Families, and conſequently, in his opinion, the Inheritance of the Family Royal, that is, of the Crown. According to Mezerai, by the Salic Law, or the Law that ſettles the Succeſſion, is meant, not a written Law, but an inviolable Cuſtom, which is inſtead of a Law. To give a diſtinct notion of this matter, I ſhall examine theſe three Opinions, and ſhow the objections they are liable to.

Firſt, as to the opinion that ſuppoſes the Salic Law, or, which is the ſame thing, the Excluſion of the Females and their Deſcendants from the Succeſſion to the Crown, to be a Law of Nature: I own, it might with ſome reaſon be maintained, that Nature requires States and Kingdoms to be governed by Men, if the Salic extended no further; but ſince it reaches to the Excluſion of the Male-Heirs of the Women of the Royal Family, methinks Nature does not appear in that Extenſion. In the next place, if the Salic Law was a Law of Nature, it would be practiſed in all States, or at leaſt the exceptions, if any, would be but few. But here we find juſt the contrary. Of all the independent Kingdoms of Europe, eſtabliſhed by the northern Nations, France alone follows this pretended Law of Nature. All the other States, Spain, Portugal, Naples, Sicily, Bohemia, Hungary, Swedeland, Denmark, England, Scotland, admit of the Femal Succeſſion. Only France then muſt be ſaid to follow Nature, and all the reſt of the States to deviate from her Law, which to me ſeems abſurd. Wherefore in the third place, the Salic Law has all along been deemed, as it is at preſent, a Law peculiar to France; and we do not find that Philip le Long, or Philip de Valois ever pretended to urge it, upon any other foot.

As for Father Daniel's opinion, whatever eſteem I may have for his Hiſtory, which I take to be the beſt of all the French Hiſtories, I cannot forbear ſaying, it is not only groundleſs, but improbable. It is eaſy to demonſtrate, that the Paragraph of the Salic Code, on which he grounds the Excluſion of the Females and their Deſcendents, has no manner of relation to the Succeſſion of the Crown, as will appear, if the whole Title under which it is placed, be but conſidered. It is the 62d, entitled, de Alodio, which ſettles the Inheritance of the Alodial Lands. But firſt, it muſt be obſerved, that Alodial Lands, were Lands of Inheritance, not held of any other Lord. This diſtinguiſhes them from thoſe termed Beneficia, which were diſtributed among the Nobles, on condition of perſonally ſerving the State upon certain occaſions, which Women were incapable of. Theſe were the Lands called Terra Salica, becauſe they were conſidered, as belonging properly to the collective Body of the Nation, and were held by private Perſons, on the ſole condition of ſerving the State. This being ſuppoſed, the whole Title of the Salic Law, where the Paragraph is inſerted, runs thus:

Du Cange Alodis.

TIT. 62. DE ALODE.

" 1. Si quis homo mortuus fuerit, & filios non dimiſerit, Edit of Pithou.

(1) One may juſtly ſay, there is no Beginning or End of the Salic Law, for it is a Law of Nature born with Men, and not written, as Ariſtotle obſerves, The Law of Nature and Nations is not written. Bignon, l. 3. Rapin.

(2) There are a dozen different Opinions about the Etymology of the Word Salic. That from the Salians, whoſe Name is taken from the River Sala, ſeems to me the moſt probable. See Limnæus de Jure Imp. Roman. Germ. l. 1. c. 2. Rapin.

(3) Some Editions have more, ſome leſs. Rapin.

(4) Rapin, in expreſſing here Father Daniel's Opinion, ſeems to make uſe of too ſtrong Terms; for it is plain, from that Author's own Words, that he makes the Salic Law receive part of its Force from antient Cuſtom, which he even calls inviolable.

" ſi Pater

" ſi Pater aut Mater ſuperfuerint, ipſi in Hæreditatem ſuc-

" dant.
" 6. De Terra autem Salica, nulla Portio Hæreditatis
" mulieri veniat, ſed ad virilem Sexum tota Terræ Hæ-
" reditas perveniat".

Hence it appears, I. That the Salic Lands were Alodial like the other, that is, were the real Patrimony of the Poſſeſſor, otherwiſe they would not have been placed here. II. That the deſign of the ſixth Paragraph was to diſtinguiſh the Salic, from the common Alodial Lands, that the former were liable to military Service, which Women could not perform. But by reaſon, the ſenſe of the ſixth Paragraph muſt, I think, be ſtrangely wreſted, to extend it to the Succeſſion of the Crown, the moſt that can be pretended, is, that the King's own Demeſns were ſubject to this Law.

But, more fully to ſhow, this Article concerns not the ſucceſſion to the Crown, it muſt be remarked, there are two original Editions of the Salic Law, one procured by Herold, the other by Fr. Pithou, and in the latter, this ſixth Article of Title 62, is imperfect, there being no more than what is inſerted above. But in the other Edition, the Paragraph runs in this manner:

De Terra vero Salicâ in mulierem nulla portio Hæreditatis tranſit, ſed hoc virilis Sexus acquirit, hoc eſt, Filij in Hæreditate ſuccedunt. Sed ubi inter Nepotes & Pronepotes, poſt longum Tempus, de Alode Terra contentio ſuſcitatnr, tunc non per ſtirpes, ſed per capita dividantur.

I do not ſee, conſidering the whole Paragraph, how it can with the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon, be applied to the Succeſſion of the Crown.

To this may be added, that very probably, when the Salic Law was made, the Francs had not yet a King. We not only ſee no ſign of any ſuch thing in the ſeveral Articles of this Law, but moreover find in the Preambles, what makes it believed the Francs were not ſubject to a Sovereign Power.

This is the beginning of the Salic Law, according to Herold's Edition.

What likelihood is there, that, if the Authors of theſe Prefaces were of opinion, the Francs had a King when the Salic Law was made, they ſhould not have mentioned him? For as to the Abſtract of the Chronicle, it is a ſeparate piece, added by the Author of the laſt Preface, as treating of the ſame ſubject. But if the Francs had not a King, how can the ſixth Paragraph of the ſixty ſecond Title be applicable to the ſucceſſion of the Crown of France.

Another objection to Father Daniel's opinion is this: Suppoſing the Article, De Terra vero Salica, concerned the Succeſſion to the Crown, as well as private Inheritances; if it be true, that this Law was abrogated under the third Race of the Kings of France, with reſpect to the Salic Lands or great Fiefs, it may, I think, be inferred, that it was alſo annulled with regard to the Crown. But the thing ſpeaks of it ſelf, ſince it cannot be denied, that the Dukedoms, Earldoms, in a word, all the great Fiefs of the Crown, deſcended to the Females. Normandy, Guienne, Ponthieu, and Montrevil, fell to the Kings of England by the Women. It was the ſame with the Earldom of Toulouſe, Provence, and Bretagne. The Succeſſion of the Earldom of Flanders always devolved to the next Heir, without any preference of Sex, ſince the time of Charles the Bald. All theſe examples actually ſubſiſted at the time of Lewis Hutin's death, when the Salic Law began for the firſt time to be urged in favour of the Males. There were large portions of the Salic Lands fallen to Women, purely by Right of Inheritance. Where was then the obſervance of the Article, De Terra vero Salica nulla Portio ad mulierem tranſit? History of the Earls of Flanders at the Hague. 1698.

There ſeems to me to be but two ways of anſwering this objection. Firſt, by ſaying the Salic Lands, or great Fiefs of the Crown, deſcended to the Women, only when there was no Male-Heir in the Family. But this Reply has no foundation. Beſides what has been ſaid concerning the Earldom of Flanders, in the very time of Philip de Valois, Artois was adjudged to Maud, to the prejudice of Robert d'Artois, Grandſon by his Father of the laſt Duke; and the Duchy of Bretagne, to the Wife of Charles de Blois, though Earl Montfort, Brother of the late Duke, was alive. But, ſuppoſing this Law was not annulled when Hugh Capet came to the Crown, it was at leaſt abrogated by that Prince, in granting in Fee to the Nobility the great Fiefs, without excluding the Females.

The other way of anſwering the objection, is by aſſerting, that though the Law was repealed as to the Salic Lands, it was not ſo with regard to the Succeſſion of the Crown, where it was always inviolable. But how can a Law be ſuppoſed to be abrogated in the undoubted ſenſe of the words, and remain in force in a diſputable ſenſe, which is taken for granted without the leaſt proof? Beſides, I ſhall make appear hereafter, there had never been any occaſion to break it.

A third objection againſt Father Daniel's opinion, may be taken from his own Preface to the Hiſtory of France. This able Hiſtorian maintains, Article III, that the Crown, after being hereditary in the firſt Race, became elective in the ſecond, and was hereditary in the third, only by way of Aſſociation practiſed by the firſt Kings of that Race, from Hugh Capet to Philip Auguſtus. If ſo, where ſhall we find the obſervance of the Salick Law, with reſpect to the Crown, from Pepin the Short to Lewis VIII? How could it ſubſiſt in an elective Kingdom, where it was in the power of the great Men to give the Crown to whom they pleaſed, and even to chuſe Kings not of the Royal Family, as for inſtance, Ralph and Eudes? Hear what Father Daniel ſays of this matter.

The laſt Page of the Preface.

It is extremely probable, that Hugh Capet having confirmed the Dukes, Earls, and other Lords in their Uſurpations, not only for themſelves, but their Poſterity, obtained likewiſe from them the Eſtabliſhment of the Hereditary Succeſſion to the Crown in his Family. But, as he miſtruſted their Levity, he aſſociated his Son Robert. Robert did the ſame by his Son Henry; and the Cuſtom of Aſſociating laſted till Philip Auguſtus, who thinking Hereditary Right ſufficiently eſtabliſhed by the Succeſſion of ſeveral of his Predeceſſors, from Father to Son, down to Hugh Capet, and whoſe Reigns for the moſt part were very long, never troubled himſelf to aſſociate Lewis VIII, his Son.

I ſhall now examine Mezerai's opinion, and theirs, who with him, believe the Salic Law, that is, the excluſion of the Females and their Deſcendants, to be founded only upon an inviolable Cuſtom. But it will be neceſſary, in the firſt place, to remove all ambiguity in the term Cuſtom; for by that may be meant, either a negative, if I may be allowed that expreſſion, or a poſitive, Cuſtom. I call a negative Cuſtom, that to which no inſtance to the contrary can be alledged, and which however, does not form or eſtabliſh any right. For example, there never was in England, a lame or a one-handed King. Now let it be affirmed, as ſtrongly as you pleaſe, that this is a Cuſtom that was never violated, if unfortunately, the only Son of a King of England ſhould become lame, or happen to loſe a hand, would this be a good reaſon to exclude him from his Father's Succeſſion? It is the ſame with the inviolable Cuſtom of France, taken in this ſenſe. Becauſe there never was in France, a Queen that wore the Crown by her own Authority and Right, it does not neceſſarily follow, that the Females have no right to the Succeſſion; as it cannot be ſaid in England, that a lame or a one-handed Man cannot mount the Throne, becauſe in that Country there never was a lame or a one-handed King. I call a poſitive Cuſtom, that which is grounded upon ſome Law, or at leaſt upon examples and precedents, which demonſtrate it to have been inviolably practiſed, and to have ſerved for Rule on certain occaſions. Of ſuch a Cuſtom Mezerai muſt be underſtood to ſpeak, ſince he confounds it with the Salic Law, and endeavours to produce an Inſtance of its being obſerved. The queſtion then is to know, whether there was in France, any ſuch poſitive Cuſtom before the Reign of Philip le Long; who in ſupport of his Right, pleaded the Salic Law, whether he thereby meant the Paragraph of the Salic Code abovementioned, or an inviolable Cuſtom. But where are the Authors that ſpeak of it? Is it not ſtrange that, for nine hundred years, from Pharamond to Philip le Long, this inviolable Cuſtom, which ſerves for fundamental Law to a great Kingdom, ſhould not be mentioned by a ſingle Author? I believe I may give this for certain Fact, though I have not read all, becauſe it appears to me impoſſible that of ſo many learned Men, who, from the time of Philip le Long to this day, have diligently ſought after proofs in defence of the Salic Law; not one ſhould have been ſo happy as to diſcover, in the antient Authors, any Paſſages favouring, or, at leaſt, alluding to, this written or unwritten Law. Of all the Teſtimonies alledged, there is not one but what is later than the Reign of Philip le Long (1). I am well aware, this objection has already been anſwered, by affirming that Marculphus, who lived in the middle of the VIIth Century, mentions the Salic Law in his Formularies. But this is a Fallacy. No body ever pretended to diſpute the exiſtence of the Salic Law, if thereby is meant the Salian or Salic Code in general. But the buſineſs is to prove the exiſtence of this particular Law, called the Salic Law, whereby Women and their Deſcendants (2) were deprived of the right of ſucceeding to the Crown, before the Reign of Philip le Long. Marculphus mentions the former in ſeveral places of his Formularies, but ſays not a Word of the latter, which is the point in queſtion. It remains therefore, that this unwritten Law, this inviolable Cuſtom, is to be founded upon examples and precedents, by which it was eſtabliſhed, or at leaſt confirmed, otherwiſe there is no knowing what to think of it. It ſhould therefore be ſhown, that before the Reign of Philip le Long, there were inſtances of Women and their Deſcendants being excluded from the Crown, by virtue of the Salic Law, or inviolable Cuſtom: And this is what remains to be examined.

To begin with the third Race, from Hugh Capet to Philip le Long, no ſuch caſe could happen, for the Kings of that Family ſucceeded from Father to Son.

In the ſecond Race, it is not poſſible to find any inſtance in favour of the Salic Law, or inviolable Cuſtom. On the contrary, a precedent might be brought in favour of the Females from divers Princes, deſcended from Charlemain by the Female Line, dividing the French Monarchy, and poſſeſſing ſeveral parts of Charlemain's Succeſſion. But as this was at a time when there were only two Princes alive of that Emperor's Family; namely, the Emperor Arnold, who was a natural Son, and Charles the Simple, who might alſo be deemed as ſuch, I ſhall not inſiſt upon it.

The firſt Race affords three precedents, which may favour the Cuſtom in queſtion. The Daughters of Childebert I, King of Paris, ſucceeded not their Father, but Clotaire I, their Uncle poſſeſſed his Brother's Kingdom. Shortly after, Cherebert King of Paris dying without Male-Iſſue, Gontran, Sigebert, and Chilperic his Brothers, ſhared the Succeſſion, without leaving any part to his Daughters. Gontran having but one Daughter, left his Kingdom to Childebert II, his Nephew. If it could be ſhown, that all this was done in conſequence of the Salic Law, or inviolable Cuſtom, theſe precedents would amount to the ſtrongeſt proofs. But unhappily, not a ſingle Writer before Philip le Long, ſpeaks on this occaſion of the Salic Law or Cuſtom. It is true, Mezerai, who wrote twelve hundred years after, boldly affirms, that Clotaire ſucceeded his Brother by virtue of the Salic Law, and that this is the firſt inſtance of the obſervance thereof. But in relating the Fact, he ſays Clotaire impriſoned his Nieces (3), for fear they ſhould diſpute with him their Father's Succeſſion. The ſame thing happened in the Succeſſion of Cherebert. His Brothers uſed force to ſeize his Kingdom, without alledging the Salic Law to ſupport their Right (4). Accordingly Preſident Fauchet, convinced of the violence practiſed on theſe two occaſions, gives up theſe two Precedents (5), and confines himſelf to the third, which is the moſt ſpecious. Gontran having but one Daughter, adopted Childebert II, his Nephew, and left him his Kingdom. But this Daughter was a

(1) Rapin muſt have overlooked a Paſſage in Father Daniel's Hiſtory, quoted from Agathias, expreſsly mentioning this Law. The Paſſage is likewiſe alledged by Fauchet and Du Cheſne. Agathias, the Scholaſtick or Lawyer, lived in the ſixth Century, and began to write the Continuation of Juſtinian's Hiſtory after Procopius, in 565. This Author, at the end of Chap. vii. Lib. ii. ſays, "Whilſt theſe Things paſſed, Theobald, who ruled in France "over the Provinces next to Italy, died in the Flower of his Youth——— Childebert and Clotaire, as his neareſt Relations, were by the Law of the "Country called to the Succeſſion of his Kingdom." By the Law of the Country then, Theobald's two Siſters were excluded from the Right of ſucceeding him. As for Childebert's Daughters, Agathias continues thus: "But the Diſputes about the Diviſion had like to ruin their Dominions, Childebert, "beſides his extreme old Age, languiſhed with an incurable Diſeaſe. He had only Daughters, and no Male Iſſue who might inherit the Crown." Theſe laſt Words ſeem to be a demonſtrative Proof, that it was then univerſally known, that the Daughters of France were abſolutely excluded from the Right of Succeſſion to the Crown. Agathias did not ſay this to favour Clotaire, who ſucceeded his Brother Childebert in excluſion of his Nieces, for he was born in Aſia, and lived very remote from France. He was cotemporary with theſe Kings.

(2) There was no occaſion to ſay their Deſcendants. For there are two different Queſtions; the firſt, which is properly the Point in hand, Whether the Daughters were antiently excluded from the Crown? The ſecond, which has nothing to do here, Whether the Sons of thoſe Daughters were of old excluded from the Crown with their Mothers? The former ſeems to be expreſsly mentioned by Agathias: ſee the foregoing Note.

(3) Gregory de Tours, a Cotemporary, ſays only, he baniſhed them, with their Mother. And Father Daniel makes them not to be baniſhed till ſome time after his Father's Death, when Chramne, Son of Clotaire, rebelled againſt him a ſecond time. Mezerai's Words are, "Their Uncle, "whether in hatred of their Father, or for fear of their pretending to the Succeſſion, kept them in Priſon till he was poſſeſſed of the Kingdom." This alternative of Doubt is only a Conjecture of Mezerai. For Clotaire ſeems to have acted rather out of hatred to his Brother, than from political Views.

(4) This does not ſeem to agree with what Rapin ſays in the Hiſtory of the Church of Kent, p. 65, where he repreſents Chilperic, who ſucceeded his Brother Cherebert, as behaving like a Father to his Brother's Daughters, and refuſing to marry Bertha, one of them, to Ethelbert King of Kent, becauſe he was an Idolater. Now Chilperic, had he thought ſhe had the leaſt Reaſon to claim her Father's Succeſſion, ſhould have been glad of ſo fair an Opportunity to ſend away his Niece. Indeed, it does not appear that he uſed any Violence upon them, or impriſoned them, as Rapin inſinuates.

(5) Rapin does not quote Fauchet, ſo it is to be ſuppoſed he alludes to what this Author ſays in his Treatiſe, de l'Origine des Dignitez, &c. l. 1. c. 2 where he gives the Reaſons why the Daughters of France are excluded. "I forbear, ſays he, to ſpeak of the Daughters of Childebert I, King of "Paris, for it may be ſaid, their Uncle Clotaire was ſo ſtrong, that it was eaſy for him to ſhut them up in a Cloiſter. Much leſs ſhall I ſpeak of "thoſe of Cherebert, alſo King of Paris, becauſe it will be ſaid, their Uncles did not treat them more civilly. But what can be objected to what "Gontran did to Clotilda his own Daughter, &c.?" In this Paſſage, Fauchet does not ſeem abſolutely to give up the two firſt Precedents, but only thinks them liable to the Objections he mentions. For he urges them both as Enemies of the Excluſion of the Daughters, in Chap. 12. l. 3. des Antiquitez, &c.

Nun (1). Beſides, from Gontran's believing it in his power to leave his Succeſſion entire to Childebert II, without giving any ſhare to Clotaire II, who was alſo his Nephew, and Childebert's Brother (2), it may, it ſeems be inferred, that he did not look upon himſelf as bound by any Law, and that there was not then any ſettled rule with reſpect to the Succeſſion (3). It will be ſaid perhaps, that in appointing Childebert, the eldeſt of the two Brothers, for his Succeſſor, he only followed the diſpoſition of the Law or Cuſtom; but this objection is groundleſs (4). The whole Hiſtory of the firſt race plainly ſhows, the eldeſt had no Privilege, and that the Kingdoms, of which the French Monarchy then conſiſted, were always divided among the Brothers (5). But be that as it will, it is not ſufficient to ſhow, that Gontran did a thing agreeable to the pretended diſpoſition of the Salic Law or Cuſtom, it muſt alſo be proved, that he did it with intention to obſerve that Cuſtom or Law, which I think impoſſible (6). It would be quite another thing, if the Law was perfectly known, or the Cuſtom undeniably eſtabliſhed by former precedents, which might give occaſion to ſuppoſe Gontran deſigned to conform himſelf to it (7). If a Man examines what paſſed during the firſt Race, with reſpect to the Succeſſion, he will find nothing fixed or ſettled upon that head; and that force and Arms, had a greater ſhare in it than Laws. This is ſo true, that it is even doubtful, according to Father Daniel, whether the Children were to be preferred to the Brothers, and that this queſtion was not fully decided till long after the beginning of the ſecond Race (8). It is evident then, from what has been ſaid, that the opinion that there was in France, before the Reign of Philip le Long, a Law or Cuſtom excluding the Daughters from the ſucceſſion to the Crown, cannot be ſupported by any certain Teſtimony, or undeniable matter of Fact.

Having ſhown what we are to underſtand by the Salic Law, of which ſo many People talk, without having a juſt notion of the thing, it will be neceſſary, in order fully to clear this matter, to make appear how the practice of this Law was eſtabliſhed in France. But for the better underſtanding of this, it will be proper to ſet before the Reader the following part of the Genealogy of the Kings of France, which will ſerve likewiſe to ſhow the occaſion of the diſpute between Edward and Philip de Valois.

Lewis Hutin dying in 1316 left by Clemence of Burgundy his Wife only one Daughter, an Infant called Joanna. But as his Queen was big with Child, the Crown was not diſpoſed of till ſhe was delivered. The reaſon of this delay was, becauſe, if the Queen was delivered of a Son, he was to ſucceed his Father, not by virtue of the Salic Law, but by a Law, common to all States, according to which the Males have always the preference to the Females of the ſame degree. Till the Queen's delivery, Philip le Long, the eldeſt of the deceaſed King's two Brothers, was appointed Regent. I ſay, appointed, in the Words of Father Daniel, who does not acquaint us by whom he was appointed. Philip was then at Lyons, buſy in procuring a Conclave for the Election of a new Pope. This was the reaſon he could not come to Paris, till three Weeks after the death of the King his Brother. He found there a Party already formed againſt him, at the Head of which was Charles Earl of Valois his Uncle, who intended to diſpute the Regency with him, and was in poſſeſſion of the Louvre. But Philip, at his arrival, found means to diſlodge him. The next day, he aſſembled the Parliament, and by the unanimous conſent of the Lords and Knights there preſent, the Regency was adjudged to him for eighteen Years, in caſe the Queen was delivered of a Son.

Mean time, as the Queen might chance to have a Daughter, Eudes Duke of Burgundy, Uncle by the Mother's ſide to Joanna, Daughter of the late King, was preparing to proſecute his Niece's right. At length, the Queen was brought to bed of a Prince, who was called John, and lived but a few days. Then Philip, grounding his claim upon the Salic Law, pretended the Crown was fallen to him. As he had a powerful Party, and was unwilling to have his Title queſtioned, he repaired to Rheims, in order to be crowned. But the Duke of Burgundy oppoſed the Coronation, with a Proteſtation, in the preſence of the Peers, to maintain Joanna's Right, to whom he pretended the Crown belonged, both by natural and civil Law; and at leaſt the Coronation ought not to be performed, before the pretenſions of the young Princeſs were duly examined. Though the Earl of Valois had attended Philip to Rheims, he was known to be a friend of the Duke of Burgundy's. On the other hand, Charles Earl of Marche, the King's own Brother, being of the ſame Party, left Rheims the morning before the Solemnity. If the Salic Law could be proved to be acknowledged and admitted before that time, I confeſs, the oppoſition of theſe Princes would be of no great weight. But as that proof is very difficult, as I have before ſhown, it may be inferred from the oppoſition of

(1) This does not ſeem to be a convincing Reaſon why Gontran ſhould diſpoſſeſs a Daughter he entirely loved. For if Gontran had thought his Daughter could have the leaſt Shadow of Right to ſucceed him, would he have made her a Nun? So that her being a Nun, is rather a ſtrong Preſumption, that the Daughters could not ſucceed to the Crown. But it may be ſaid, was ſhe not a Nun before her Father adopted Childebert his Nephew? Now this ought to be proved indeed, to make Rapin's Argument of any force: but the contrary is moſt probable. For Mezerai ſays, Gontran was not married till his Acceſſion to the Crown in 561. Now ſuppoſing Gontran married Clotilda's Mother the firſt Year of his Reign, ſhe was too young to receive the Veil in 577, when he adopted his Nephew Childebert. Beſides, in a Treaty with his adopted Son, an Article is inſerted, "That whatever is granted by King "Gontran, to his Daughter Clotilda, whether Moveables, Cities, Lands, and Revenues, ſhall remain in her poſſeſſion." Such Grants do not ſeem fit for a Nun, though a Princeſs. Now this Treaty (as Fauchet ſays) was made in 587, that is, ten Years after his making Childebert his univerſal Heir. But after all, ſuppoſing ſhe was a Nun before Childebert's Adoption, would not Gontran, upon the Death of his Sons, inſtead of adopting a Nephew, have procured a Diſpenſation for a beloved Daughter, if the Salic Law would have allowed it? So that Clotilda's being a Nun, cannot weaken the Argument drawn from her Excluſion, in favour of the Salic Law.

(2) Rapin is miſtaken in making Childebert to be eldeſt Brother of Clotaire II. They were only Couſin Germans, Sons of two Brothers; the firſt of Sigebert, King of Auſtraſia; and the other of Chilperic, King of Neuſtria. So that his Remark, that the eldeſt had no Privilege, &c. is not to the purpoſe here.

(3) Does not the contrary ſeem rather to be inferred from this Prince's Conduct, that he did think himſelf bound by the Law or Cuſtom, excluding the Females from the Crown, and knew the Succeſſion to be ſo ſettled in an inviolable manner; otherwiſe it is incredible that he ſhould not do what lay in his Power, to leave his Dominions to his only beloved Daughter.

(4) That this Objection is not altogether without Foundation is certain, from the Paſſage of Agathias, in the Note above.

(5) Rapin did not ſeem to be of the Opinion, that the Succeſſion was divided among all the Brothers, in the Diſſertation on the Government of the Saxons, p. 158, 159. Neither indeed was it true, as appears in a Citation from Mezerai, in p. 158, of the ſame Diſſertation.

(6) As Gontran himſelf ſucceeded to part of his Brother's Succeſſion, in Excluſion of his three Nieces, Cherebert's Daughters, it is more than probable, that he adopted his Nephew in Excluſion of his Daughter, in conſequence of the ſame Law or Cuſtom by which he was preferred to his Nieces.

(7) We have for it the Authority of Agathias, who ſpeaks of it in expreſs Terms; and the Treaty between Gontran and Childebert, where it is ſuppoſed, and made the Foundation of their Agreement. Beſides, this Law or Cuſtom is to be conſidered as unqueſtionably eſtabliſhed, before Gontran diſpoſed of his Dominions, in prejudice of his own Daughter, ſince there were three Examples in fifteen Years: 1. The Excluſion of Theobald's Siſters in 555. 2. Of Childebert's two Daughters in 558. 3. Of Cherebert's three Daughters in 570.

(8) There were Conteſts between Brothers and Couſins, concerning the Succeſſion; but it does not appear, that the Excluſion of the Daughters was uncertain or doubtful.

(9) Du Haillan ſays, Philip le Long had four Daughters, whoſe Names were, Joanna, Margaret, Mary, and Blanch.

the Princes of the Blood themſelves, and contrary to their own Intereſts, that this Law paſſed not then for inconteſtable.

The Duke of Burgundy's Proteſtation, and Prince Charles's Retreat, made Philip ſo uneaſy, that he ordered the Gates of Rheims to be ſhut during the Ceremony of the Coronation, for fear of interruption, or that other Peers might abſent themſelves. A few days after, he held an Aſſembly at Paris, where were preſent a great number of Nobles, almoſt all the Prelates, the moſt conſiderable Burgeſſes of Paris, and the Univerſity. It was this Aſſembly that examined the Laws of the State; decided, that the Females were incapable of ſucceeding to the Crown; and approved and confirmed the King's Coronation. It might be demanded, whether ſuch an Aſſembly had power to make a deciſion of this nature; but ſince the French Nation has thought fit to receive it, it is needleſs to inſiſt upon that. I ſhall only obſerve, that it was now almoſt nine hundred years ſince the eſtabliſhment of the Monarchy, and this the firſt time it was expreſsly decided in France, that the Daughters were incapable of ſucceeding to the Crown.

Dan. Hiſt. de France.

Notwithſtanding this deciſion, Queen Clemence, Widow of the late King, the Earl of Marche the King's Brother, the Earl of Valois his Uncle, the Duke of Burgundy Prince of the Blood, and their adherents, did not fail to ſhow a diſſatisfaction, at ſeeing Philip on the Throne. This created uneaſineſs in the new King, who, to free himſelf from it, found means to gain the Duke of Burgundy, the head of the Party, by giving him his eldeſt Daughter in marriage, with the Earldom of Burgundy for her Portion. The Duke being thus gained, the Party diſperſed, and the Salic Law paſſed, from thenceforward, for a Law as antient as the Monarchy. But great care was taken to confound, as has been done ever ſince, the Salic Law in general, or the Collection of Salic Laws, with the pretended Salic Law in particular, which excluded the Daughters from ſucceeding to the Crown.

Philip le Long being dead, after a ſhort Reign, and leaving only Daughters, Charles the Fair his Brother, mounted the Throne without oppoſition, to the prejudice of his Nieces. This was a ſecond deciſion in favour of the Males. From that time none ever thought of queſtioning the Authority of the Salic Law. Thus was eſtabliſhed the obſervance of this famous Law in France, without its being yet known, whether Philip le Long, in urging it in ſupport of his pretenſions, proceeded upon the ſixth Paragraph of the 62d Title of the Salic Law, or upon inviolable Cuſtom. What may be affirmed, is, that in thoſe days the French muſt have had very confuſed notions concerning this Law, ſince even after its being inconteſtably acknowledged for authentick, the moſt learned cannot agree upon that ſubject.

I come now to the famous Diſpute between Philip of Valois and Edward III. Charles the Fair, who died February 1328, leaving no Male-Iſſue, and his Queen finding herſelf with Child, the ſame Rule was followed as was obſerved after the death of Lewis Hutin. That is, the Crown was not diſpoſed of, till the Queen's Delivery, who was ſeven months gone with child. But it was neceſſary to appoint a Regent, to take care of the Government in the mean while. Then it was that the great Conteſt about the Regency aroſe, between Edward III, Nephew, by his Mother, to Charles the Fair, and Philip Earl of Valois, Couſin German to the ſame Prince. This was an affair of very great conſequence. Beſides that the Regency was to be long, in caſe the Queen was delivered of a Son, it was eaſy to foreſee, that the Judgment given for the Regency, would be a ſtrong Precedent for the Crown, if ſhe happened to have a Daughter. For this reaſon the affair was very warmly conteſted on both ſides, not before the States-General, as ſome have affirmed without any foundation, but before an Aſſembly of great Men, purpoſely convened upon that occaſion. Edward pleaded his being the next Male-Heir of the late King. Philip adhered to the Salic Law, which, according to him, excluded not only the Daughters, but alſo their Deſcendants, from the Succeſſion to the Crown, and conſequently from the Regency. Philip carried the Cauſe as to the Regency, and was afterwards crowned, upon the Queen's being delivered of a Daughter in April. As Edward endeavoured not to proſecute his Right till ſome years after, the queſtion between them, was no longer concerning the Regency, but the Crown itſelf. All the French Hiſtorians call Edward's pretenſions chimerical; and the Engliſh, on their part, exclaim againſt the injuſtice that was done him. The buſineſs therefore at preſent is to examine the Rights of both Parties, independently of the Events, and Philip's poſſeſſion. This will be the only means to enable us to judge, whether the War occaſioned by this affair, was juſt or unjuſt, or whether, as I believe, there was on both ſides, ſufficient reaſon to juſtify the attack and the defence.

In order to have a clear notion of this matter, it muſt be conſidered, that the Point in queſtion between the two Kings, was not, Whether there was any ſuch thing as a Salic Law, excluding the Daughters from the Succeſſion to the Crown of France? Whether the Law was real, or only imaginary, it was equally the intereſt of both Kings to ſuppoſe it, ſince it was the ſole foundation of their reſpective Claims. Without this Law, the Crown would have indiſputably belonged to Joanna Daughter of Lewis Hutin, and the two laſt Kings muſt have been reckoned Uſurpers. Moreover, had there been no Salic Law, Philip and Edward would have been manifeſtly excluded by the Daughters of the three laſt Kings, Sons of Philip the Fair. The only thing therefore was to know, whether the Salic Law was limited to the Perſons of the Daughters, to exclude them from the Succeſſion, or whether it extended to all their Poſterity. This was a new Query, which had never been decided, becauſe the ſame caſe had never happened, ſince the beginning of the Monarchy. Philip maintained, that Edward could pretend to the Crown, but by right of Repreſentation, as Son of Iſabella; and that repreſenting only a Woman, he could not derive from his Mother, a right which ſhe had not. But Edward took care not to ground his Claim upon Repreſentation. He inſiſted, on the contrary, upon nearneſs of Blood; and affirmed, that the Crown was devolved to him, as the next Male-Heir capable of ſucceeding.

Indeed, it cannot be conceived what uſe he could have made of Repreſentation, which ſerves only to put a diſtant Relation, in the place of the Perſon repreſented. He had no occaſion to be brought nearer, ſince he was Nephew of the late King, and Philip de Valois but Couſin-German. Accordingly, in all the pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts concerning this matter, there is not ſo much as one, where he alledges in his behalf the right of Repreſentation, but always that of nearneſs of Blood. And yet almoſt all the French Authors that have writ on this Subject, have been pleaſed to combat this chimæra, and ground their reaſonings upon the impertinency of this Repreſentation; which, after all, was never urged by Edward. The Engliſh, for their part, are fallen into the like error, by ſtrenuouſly oppoſing the Exiſtence of the Salic Law, not conſidering, it was no leſs neceſſary for Edward than for Philip. So, it may be affirmed, both ſides have underſtood, and ſtated the queſtion wrong.

But, to prevent miſtakes, and clear this matter as much as poſſible, a Man muſt fancy himſelf cotemporary with this Diſpute, and conſider that the point in queſtion was never decided. Each Party therefore was free, before the deciſion, to explain and comment upon the Salic Law, as he judged for his purpoſe, without being liable to be taxed with raſhneſs. Whereas now it would be ridiculous to diſpute upon the interpretation of a Law acknowledged by the French, and admitted, as then explained by Philip, and which they have ever ſince followed.

This being ſuppoſed, the buſineſs then, in order to decide this new Query, was, fully to underſtand the meaning of the Salic Law, concerning which there was reaſon, as I have ſhown, to doubt, whether it ever exiſted. But ſuppoſing its exiſtence, the Queſtion was to be decided, either according to the Paragraph of the Salic Code, De Terra vero Salica, &c. which gave no light into the point in hand, or according to the inviolable cuſtom obſerved in France for nine hundred years, though there had never been occaſion to put it in practice. Upon which ever of theſe two foundations a Man grounded a Judgment, he could not but meet great difficulties. Could he ſay, that by the Paragraph De Terra Salica, it was plain, the Male-Iſſue of the Daughters, were to be excluded from the Succeſſion to the Crown? Was it evident that this Law, ſo long diſuſed, with reſpect to the Salic Lands, and the Eſtates of the Nobles, had preſerved its full force with regard to the Crown? On the other hand, if a Man grounded his Judgment upon Cuſtom, what method could he take to know, whether it was the intent of the firſt Eſtabliſhers, whoever they were, to exclude from the Succeſſion the Male-Heirs of the Daughters, as well as the Daughters themſelves? He could have no Precedents or Examples to direct him, ſince the ſame caſe had never happened. It is therefore raſhneſs, in my opinion, abſolutely to decide now againſt either of the two contending Princes, and more ſo, peremptorily to pronounce the Pretenſions of either to be extravagant. This is the more unjuſt, as they both ſupported their Claims by very ſpecious reaſons, the ſubſtance ſtance whereof I am going to relate; if ſo be, that part of theſe Reaſons have not ſince been fathered upon them.

Edward maintained, that what had hitherto been decided concerning the Salic Law, regarded only the Perſons of the Daughters, and could not be extended to their Male-Iſſue, without proving it to be the intent of the Law. But this was impoſſible, conſidering the time between its eſtabliſhment, and the firſt occaſion of putting it in practice. That indeed, the excluſion of the Daughters was built on very plauſible reaſons, taken from the weakneſs of their Sex, and the temper of the French Nation, which would never venture to be governed by a Woman; but that theſe reaſons could not be alledged againſt their Sons. That formerly, among the Oſtrogoths of Italy, who obſerved the ſame Cuſtom, there was a like inſtance, which plainly ſhowed, that the excluſion of the Daughters might ſubſiſt without that of their Male-Heirs. That after the death of Theodoric, Amalazonta, his Daughter, did not ſucceed him, becauſe ſhe was a Woman; however, that did not hinder Athalaric her Son, though an Infant, from being placed on the Throne of his Grandfather (1). He farther added, that the Salic Law was an extraordinary Law, contrary to the Law civil and natural, for which reaſon it was to be confined within juſt bounds, rather than extended, as if the Women of the Royal Family were to be puniſhed for ſome great crime, which deſervedly drew down vengeance on all their Poſterity. If the French believed Women unworthy, or unfit to govern them, with all his heart, he pretended not to oppoſe that Law. But what had the Princeſſes of the Blood done to deſerve, that all their Poſterity ſhould ſuffer a puniſhment, from which the Daughters of the Peers, and the other great Men of France were exempted, as well as their Deſcendants? Finally, in explaining the Salic Law, ſo as to deprive the Male-Iſſue of the Women of a natural Right, was to make a new Law, under colour of interpreting the old.

Philip replied, that Edward acknowledging the Authority of the Salic Law, was much miſtaken in confining the intent of that Law, to the hindering the Kingdom of France from being governed by a Woman. That there was another and no leſs eſſential end, namely, to prevent the Crown from devolving to Foreigners. That the French Nation had willingly ſubmitted to Hugh Capet and his Houſe, but never meant to ſubject themſelves to other Families; and to receive a foreign King, a new contract was neceſſary (2). That the intent of the French manifeſtly appeared, in their not conſidering the Deſcendants of the Princeſſes of the Blood, as preſumptive Heirs of the Crown (3). Conſequently, it was not indifferently the next Male-Heir which was to ſucceed, but the next deſcended from Father to Son from Hugh Capet.

It is a ſtrange thing, that among ſo many Authors who have writ of this famous Conteſt, not one, at leaſt that I know of, except Father Daniel, rightly underſtood the ſtate of the Queſtion between the two Kings. They have all amuſed themſelves with combating Chimæras, and making the Parties alledge Arguments nothing at all to the purpoſe, and ſometimes even contrary to their real intereſts. Some make Philip urge very ſtrong reaſons againſt the right of Repreſentation, which it is certain Edward never meant to uſe. Others alledge for Edward the moſt plauſible arguments againſt the Salic Law, though it was evidently his intereſt to ſupport it. And therefore I am apt to believe, the Harangue Paulus Æmilius puts into the mouth of Robert d'Artois, in defence of Philip's Right, is a mere invention of the Hiſtorian; ſince the Orator doth not confine himſelf to the true caſe, though in all appearance, Robert d'Artois was not ignorant of the ſtate of the Controverſy. Paſquier, though a great Civilian, and well verſed in the Hiſtory of France, and in ſhort, all the Writers, as well Engliſh as French, are guilty of the ſame error. As for Father Daniel, after truly ſtating the caſe, and briefly relating the reaſons of Philip de Valois, without giving his own opinion, he makes Edward's pretenſions to be conſidered, in the courſe of his Hiſtory, as chimerical (4).

This caſe was never decided as to the Crown, but only with regard to the Regency. It cannot be denied, that in this judgment Philip had a great advantage, for the Judges were all his Relations and Friends, and the Perſon who diſputed the Regency with him, a Minor and Foreigner. Philip took for granted afterwards, in imitation of Philip le Long, that the ſame judgment which adjudged him the Regency, gave him a Right to be crowned, and by that the queſtion was really decided. He was ſo prejudiced in favour of his own right, that he commanded the Hands and Feet of a Burgher of Compiegne to be cut off, for maintaining, that Edward's Title was better than his. One cannot ſay what the Iſſue would have been, if the deciſion of the affair had been referred to the States of the Realm, as it was the opinion of ſeveral, who believed That to be the only means of ſolidly eſtabliſhing Philip's Right. All that can be affirmed is, that the eſtabliſhment of the Salic Law in favour of Philip le Long, and its confirmation by the advancement of Charles the Fair to the Throne, could not have prejudiced Edward. The ſole buſineſs was, either to limit the Salic Law to the Perſons of the Daughters, or to extend it to all their Poſterity, and this is what had never before been decided.

My deſign in what I have ſaid, as well concerning the Salic Law, as the Conteſt between the two Kings, was, I. To rectify moſt People's notion concerning this Law. II. To ſhow preciſely wherein conſiſted the Diſpute between the two Competitors. III. That this affair had its difficulties, and was not eaſily to be determined by Law. IV. Laſtly, That the two Kings had each very plauſible reaſons, and conſequently it was a juſt matter of Proceſs. And this is what I could not do in the Body of the Hiſtory, without making too long a digreſſion. As the War occaſioned by this quarrel was very laſting, and renewed by ſeveral of Edward's Succeſſors, I thought it would not be unacceptable to the Reader, to know the origin and foundation thereof. Nay, this quarrel may be ſaid not to be yet ended, ſince from the time of Edward III, the Kings of England have all along born, and ſtill do bear the Title of Kings of France.

(1) There are ſome Writers, who not knowing that the Diſpute between Philip and Edward, was not about the Excluſion of the Women, but of their Male Iſſue, have alledged this Example in favour of Philip de Valois. Rapin.

(2) It would perhaps be pretty difficult to prove this Engagement of the French Nation with the Family of Hugh Capet. The Aſſociation practiſed by the firſt Kings of the third Race, ſeems to argue, that they did not much rely on this pretended Engagement, of which Father Daniel contents himſelf with ſaying, that it is very likely. Rapin.

(3) I queſtion whether this can be affirmed with certainty, with reſpect to the Time before the Reign of Philip le Long. At leaſt, it is very doubtful, with regard to the ſecond Race. Rapin.

(4) It is certain, that Rapin, in aſſerting, that all the French and Engliſh Authors underſtood not the State of the Queſtion between the two Kings, was miſtaken. For of the French, Vertot, in his Diſſertation on the Salic Law, (which Rapin, it is plain, never ſaw) ſtates the Caſe exactly as he does. So do likewiſe Bodin, Du Haillan, Mezerai, and Le Gendre. So alſo the famous Puffendorf; and of our Hiſtorians, Martin, Tyrrel, &c. It muſt indeed be owned, that ſome, after truly ſtating the Caſe, in other Places alledge Arguments againſt the Salic Law, which entirely deſtroy Edward's Pretenſions. Of this Father Daniel is a famous Inſtance. For after he had already ſaid, "That the Salic Law was allowed on both ſides; namely, that the Daughters "could not ſucceed to the Crown, and therefore the Queen of England, though the late King's Siſter, could not pretend to it: But the Engliſh Lawyers "maintained, the next Perſon, where this defect of Sex was not found, ought, by nearneſs of Blood, to ſucceed, and upon this Title Edward founded his "Pretenſions." I ſay, after thus truly ſtating the Caſe, he ſays, in his Diſſertation on the Antiquity and Author of the Salic Law, "If the Engliſh had "not been perſwaded of the Antiquity of this Law, they would not have failed to attack, more ſtrongly than they did, this fundamental Principle of Philip's "Right." What! Should they attack a Law allowed by Edward as well as Philip? A Law, without which neither of them would have had any Pretenſions to the Crown? It is in this inconſiſtent manner that many, both French and Engliſh Hiſtorians, talk upon this Subject. See theſe Things more largely diſcuſſed in Rival's Examination of L'Abbe de Vertot's Diſſertation on the Origin of the Salic Laws.

12. RICHARD II. Sirnamed of BOURDEAUX.

Reaſons of it.

EDWARD III, having finiſhed his glorious Life, it was naturally Richard his Grandſon that was to aſcend the Throne, as repreſenting the late Prince of Wales his Father. But though Edward himſelf had ſo ordered it, many People were apprehenſive, the execution of his laſt Will would meet with great obſtacles. Richard had three Uncles who might diſpute the Crown with him, and ſupport the pretenſion if they would have urged it, with plauſible and illuſory reaſons. The young Prince could claim the Crown only by right of Repreſentation, of which there had been no precedent, at leaſt with reſpect to the Crown, ſince the Norman Conqueſt. However lawful this Right might be with regard to private Perſons, by the general diſpoſition of the Laws, it did not neceſſarily follow that it was inconteſtable concerning the Crown. In France, for example, the ſucceſſion of the Kingdom was not regulated by the Laws of private Eſtates. In Spain, the Kings, who for a Century had been poſſeſſed of the Crown of Caſtile, were deſcended from a Prince that obtained it in prejudice of his Nephews, Sons of his eldeſt Brother. Nay, a natural Son was then in actual poſſeſſion; though among private Perſons, Baſtards had no right to the Inheritance of their Fathers. In Artois, the Aunt, by the Judgment of the Peers of France, was preferred to the Nephew, who repreſented his Father. A quite contrary deciſion of the ſame Court, with regard to Bretagne, had occaſioned in that Dukedom a War, which at length was ended to the advantage of the Uncle againſt the Niece, and wherein Edward himſelf had maintained the Right of the former. This was ſufficient to afford the Duke of Lancaſter, the eldeſt of the three Brothers, a very plauſible pretence, if he had intended to ſeize the Crown, as was ſuſpected by the late Prince of Wales his Brother, the King his Father himſelf, and all England. To this may be added, that Richard's youth, who was but in his eleventh year, and the expiration of the Truce with France, ſeemed to furniſh the Duke with freſh reaſons to demand the Crown, which he was better able to defend than a Minor of eleven years old. But on the other hand, though the Duke of Lancaſter ſhould have had ſuch a thought, he might have been diverted from it by the conſideration of the diſpoſition of the Engliſh in favour of young Richard, whom the memory of his illuſtrious Father rendered extremely dear to them, and for whom the King his Grandfather had deſigned the Crown. Whether this conſideration prevented his Uncles from taking advantage of his youth, or it was from a pure motive of moderation and equity, far from intending to ſupplant him, they were the firſt to do him homage. The Duke of Lancaſter, who was ſtiled in England King of Caſtile, ſatisfied his ambition with governing the State during Richard's minority, and the Princes his Brothers were no leſs inclined than he, to perform their Father's laſt Will. So all fears vaniſhing, Richard was crowned without oppoſition, on the 16th of July, four and twenty days after the death of Edward (1).

Richard crowned. Act. Pub. VII. p. 157. Walſing.

The King's Champion. Walſing.

At this Coronation it is, that we meet with the firſt mention in Hiſtory of a Champion, who appeared compleatly armed in Weſtminſter-Hall, where the King dined, and throwing his Gantlet on the ground, challenged all Perſons, who ſhould diſpute the King's Title to the Crown. The original of this Cuſtom, which is ſtill preſerved, is unknown, but it is certainly of an older date than the Coronation of Richard II, ſince Sir John Dimmock, who performed then the office of Champion, was admitted to it by virtue of a Right annexed to a Manor, held by him in Lincolnſhire (2). 1377.

Immediately after the Solemnity, the young King created Thomas of Woodſtock his Uncle Earl of Buckingham (3), and Guiſchard d'Augouleme, his Governor, Earl of Huntington (4); at the ſame time conferring the Title of Earl of Nottingham upon John de Mowbray, and that of Earl of Northumberland upon Henry Percy, who was alſo Earl-Marſhal (5).

Several Honors conferred. Idem. Act. Pub. VII. p. 160.

Edward's Truce with France was expired ſince April the 1ſt, without the leaſt preparation by the Engliſh to renew the War. Whether the late King's illneſs occaſioned this negligence, or it was prepoſterouſly imagined, that France, ſatisfied with the great advantages ſhe had gained, would remain in quiet, there was in England a ſurpriſing ſecurity in that reſpect (6). It was quite otherwiſe in France, where Charles V. was diligently preparing to take advantage of the indolence of the Engliſh. When that Monarch was informed that Edward was no longer able to act, he gave orders to levy Troops on all ſides. So that when he heard of his death, he was ready to bring five Armies into the Field. He ſent the firſt into Guienne, to complete the expulſion of the Engliſh out of that Province; the ſecond into Auvergne; the third into Bretagne; the fourth into Artois; and the fifth he kept with him, in order to aſſiſt the reſt in caſe of neceſſity. Beſides theſe Armies, he had likewiſe equipped a ſtrong Fleet, which was ordered to infeſt the Coaſts of England. As the Engliſh were wholly unprepared, the French landed in ſeveral Places, burnt Haſtings, Portſmouth, Dartmouth, Plymouth, and defeated ſome Troops aſſembled by the Prior of Lewes, to try to put a ſtop to their ravages. They were repulſed at Wincheſter, but landed in the Iſle of Wight, where they plundered all the Inhabitants, and after a fruitleſs attempt to take Carisbrook Caſtle (7), retired with their booty.

The French ravage the Coaſts of England. Walſing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 162. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 313.

All this happened whilſt the Engliſh were employed in placing Richard on the Throne, as the moſt urgent affair. Mean time, there was neither Fleet nor Troops provided to repulſe the enemies. As the King was not of age to govern the State himſelf, the Duke of Lancaſter and the Earl of Cambridge his Uncles took the adminiſtration of affairs, till the meeting of the Parliament in October; but uſed with great caution the authority they had aſſumed, for fear of breeding prejudices againſt them, that might be detrimental to them in the approaching Parliament. The Duke of Lancaſter was not beloved; he was accuſed of abuſing his power in the end of the late Reign, and treating the Subjects a little too haughtily. He had eſpecially incurred the ill-will of the Londoners, by cauſing them to be puniſhed for the tumult raiſed on Wickliff's account. Though ſince the death of the King his Father, he had been reconciled to the City (8), that proceeding was conſidered only as the effect of his Policy,

The King's Uncles govern the State. Walſing.

(1) As the Coronation Oath was ſomewhat larger than that already mentioned by our Hiſtorians, and becauſe this Form, with ſome ſmall Alterations, has been adminiſtred to all ſucceeding Kings and Queens ever ſince, it may not be improper to inſert it. "I. That he would permit the Church to enjoy "all her Liberties: That he would reverence her Miniſters, and maintain the Truth. II. That he would reſtrain Violence and all Oppreſſion, in all ſorts "of Men: That he would cauſe good Laws to be every where obſerved, eſpecially thoſe of St. Edward, King and Confeſſor: And would alſo cauſe all "evil Laws or Cuſtoms to be abrogated. III. That he would be no reſpecter of Perſons, but would give right Judgment between Man and Man, and "would chiefly obſerve Mercy in all his Decrees or Judgments, as God ſhould ſhew Mercy to him." Then the Archbiſhop led the King (the Lord-Marſhal walking before him) to all the four Sides of the Scaffold, and ſhewing the King to the People, declared the Purport of the Oath he had now taken, and asked them, If they would be ſubject to this Prince as their lawful Ruler, and be obedient to his Commands? This Ceremony, though not mentioned before in any of our Hiſtorians, was no innovation, but ſeems to be a Remainder of the old Engliſh Cuſtom of electing the King, as may be obſerved by comparing the manner of the Coronation, and Election of King Edward the Confeſſor, and William I, with this Action, and which has been obſerved ever ſince. Tyrrel, Vol. III. p. 829. Walſing. p. 195.

and it was feared, he would assume his former haughtiness, if entrusted with the Administration. As he knew very well what people thought of him, he behaved very circumspectly, apprehensive as he was of being excluded from the Regency to which he aspired. But all his precautions were not capable to prevent the murmurs of the People, already prejudiced against him. The little care, the two Princes took to guard the Coasts, was openly complained of, without considering they had neither Fleet, nor Troops, nor Money, nor even any lawful authority to raise extraordinary Forces. Another accident helped very much to incense the people against them. The Scots having taken by surprize the Castle of Roxborough, the loss was ascribed to the negligence of those, who governed the Realm (1).

The Parliament appoints Regents. Rot. Parl. 1 Ric. II. M. 1, &c. Walsing.

The Parliament's first care, which met in October (2), was to settle the Administration of the Government during the King's minority. For that purpose, they appointed several Governors to the King, to take care of his Education, and ordered that his three Uncles should be Regents of the Kingdom; but joined with them some Bishops and Lay-Lords (3). This precaution was founded on the danger of trusting the Person and Affairs of a minor King, to the sole management of the neareſt Relations, who in their Administration, might have self-interested views. This was a great mortification to the three Princes, and particularly to the Duke of Lancaster, who had flattered himself with the hopes of being sole Regent (4).

Grants Money to the King upon hard Conditions. Cotton's Abridg. Walsing.

This affair being finished, the Parliament granted the King a Subsidy (5), for the maintenance of the War; but it was clogged with this condition, (which plainly showed, they were resolved to be upon their guard during the Minority,) that the Money should be lodged in the hands of Philpot and Walworth, two eminent Aldermen of London, who were ordered to take care it should be expended only in repulsing the French and Castilians in league against England. Moreover, it was declared, that the Subsidy granted the King, should not be drawn into a Precedent, but for the future, what should be necessary for maintaining his Houshold, and defraying the Charges of the War, should be supplied out of his ordinary Revenues. After this the Parliament admitted an accusation against Alice Pierce, Favorite of the late King, who being convicted of several Misdemeanors (6), received a Sentence, whereby all her Estate was confiscated to the King's use, and herself condemned to banishment. But this Woman, who had an able and intriguing head, quickly found means to be recalled by the King, and restored to her Estate (7). Before the Parliament broke up, Richard confirmed King John's two Charters, and gave his assent to several Acts, relating to the Contests England had with the Court of Rome.

Cotton, Ib.

1378. Violence committed by the Duke of Lancaster. Walsing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 178, 179.

It was not without reason, that the Duke of Lancaster was hindered from having the sole management of affairs. This Prince was of a proud and haughty Temper, which suffered him not to have much regard for his Inferiors, particularly in affairs where his interest was concerned. Presently after the breaking up of the Parliament, he gave a proof of his violent Temper, by an action which showed what he was capable of, if the whole power had been lodged in his hands. As he had a claim to the Kingdom of Castile, he thought it might be of some advantage to gain to his interest the young Earl of Denia, a Castilian Lord, then at London. The Father of this young Earl, being taken at the battle of Najara by two English Knights, was brought into England, where he had remained several years in the custody of those who took him Prisoner. At length, by leaving his Son in Hostage, he obtained leave to return home, where he died before his Ransom was paid. The Duke of Lancaster hoping to make friends in Castile by means of the young captive Earl, so managed it, that the King ordered the two Knights to release him. But as there was no mention of the ransom, they concealed their Prisoner, and made him promise he would not discover himself. This disobedience exasperating the Duke of Lancaster, he sent the two Knights to the Tower, from whence however they made their escape, and took refuge in the Church of Westminster. This Sanctuary was not capable of saving them. The Duke of Lancaster sending Soldiers into the Church (8) to bring them away, one of the Knights (9) was retaken, but the other (10) defending himself, was slain with a Monk, who too warmly took his part. The Archbishop of Canterbury excommunicated all that were concerned in the breach of the Church's privileges; but the Duke's authority prevented any farther prosecution of the affair. Sometime after, the King taking upon him to pay the Spanish Earl's ransom, it was discovered, to the People's great admiration, that the young Lord, not to be forced to break his promise, had all along attended, in a Footman's Habit, the Person to whom he had given his word. 1378.

The Duke gets the Money granted in Parliament into his Hands. Walsing.

Mean time, the Duke of Lancaster, who was vexed to see the Money granted the King by the Parliament, in the hands of two Citizens of London, promoted not the equipment of the Ships, for the defence of the Coasts. This affected negligence occasioned many complaints. But he pretended, he could not form any project, lest it should not be approved by those, who had the management of the Money. In fine, he so importuned the other Regents, that the two Aldermen were ordered to put into his hands the sums they were charged with. He promised for his part, that the Coasts should be better guarded, and the Merchant-men protected. However, he still delayed a considerable time sending out a Fleet, because he expected from Bayonne some Ships which were to join those he equipped.

Whilst the Fleet was preparing, the Earls of Arundel (11), and Salisbury (12) had orders to go to Normandy, and take possession of Cherbourg, which the King of Navarre had promised to deliver to the English. They had scarce left the Coasts of England, when they were met by some Spanish Men of War, who fiercely attacked them (13), and did them some damage. Notwithstanding this obstacle, they put a Garrison into Cherbourg, which afforded the English an inlet into Normandy, as Calais did into Picardy.

Philpot defeats a Scotch Pyrate, who did great Damage to the English Merchants. Walsing.

Before the Fleet, designed for the guard of the Coasts, was quite ready, one Mercer, a Scotch Pyrate, seeing the English neglected the northern Seas, entered the Port of Scarborough, and carried away the Merchant-men that lay there. This success inspiring him with greater hopes, he long cruised in those Seas, and took considerable prizes. The damage sustained by the Merchants on this occasion, caused fresh complaints against the Duke of Lancaster, who so ill performed his promise. Philpot, before-mentioned, full of indignation to see the English Merchants exposed to the ravages of this Pyrate, undertook, at his own expence, what the Duke neglected to do with the publick Money. He fitted out some Ships, and with a thousand Soldiers, went in quest of the Scotch Pyrate, whom he defeated, and taking him Prisoner, returned in triumph to London. This action, which gained him the applauses of the People, offended the Regents, who thought it of dangerous consequence, to suffer a private Person to undertake a thing of that nature, without the Government's permission. But he made so good a de-

That she procured from the same King a Remittance of three hundred Pounds, due from Richard Lyons to the Exchequer; and farther, procured him a Grant of a thousand Marks, as a Gift. But, as Sir Robert Cotton observes, the Record proves no such heinous Matter; only that she was in such Credit with Edward III, as she sat at his Bed's-head, when all of the Council and of the Privy-Chamber stood waiting without doors, and that she moved those Suits which they dared not; and these two Suits for which she was condemned, seemed very honest; her mishap was, that she was friendly to many, but all were not so to her. Abridgement, p. 158.

Schism in the Church. Walsing. Froissart, l. 2. c. 9.

The late Schism formed in the Church by the double Election of Urban VI, and Clement VII, employed the Parliament some time, which met in October 1378. France espoused the Cause of Clement, and perhaps that was the principal reason of England's declaring for Urban. However, as the matter is stated by the friends of Clement themselves, it cannot be denied, that his Election was very irregular. The rise of the Schism was this.

Rise of the Schism.

Gregory XI, leaving Avignon, upon certain pretended Revelations, in order to reside at Rome, died March the 7th, 1378. Of the three and twenty Cardinals then in being, six remained at Avignon; one was a Legate, and the sixteen others, of whom twelve were Frenchmen, and four Italians, were at Rome when Gregory died. These last being entered the Conclave, to proceed to the Election of a Pope, were greatly embarrassed. Their intent was to chuse a Frenchman; but as they foresaw the People of Rome would oppose it, they resolved to give them a seeming satisfaction, by pretending to elect an Italian. But they agreed first among themselves, that as soon as they were at full Liberty, they would chuse another, who should be the true Pope; a project which could hardly fail of begetting a Schism. According to this agreement, of which we could have no certainty, but by their own Confession, they elected the Archbishop of Bary, a Neapolitan, who assumed the name of Urban VI. The Election was notified to all Christian Princes as Canonical, even by the Cardinals the Electors, and for some time they themselves acknowledged Urban for head of the Church. And yet, whether in consequence of their agreement, or, as some affirm, because Urban treated them too haughtily, these same Cardinals leaving Rome on pretence of great heat, met at Anagnia, and elected one of the Cardinals of Avignon, who stiled himself Clement VII. These two Elections by the same Persons, long employed the most noted Divines in Europe, and occasioned a Schism, which lasted above thirty Years. It ought not to seem strange, that it was so difficult to decide, which of the Popes was head of the Church: It would have been much easier to find good reasons to reject them both. However, the Schism divided all Christendom, each State declaring for one or other of the two Popes, not so much on account of the Right of the Parties, as for political Reasons. France, whose interest it was that the Pope should reside at Avignon, joined with Clement, and for a contrary reason, England thought it more advantagious to adhere to the Pope of Rome.

The Duke of Lancaster undertakes to restore the Duke of Bretagne, Froissart, l. 1. c. 314. Act. Pub. VII. p. 195.

Whilst the two Pontiffs were darting their Spiritual Thunders against one another, the Duke of Lancaster equipped his Fleet, which had been so long preparing. His design was not only to guard the Coasts as he had ingaged: He had in view a more important expedition, namely, to restore the Duke of Bretagne, dispossessed by the King of France, with the connivance of the Lords of Bretagne, whom he had gained to his interests. This unhappy Prince, seeing himself abandoned by most of his Subjects, came into England towards the end of Edward's Reign, to demand his assistance; but losing that refuge by the death of his Father-in-law, retired to the Earl of Flanders, his relation and ally. During his stay in that Country, a French Envoy, who was going to Scotland, being stopped on the way, by the Earl's Order, Charles pretended it was done by the Duke of Bretagne's instigation, and insisted upon the Earl's dismissing him from his Court. The Earl, not believing, his being Vassal obliged him to that condescension, furnished the King by his refusal, with the pretence he was apparently seeking, to be revenged of the Duke another way. He sent into Bretagne an Army, to compleat the ruin of that unfortunate Prince, who was unable to resist him. England was too much concerned to support him, not to make some effort in his favour. The Duke of Lancaster finding his Fleet ready for Sea, went on board himself, and set sail for Bretagne, where he laid Siege to St. Malo. But he met with so many obstacles from Du Guesclin, who commanded the French Army in those Parts, that he was forced to desist from his enterprize. 1378.

This ill success would have perhaps discouraged the English, had not the Duke of Bretagne repaired to England, and offered to deliver to the King the Town of Brest, during the War, provided he would lend him an Aid proportioned to his wants. So advantagious an offer inspired the King's Council with fresh hopes, since it would enable them to make from that side a powerful diversion, which could not but be very troublesome to France. And indeed, if the English had wisely improved their advantages, it would have been in their power to invade France from four several Quarters, namely, Guienne, Picardy, Normandy, and Bretagne, by means of Bourdeaux, Calais, Cherbourg, and Brest, which gave the English so many inlets into that Kingdom. Richard's Council resolving to embrace so favorable a Juncture, accepted the Duke of Bretagne's offer, and made with him a Treaty, upon the foot proposed by himself. The Parliament, which was consulted on this affair, approving the Council's designs, granted a very considerable Subsidy, to execute a project that was likely to procure great advantages to the State. Besides the Party the Duke of Bretagne had still in his own Country, several of his Adversaries began to wish for his Restoration, not being able to bear, without extreme uneasiness, the insolence of the French. But as the strong holds were in the hands of the friends of France, the faithful Subjects could undertake nothing, unless supported by the English, who were, with all possible diligence, preparing the promised Supplies.

The Court resolves to assist him.

Mean while, the King of France, who saw the gathering storm, took measures to divert it, by procuring from the side of Scotland, a diversion, to hinder the English from carrying their Arms abroad. The King of Scotland, gained by the presents and promises of the French Monarch, suddenly broke the Truce, and took Berwick Castle, by surprize (1), the Town having been dismantled in the former Wars. The Earl of Northumberland (2), Governor of the northern Counties, surprized at the loss of that place, which was imputed to his negligence, drew together a Body of Troops (3) with such speed, that he was at Berwick before the Scots had notice of his design. Immediately after he invested the Castle; and seizing a Bridge, the only Pass by which Succours could be thrown into the place, pushed the Siege so vigorously, that in nine days he took it by Storm. Douglas (4) who was advancing to raise the Siege, finding himself disappointed, hastily retired into his Country, to avoid a Battle. He was pursued by the Earl of Northumberland, who to retard the Enemies retreat, detached a Body of six hundred Men (5), under the conduct of Musgrave (6), with orders to amuse them, without ingaging too far. But whilst he was himself advancing with the rest of his Army, he had intelligence, that his detachment was fallen into an ambush, and entirely defeated (7). Henry Percy his Son, signalized himself, both at the Siege of Berwick, and in the late Action, and gave extraordinary proofs of his great Courage, which gained him the surname of Hotspur. The Plague beginning to rage in the northern Counties, obliged the two Nations to a better observance of the Truce, without a new Treaty (8).

Mean time, the preparations for the assistance of the Duke of Bretagne were vigorously carrying on. But as the expence rose higher than was imagined, the Parliament (9) granted the King another Subsidy, the burden whereof was entirely borne by the Nobility and Clergy. Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Earls, and [mitred] Abbots, were taxed at ten Marks (10) each, besides forty Pence to be paid by the Abbots for every one of their Monks. 1379.

And, at an additional Grant, they gave besides, thirteen Shillings and Four-pence for every Sack of Wool, as much for every two hundred and forty Wool-fells, and for every Last of Leather twenty six Shillings and Eight-pence. Also they gave Six-pence in the Pound for every Pound value of Merchandize, as well of Denizens as Strangers, both imported and exported for one Year. Brady, p. 338. Cotton's Abridg. p. 173. *Rot. The King of France confiſcates Bretagne. Walſing.

The King of France was in a great paſſion with the Duke of Bretagne, for attempting to recall the Engliſh into his Country. At leaſt, he made that a pretence to ſummon him before the Court of Peers, where the Duke took care not to appear. But the Widow of Charles de Blois ſent Agents to the King, to repreſent to him, that he had no manner of Right to confiſcate Bretagne, which was not originally a Fief of the Crown of France. She maintained, if any of the former Dukes had thought proper to ſubmit to any perſonal ſervices to the Kings of France, it was not in their power to ſubject the Dukedom, without the conſent of their People. But the Court, regardleſs of theſe Remonſtrances, decreed the Confiſcation of Bretagne to the King's uſe. This proceeding convincing the Bretons, that Charles's Quarrel was not ſo much with the Duke as the Duchy, they were afraid of falling under the Dominion of France, and ſeeing their Country a Province of that Kingdom. This apprehenſion occaſioned an aſſociation of the great Men, which ended at length in recalling their lawful Sovereign. The Duke receiving the agreeable news, haſtened his return into his Dominions, in expectation of the Succours preparing for him in England. He was received by his Subjects with great Demonſtrations of Joy (1). Mean while, as the principal places were in the hands of his Enemies, he earneſtly intreated the Court of England to ſend him ſome Troops to ſupport him, till a more powerful Supply ſhould be ready. Upon theſe inſtances, the Council diſpatched ſome Ships with Troops (2). But they were for the moſt part loſt in a violent Storm.

The War continues between France and England. Walſing.

All this while, the French and Engliſh continued the War in ſeveral Places, but without coming to a deciſive Battle. The Governor of Cherbourg (3) gained ſome advantage over the French, who had quickly their revenge, by taking ſeveral Merchant Men.

1380. Parliament.

The Parliament which met in October 1380 (4), granted the King a new Aid to continue the War with France and Scotland, as well as to aſſiſt the Duke of Bretagne.

Act againſt Alien Eccleſiaſticks.

This Parliament is famous for a Statute againſt the Blood-ſuckers, who had long devoured the Land. I mean, the foreign Eccleſiaſticks, who by this Statute were rendered incapable of holding any Benefice in England. But as this probably would not be ſufficient to curb the Court of Rome, who did not think herſelf bound by Acts of Parliament, another Statute was made, to render the Pope's favours, in this reſpect, fruitleſs to Foreigners. By this Act, all the King's Subjects were forbid, on ſevere Penalties, to farm Benefices conferred on Strangers by the Court of Rome. This was properly attaining the ſame end another way. For the Pope uſually giving Engliſh Benefices to his Domeſticks, to Italian Biſhops and Cardinals, theſe Men could neither reſide on their Benefices, nor find any Farmers in the Kingdom. At the ſame time, the Parliament petitioned the King to expel all foreign Monks, for fear they ſhould give the Engliſh impreſſions deſtructive of the good of the State.

The Earl of Warwick ſole Governor of the King. Walſing.

After the Parliament's care of the Eccleſiaſtical affairs, all the King's Governors were removed, as well to retrench the great expence, as becauſe their Number was prejudicial to his education. Inſtead of theſe Lords, Thomas de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was choſen to have the ſole care of educating the King.

Commiſſioners to examine the Uſes the King's Revenues had been put to.

Since Richard's acceſſion to the Throne, his Revenues had been ſo ill managed, that the Houſe of Commons wanted to know on whom the blame was to be laid. To that end, fourteen Commiſſioners were appointed to examine to what uſes the Revenues of the Crown had been put, and to lay their report before the next Parliament, which was not to meet under a twelvemonth.

The Duke of Buckingham goes to the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Bretagne. Froiſſart, l. 2. c. 42. Walſing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 223, 256.

Shortly after, the Succours deſigned for the Duke of Bretagne being ready, the command was given to the Duke of Buckingham (5) the King's Uncle. This Prince landed at Calais (6), in order to go to Bretagne by Land. Perhaps he would have found it difficult to perform his Enterprize, with an Army conſiſting only of eight thouſand Men, had not the Duke of Burgundy, who kept cloſe to him all the way, with much more numerous Forces, received expreſs Orders from the King of France his Brother, not to attack the Engliſh. That Monarch had a ſurer way to be rid of his Enemies; namely, by a reconciliation with the Duke of Bretagne, who deſired peaceably to enjoy his Duchy, of which he ſaw no likelihood, as long as France was his Enemy. For this reaſon, the Duke of Buckingham meeting with little oppoſition, committed great Ravages upon his rout. Whilſt he was marching, the King of France died, leaving for Succeſſor Charles VI, his eldeſt Son, about twelve years of Age. His death might have been very advantagious to the Engliſh, if the Duke of Bretagne had firmly adhered to their Intereſts. But the Duke thinking it his wiſeſt courſe to take advantage of the confuſion of the Court of France, in the beginning of a Minority, ſpeedily concluded his Treaty with the new King (7), who granted him whatever he could deſire. 1380.

The poſture of affairs being changed by this agreement, the Engliſh were very coldly received in Bretagne. The Duke did not openly declare himſelf at firſt, becauſe the Engliſh were in poſſeſſion of Breſt. However it was eaſy to ſee he had no deſign to make uſe of them, ſince all the Towns denied them admittance. At length, the Duke opened his mind to the Duke of Buckingham, and making the beſt excuſe he could, provided him with Ships to return into England (8).

Though it was agreed that the Parliament ſhould not meet under a twelve-month, ſome unexpected affairs obliged the King to aſſemble it in November (9), in order to demand a freſh ſupply of Money, which was accordingly granted, to enable him to execute the reſolutions which I ſhall preſently ſpeak of. But whereas the Nobility and Clergy had ſupplied the former Subſidy, this was levied by way of Poll-Tax, from which no Perſon was exempted, not even the very Monks and Nuns. All above fifteen Years old were to pay Twelve-pence a head.

Reſolve to aſſiſt Portugal againſt Caſtile. Act. Pub. VII. p. 254. Froiſſart, l. 1. c. 61, 62.

One cannot but very much wonder, that whilſt the Kingdom was actually ingaged in a War with France and Scotland, the King's Council ſhould think of leaving it unprovided, by ſending Troops to the King of Portugal who was in war with Caſtile. But private intereſt prevailed above that of the publick, as is uſual in the Councils of the Kings, eſpecially during Minorities. The motive of this reſolution, ſeemingly ſo little agreeable to the State of the Kingdom, was this. Ferdinand King of Portugal, had undertaken againſt John King of Caſtile, Son of Henry the Baſtard, a War beyond his ſtrength. He had been ſo unſucceſsful, that inſtead of making Conqueſts upon his Enemy, he had drawn him into his Dominions. The ill ſucceſs of this War made him court the Alliance of the Engliſh, in order to obtain Succours againſt the Caſtilians, their common Enemies. Though it was by no means proper to ſend Troops ſo far, when England could hardly defend her own Coaſts, the Duke of Lancaſter's credit was ſo great in the Council, that it was reſolved, Ferdinand ſhould be aſſiſted. This reſolution was coloured with the pretence of hindering the growth of the King of Caſtile, mortal Enemy of the Engliſh; but the Duke of Lancaſter's private intereſt was the ſole motive. This Prince, who had aſſumed the Title of King of Caſtile, on account of his Marriage with Conſtantia eldeſt Daughter of Peter the Cruel, hoped that by ſending Troops into Portugal, they might be ſerviceable in promoting his own Affairs. And therefore, after the Parliament's approbation of the intended Expedition, and Grant of a Supply to carry it on, he cauſed the Command of the Troops to be given to the Duke of Cambridge his Brother, deſigning ſpeedily to follow

Mean while, as the Truce with Scotland was about to expire (1), the Council, by his direction, reſolved to propoſe to the King of Scotland the Prolongation thereof; otherwiſe the ſending of the Troops into Portugal might be obſtructed. That this Negotiation might not fail of Succeſs, he undertook it himſelf, and without delay repaired to the Frontiers of the two Kingdoms, where the Scotch Ambaſſadors were likewiſe to be. 1381. Inſurrection of Wat Tyler.
Knighton. Walſing. Froiſſart. l. 2. c. 62, 66.

The Poll-Tax impoſed by the Parliament was levied with great gentleneſs, inſomuch that the Collectors excuſed many Perſons. But as there are but too many who make it their buſineſs to inrich themſelves at the expence of the Publick, there were ſome that perſwaded the King and Council, if the Tax was levied with more ſtrictneſs, it would bring in much greater Sums, and even offered Money to have the management of it. Very probably, they were Flemings that farmed the Tax, and obliged themſelves to give the King a certain Sum for the Produce thereof. The new Collectors appointed by theſe Farmers, levied the Tax with extreme rigour. One who collected in Kent, demanding of a Tyler at Deptford, named Walter, twelve pence for one of his Daughters, the Father affirmed ſhe was under the Age ſet down in the Act of Parliament. Whereupon the inſolent Collector, as theſe ſort of People generally are, endeavouring to know the Truth by an indecent Action, the Father with his Hammer knocked out his Brains. All the Spectators applauded the Action, and promiſed the Murderer, commonly called Wat Tyler (3), to protect him. At the ſame time, the ſpirit of Rebellion ſeized not the Inhabitants of Deptford alone, but likewiſe all the meaner ſort of the County of Kent, who were ſoon followed by thoſe of Eſſex. The Poll-Tax was not their ſole Grievance. The People of thoſe parts had long been in a ferment, which being inflamed by this Accident, broke out into open rebellion. They complained of the little care to hinder the frequent Deſcents of the French, who had committed great Ravages in theſe two Counties. To this was added a general Diſcontent againſt the Judges, and all the Agents of the Law, who ruined Families by their Extortions. The Nobles and Gentry were no leſs hated by the Peaſants, on account of the Right of Villainage, which was extremely abuſed. The Populace were moreover extremely incenſed againſt the Duke of Lancaſter, who was charged with cauſing by his negligence, all the Calamities, the two Counties had endured. All theſe Complaints being ſpread in thoſe parts, and countenanced by the Seditious, or as ſome affirm, by the Monks, who thought themſelves injured by the Poll-Tax, to which they were liable, produced a wonderful Effect. In a ſhort time, Wat Tyler, choſen by the Seditious, Chief and Protector of the poor People, ſaw himſelf at the head of above a hundred thouſand Men, breathing revenge on the Nobility, and Profeſſors of the Law. Thus attended, he marched directly to London, freeing in his rout, all the Priſoners detained in the publick Goals. Amongſt theſe was a Prieſt of Maidſtone, one John Ball (4), who by his ſeditious Sermons, raiſed the People's Fury to the utmoſt height. He perſwaded them, that all Men being Sons of Adam, there ought to be no diſtinction, and conſequently it was their Duty to reduce the World to a perfect Equality. Purſuant to this Maxim, they reſolved to diſpatch all the Nobility, and thoſe that were diſtinguiſhed by their Poſts. So, without further Conſideration, they cut off the heads of all the Lords, Gentlemen, Judges, Counſellors, and Lawyers, that fell into their hands. After this, they bound themſelves by Oath, never to acknowledge for King, any Man whoſe Name ſhould be John. This Reſolution ſprung from their Hatred to the Duke of Lancaſter, who bore that Name, and was ſuſpected of aſpiring to the Crown.

The King ſends to know what they would have.

Richard hearing the Seditious were come as far as Black-Heath, where Wat Tyler reviewed his Army, ſent to know what they wanted. They replied, they had Affairs of great moment to communicate to the King, and deſired to come and talk with him in Perſon. This inſolent Requeſt being debated in Council, ſome were of opinion, the King ſhould comply with the Rebels. alledging, that as he was not in condition to oppoſe Force to Force, gentleneſs was the only way to gain them. But Simon Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and [Robert de] Hales Prior of St. John's, and High-Treaſurer of England, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, maintaining it was not ſafe for the King to truſt his Perſon with this Rabble. Accordingly the Rebels Requeſt was rejected with Threats, little agreeable to the preſent ſituation of the Court. Upon this News, the Seditious fell into ſuch a Fury, that immediately they marched towards London, and poſſeſſed themſelves of Southwark, parted from the City by the Thames. The Plunder of the Suburbs having given them no great Interruption, they endeavoured to enter the City. London-Bridge had then Gates, which being ſhut at their Approach, might have ſtopped for ſome time their Impetuoſity, if the Mob, who preſently ſided with them, had not opened them (5) in ſpite of the Magiſtrates. Nothing more oppoſing their March, they entered the City (6), where they committed all the Ravages that could be expected from ſo numerous a Body, guided ſolely by their Fury. T h Duke of Lancaſter's Palace (7) was reduced to Aſhes, and the Houſes of ſuch as they deemed their Enemies, were given up to be plundered. However, their Leaders pretending not to be ſwayed by Avarice, hindered their People from appropriating to themſelves any Part of the Booty. They even threw into the Fire, which conſumed all the plundered Riches, a Man that would have retained a Piece of Plate. In this univerſal Confuſion, wherein London was like a Town taken by Storm, the Archbiſhop's Palace, and the Temple with all the Writings kept there, were devoured by the Flames (8). The Houſes of the Judges, Lords and principal Citizens ſhared the ſame fate. This unruly Mob took care to accompliſh their Oath, to extirpate all Appearances of Grandeur or Diſtinction. The Flemings, againſt whom they were extremely incenſed, were above all others expoſed to their Fury. They dragged them from the Churches where they had taken Sanctuary, and upon their not being able to pronounce certain Words, very difficult for Foreigners, they were immediately maſſacred.

After the Rebels had thus given theſe firſt Marks of their Fury, they approached the Tower, which might have been eaſily defended (9), if the Terrour ſpread in the Garriſon had not cauſed them to open the Gates. There they found the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Treaſurer, who thought themſelves ſafe in that place, and without any Proceſs, cut off their heads. This done, they divided themſelves into three Bodies. Wat Tyler remained about the Tower with thirty thouſand Men. Jack Straw [another of their Captains] advanced into the City with the Rebels of Eſſex, to the number of ſixty thouſand. Mean time, the King and Council were in the utmoſt perplexity. Wat Tyler rejects them. The King ſends for him to meet him. Walſing.

But Wat Tyler was not ſo tractable, though he pretended his ſole Aim was to obtain equitable Terms. However as he appeared willing to enter into Negotiation with the King himſelf, Richard with a few Attendants came to Smith-field, from whence he ſent a Knight (1), to deſire him to come and confer with him. Wat inſolently replied, he would come when he thought proper. Nevertheleſs he moved forward immediately, at the head of his Troops, but ſo ſlowly that the King, beginning to be out of patience, and willing to preſs him to make more haſte, ſent the ſame Knight to him, which had like to have coſt him his Life. Wat Tyler was juſt entered Smith-field, when the Knight delivered the King's Meſſage, without alighting, not imagining he would ſtand upon that Ceremony. But the proud Leader was ſo offended at this want of Reſpect, that he was going to kill him, if the King, who was himſelf advancing, had not cried out to the Knight to diſmount.

In Wat Tyler's Conference with the King, being both on horſeback, he made ſuch extravagant Propoſals, that Richard knew not what to ſay to him. He demanded in ſhort, that all the antient Laws ſhould be aboliſhed, and the Government modelled according to certain fantaſtical Notions framed by himſelf (2). Whilſt he made theſe Demands, he now and then lifted up his Sword, as it were to threaten the King (3), in caſe he granted not immediately what the Rebels would have. This brutiſh Inſolence ſo raiſed the Indignation of [William] Walworth, Mayor of London, who attended the King, that without conſidering to what Danger he expoſed his Maſter, he diſcharged ſuch a Blow on the Rebel's head with his Sword, as laid him dead at his feet (4).

His Inſolence.

The Mayor of London kills him.

The King is in great Danger; Walſing.

This Action, no leſs imprudent than bold, ſhould naturally have occaſioned the Ruin of the King and all his Attendants, but by an unexpected happineſs, produced a contrary Effect. It is true, when the Rebels ſaw their Leader on the ground, they encouraged one another to revenge his Death. Nay their Bows were now bent to ſhoot at the King and his Retinue. But Richard prevented the Danger, by a bolder and more prudent Action than could be expected from a young Prince of fifteen Years. Inſtead of flying, he turned to the Rebels, and cried with a reſolute and couragious Voice: What, my Lieges! will you then kill your King? Be not concerned for the Loſs of your Leader, I my ſelf will now be your General; follow me into the Field, and you ſhall have whatever you deſire. Upon ſaying theſe Words, he gently turned his Horſe, and putting himſelf at their head, rode towards St. George's Fields. The young King's reſolution made ſuch an impreſſion on the minds of the Rebels, that imagining he really declared for them, they altered their firſt purpoſe, and followed him without delay. They were no ſooner come into the Fields, but they ſaw marching towards them a Troop of a thouſand armed Citizens, raiſed by the Mayor under the Conduct of Sir Robert Knolles, an Officer of great Reputation. This Sight ſtruck them with ſuch Terrour, that falſely imagining the whole City was in Arms to attack them, the foremoſt Ranks threw down their Arms and begged Quarter. This Proceeding terrifying the reſt who knew not the Cauſe, every one preſſed to follow their Example. Thus in a few Moments the whole multitude was diſperſed without the Effuſion of any Blood but the Leader's.

The Rebels are frighted and throw down their Arms. Knighton.

One cannot, without wonder, conſider an Event ſo ſingular and full of extraordinary Circumſtances. An Inſurrection indeed is not ſo very ſtrange, but to ſee it headed by ſuch a Perſon as Wat Tyler is not uſual, though the like inſtances may poſſibly be found in other Hiſtories. But it is doubtleſs beyond the common Courſe of Events, for a ſingle Man, as the Mayor of London, to dare to kill this Leader, attended by thirty thouſand Men. It is ſtill more ſurpriſing, that a young Prince, but fifteen Years old, ſhould have the preſence of Mind and Reſolution, ſhown by Richard on this occaſion, and that his Boldneſs ſhould produce ſo good an effect. In fine, that ſo numerous a Multitude, juſt glutted with Blood and Slaughter, ſhould diſperſe on a ſudden by a panick Fear, at the ſight of a few armed Citizens, is what cannot be conſidered without Aſtoniſhment, and without aſcribing the Cauſe to him, who holds the Hearts of the People in his hand. And indeed, we ſhall ſee preſently, that no leſs than a ſort of Miracle could prevent the utter Deſtruction of England, conſidering the pernicious Deſigns the Rebels had formed. 1381.

The like Inſurrections in other Counties. Knighton. Walſing.

It was not only in the Counties of Kent and Eſſex, that the ſpirit of Rebellion poſſeſſed the People. Whilſt Wat Tyler and Jack Straw were marching to London, John Ball and John Wraw (5), two ſeditious Prieſts, ſtirred up the Populace of Suffolk, where they quickly aſſembled fifty thouſand Men. They committed in thoſe Parts numberleſs Barbarities, as if they were afraid of being out-done in Cruelty, by thoſe who exerciſed their Fury in London. Sir John Cavendiſh, Chief Juſtice, fell a Sacrifice to their Rage. After that, they burnt all the antient Charters in the Abbey of St. Edmund's-Bury, and in the Univerſity of Cambridge.

Inſolence and Cruelty of Litteſter. Ibid.

On the other hand, Litteſter, an Ale-Houſe-Keeper (6) at Norwich, headed another Body of Rebels in the County of Norfolk, and cruelly put to death all the Judges and Lawyers that fell into his hands. As for the Lords and Gentlemen, he had the Inſolence to oblige them to ſerve him on the Knee, and if any one ſcrupled to ſubmit to that Indignity, immediately ordered his head to be cut off. In this manner he treated the Earl of Suffolk (7), who would not feign to approve of their Rebellion. As it was impoſſible for the King's Council, to take meaſures ſpeedy enough to remedy theſe Diſorders, it was neceſſary that private Perſons ſhould of themſelves uſe their Endeavours, without ſtaying for Orders from Court, to free themſelves from the impending Danger. Henry Spencer, Biſhop of Norwich, a Prelate of great Courage, though educated in an unwarlike Profeſſion, thought it his duty to do ſomething more than barely offer up Prayers, on ſo preſſing an occaſion, which equally threatned Clergy and Laity. He headed a few loyal Subjects, and attacking the Rebels made a terrible Slaughter (8). The two Leaders Wraw and Litteſter being taken in the Fight, the firſt was beheaded upon the ſpot, and the other ſent to London, to receive the juſt reward of his Crimes.

Puniſhment of the Rebels. Walſing.

Theſe Troubles being appeaſed ſooner, and more happily, than could be expected, the King, by advice of his Council, reſolved to chaſtize the Guilty. To that end, the Lords had Orders to raiſe in every County, Troops of known Loyalty, and lead them to London. In a ſhort time was drawn together an Army of forty thouſand Men, which being divided into two Bodies, one marched into the County of Kent. At the head of the other the King went himſelf, to puniſh the People of Eſſex, who began to ſtir again, upon the Revocation of the Charter and general Pardon, with which they had been allured (9). As theſe People had not had time to take juſt meaſures, and found themſelves prevented by the King's diligence, they were eaſily defeated. Great numbers were ſlain, and many others reſerved for publick Examples. Among the laſt, was Jack Straw, Companion of Wat Tyler, and head of the Eſſex Rebels. He confeſſed, if they had ſucceeded in their Projects, as they had reaſon to expect, their Deſign was to murder the King, root out the Nobility and Clergy, excepting the Mendicant Friers, part England into ſeveral Kingdoms, make Wat Tyler King of Kent, aboliſh all the antient, and make new Laws. Probably theſe Projects were framed only in general, and it may be, over their Bowls, whilſt they were on the March to London. Be that as it will, ſuch a Deſign, managed by Heads little capable of executing it, could hardly fail of ending in the Ruin of the Authors. It is affirmed, that beſides thoſe that fell with their Arms in their hands, above fifteen hundred died by the Hangman (10). Judge Treſilian was commiſſioned

As the number was very great, he had an opportunity to gratify his cruel and barbarous Temper, in punishing the unfortunate Wretches, to whom he showed no Favour. The Cruelties he exercised during his Commission, may well be compared to those practised of late Years by a Judge of the same Character (1), in the Reign of James II.

Barbarity of Judge Tresilian. Knighton.

There are Historians who would father this Rebellion upon the Wickliffites, (who were commonly called Lollards,) but without any foundation. It is certain, Religion had no share in these Commotions, since the Duke of Lancaster, open Protector of Wickliff, was the principal Object of the Rebels Malice. Besides, Wickliff, who then resided on his Living of Lutterworth [in Leicestershire,] was never questioned on that account. All that can be alledged to give the least colour to this Accusation, is, that John Ball, a Franciscan Frier, one of the Ring-Leaders of the Rebels, was a little before thrown into Prison, by Order of the Archbishop of Canterbury, for preaching the new Doctrine. But it cannot be inferred from thence, that Wickliff's Followers excited the Insurrection. Moreover, Insurrections caused by a religious Zeal, are seldom appeased in so short a time as this, which lasted but a Month, from the beginning to the end.

Vindication of the Wickliffites. Walsing.

The Duke of Lancaster is wrongfully accused. Walsing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 312. 318. Knighton.

The Duke of Lancaster was on the northern Borders, when the Rebellion broke out in Kent, which lies at the other end of the Kingdom. Upon the first News, he speedily concluded a three Years Truce (2), with the Scots, for fear these Commotions should render them more difficult. Mean while, as he was apprehensive of exposing himself to the Rage of his Enemies, if he returned to Court, and also of giving the Northern Counties a Pretence to imitate the Southern, if he staid in the Kingdom, he chose to retire into Scotland, where he remained till the Sedition was appeased. The King of Scotland offered him twenty thousand Men, to suppress the Rebels, but he refused them, lest by introducing Foreigners, he should cause a general Revolt in the Kingdom. Notwithstanding these Precautions, he could not prevent his Enemies from spreading a Report, that he designed to march to London, at the head of a Scotch Army, and seize the Crown. But he easily cleared himself from this groundless accusation.

The King's Marriage. Act. Pub. VII. p. 213, 257, 280, 282, 290, 305. Froissart. l. 2. c. 71.

Whilst, by this unexpected Insurrection, Richard saw himself in danger of losing his Crown and Life, his Ambassadors were negotiating his Marriage in Germany. From the Year 1379, he had been desirous of espousing the Daughter of Barnabas Duke of Milan. This Project not succeeding, he demanded in 1380, a Princess of Bavaria, Daughter of the late Emperor Lewis. But this Negotiation had no better Success than the former. At last on May 2. 1381, his Marriage with Ann of Luxemburgh, Sister of the Emperor Wenceslaus was concluded at Nurembergh. This Princess arriving in England (3) a little after the Troubles were appeased, was received with great Pomp, agreeably to the King's Humour, who was very fond of these sorts of Solemnities.

1382. Death of the Earl of March.

Edmund Earl of March, Grandson of Roger Mortimer beheaded in the beginning of the Reign of Edward III, died in February 1382, in his Government of Ireland. He had married Philippa only Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, and by her had a Son called Roger, who succeeded him in his Honour of Earl of March.

The Parliament which met about the end of the Year 1381 (4), and was prorogued on account of the Queen's Arrival, sat again in May the next Year (5). Some Historians affirm, in this Parliament an Act was passed impowering the Bishops to imprison Hereticks, without the King's License (6). But others, upon better grounds, maintain, the Commons refused to pass the Bill, and that the Bishops obtained that Power of the King alone. This last Opinion is confirmed by the Complaints made afterwards by the Commons to the King, as of a Breach of Privilege. Be that as it will, it is certain, before that time the Bishops had no such Power, without the King's express Consent, for every particular case. Of this there are Proofs in the Collection of the Publick Acts, where we find the like Permissions granted by Edward III, to the Bishop of London and others. It is evident, these Permissions would have been needless, had the Bishops enjoyed this Privilege without the King's Consent. Besides, in a Commission of the same Nature directed by Richard II, to the University of Oxford, extant also in the Collection, there is no mention of any Statute upon that Subject, though it was a constant Custom when the King acted by virtue of an Act of Parliament, to mention it in his Letters Patent or Orders. Of this we may be easily satisfied in the same Collection.

Richard's Character.

Richard being now in his seventeenth Year, began more plainly to discover his Inclinations, which hitherto had been restrained by the Authority of his Governours. He had a high conceit of his own merit, and thought himself as well qualified to govern the State as Edward III, was at his Age. But there was a great Difference between these two Princes. Edward, when very young, with a great Penetration, had none but noble and generous Inclinations, tending to his own Glory, and his People's Happiness. Richard on the contrary, minded only Trifles, and thought of nothing but his Pleasures. He loved Pomp and Magnificence more than any of his Predecessors, and thereby ran into superfluous Expences, which idly consumed his Revenues. Flatterers had a great sway over him. He expressed as great Affection for those that applauded his Passions, as Aversion for such as advised him to lead a Life worthy a great Prince. Not being of a warlike Disposition, he was observed in Council, to be always inclined to Negotiation, rather than to vigorous Resolutions. As soon as he was out of his Childhood, he was seen to chuse Favorites, whose Inclinations suited with his own, or at least who artfully feigned to approve of whatever he did. Among these was, Alexander Nevil Archbishop of York, Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, a young Man full of Vivacity, whose youthful Sallies were very pleasing to his Master, Michael de la Pole, a Merchant's Son of London (7), and Judge Tresilian, who never wanted Reasons to countenance whatever was agreeable to the King. These Favorites, who missed no opportunity to flatter him, were amply rewarded for the least petty Services, whilst those who managed the publick Affairs, and took all the Pains, were very little regarded. This Behaviour began to be displeasing to the People, when an Accident, towards the end of this Year, quite put them out of Conceit with their Sovereign. One of the forementioned Courtiers, obtaining of the King a considerable Grant, Richard Scrope the Chancellor, refused to annex the Great-Seal to the Patent. He even plainly told the Person that sollicited him, that the Duty of his Office would not suffer him to set the Seal, committed to his keeping by the Parliament, to all the King's indiscreet Grants, till he had acquired a little more Experience. Richard provoked at this Refusal, sent for the Great Seal, but he refused to deliver it, as holding it not of the King, but the Parliament. This Resolution still farther incensing the young Prince, he went himself to the Chancellor's to require his Obedience. Whereupon the Chancellor delivered him the Seal, declaring he would serve him no more in any publick Post, but content himself with keeping in all other things the Allegiance due from a Subject to his Sovereign. Richard kept the Great Seal some days in his hands, and for fear another Chancellor should obstruct in like manner his inconsiderate Grants, he put the Seal himself to several Patents; and then delivered it to Robert Braybrook Bishop of London, who probably was not so scrupulous as his Predecessor. This Action, extolled by the Favorites with great Commendations of the King's Steddiness, displeased the rest of the Nation. The King began from thenceforward to be

The Biſhops Power of impriſoning Hereticks revoked. Cotton's Abridg.

For that purpoſe, in the next meeting of the Parliament (1), the Houſe of Commons reſolved to remedy this Inconvenience, ariſing from the too great Authority the King began to aſſume. The Power given to the Biſhops to impriſon Hereticks, was conſidered as very deſtructive to Liberty, ſince the Clergy thereby became in a manner abſolute Maſters of the Honour and Fortune of private Perſons. The Complaints from all parts, obliged the Commons to preſent a Petition to the King, to revoke a Conceſſion to which they had not given their Conſent (2), Richard who wanted Money, durſt not reject the Parliament's Requeſt. But ſome pretend, that by the Artifices of the Clergy, this Revocation was razed out of the Parliament Rolls, where it is not to be found.

Urban VI publiſhes a Cruſade againſt Clement VII. Froiſſart, l. 2. c. 108, &c.

The Schiſm ſtill continued in the Church, to the great Scandal of the Chriſtians, who were in doubt which of the two Popes was to be regarded as Chriſt's Vicar. Urban, whoſe Party was ſtrongeſt, perceiving Spiritual Weapons were inſufficient, thought it more advantagious to uſe Temporal Arms. To that end, he publiſhed againſt Clement and his Adherents a Cruſade, of which Henry Spencer Biſhop of Norwich was declared General. The Pope by this Bull granted the ſame Indulgences (3), to all that were willing to engage in this Undertaking, as to thoſe who bore Arms againſt the Infidels. The Effect produced in England, by the publication of the Cruſade, anſwered the Pope's Wiſhes. The Nobles, Gentry, People, and Clergy, ingaged in it with the ſame ardour as if they had been to wage War with the Enemies of the Chriſtian Name. Whilſt they waited for the Parliament's Approbation, which was not at all queſtioned, every one was diligently preparing to obtain the promiſed Indulgences, either by ſerving in Perſon in the War, or by contributing money for promoting the ſame.

Whilſt the Croiſés were making their preparations, the Earl of Cambridge returned from Portugal, where he had met with the ſame Treatment the Earl of Buckingham his Brother had done in Bretagne. That is, the King of Portugal uſed the Engliſh Succours, to make an advantagious Peace with the King of Caſtile, to whom he even gave Beatrix his only Daughter, promiſed to the Earl of Cambridge's eldeſt Son. So the Engliſh Prince returned extremely diſſatisfied, after loſing all hopes of procuring his Son the Crown of Portugal, and helping to place the Duke of Lancaſter his Brother on the Throne of Caſtile (4).

1383. Succeſs of the Cruſade. Id. c. 110.

The Parliament, which met in the beginning of the Year 1383 (5), not only approved of the Cruſade publiſhed by Urban, but alſo granted a conſiderable Subſidy upon that account. When every thing was ready, the Biſhop of Norwich imbarked the Croiſés, conſiſting of fifty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe. Upon his Arrival at Calais (6) he held a Council of War, to conſider which way he ſhould turn the Arms of the Croiſés. Moſt were for entering France, ſince the Bull imported, that the Cruſade was deſigned againſt Clement and his Adherents. Probably, for this reaſon, the Court of England had engaged ſo heartily in the Affair. But the General, for private reaſons not diſcovered in Hiſtory, cauſed it to be reſolved, that the War ſhould be carried into Flanders. To colour this Reſolution, it was alledged, that Flanders was a Fief of the Crown of France, though the Earl of Flanders had acknowledged Pope Urban. 1384. But when he was to be brought before the Council, he was found to be hanged over-night in the Priſon, without any poſſibility of diſcovering the Author of this outrage. Walſing. This Accident did the Duke of Lancaſter great Injury, becauſe People were prejudiced againſt him, though it was as probable, that the Monk was murdered by the Authors of the Accuſation, as by the orders of the Party accuſed.

He is further ſuſpected. Another Accident, ſhortly after, confirmed the People in the ſuſpicion raiſed by the Monk's Report againſt the Duke of Lancaſter. An Alderman of London, a great Favorite of the Duke, being charged with conſpiring againſt the King, was found guilty, after a ſtrict Examination. Though the Duke was then abſent, his cloſe Friendſhip with the Criminal, and the Endeavours of his Friends to prevent the Sentence, and afterwards to procure the King's Pardon, occaſioned Reflections not at all to the Duke's advantage. He was then upon an Embaſſy at Paris, where he ſpent fifty thouſand Marks, in obtaining only the Prolongation of the Truce for ſome Months.

If the Duke of Lancaſter was not beloved by the People, he was no leſs hated by the Favorites, who could not hope to diſpoſe of all things at their pleaſure, as long as he was in Credit with the King. It is well known, the way of moſt Favorites is, not to ſuffer about their Maſter, any but their Creatures. Theſe looking upon the Duke of Lancaſter as a troubleſome Inſpector, and incapable of condeſcending to court them, believed they ought before all things to be rid of that Prince. For that purpoſe, they all acted in concert, to create in the King Suſpicions, which ſhould cauſe him to conſider this Uncle, as a very dangerous Enemy. Richard, who neither did, nor would, ſee any thing but with their Eyes, ſuffered himſelf to be ſo prejudiced, that he conſented to a Reſolution of accuſing the Duke of High-Treaſon. Judge Treſilian, a Man of a cruel and daring Temper, took upon him to draw up the Articles of Accuſation, and manage the Evidences. He even offered to try him as a private Perſon, though by the Laws of the Land he could be judged only by his Peers. As this Plot could not be ſo ſecretly contrived, that the Duke ſhould have no notice thereof, he thought it imprudent to deliver himſelf into the hands of his Enemies, who were bent upon his Ruin. So, without troubling himſelf about his Vindication, he withdrew to his Caſtle of Pontfract, where he aſſembled ſome Troops, and made other Preparations in order to defend himſelf, in caſe of attack. Though he had not many Friends, yet being perſecuted by the Miniſters, who were ſtill leſs beloved than himſelf, he eaſily found People enough to take his Part. A Civil War was juſt going to be kindled in the Kingdom, when the Princeſs of Wales, the King's Mother, interpoſed to make Peace, before Hoſtilities were commenced. She ſucceeded at length, after many Journeys and Fatigues, and Richard, ſatisfied of the falſeneſs of the Suſpicions, ſuggeſted to him againſt the Duke his Uncle, received him again into favour (1).

The Duke prepares to defend himſelf.

The Princeſs of Wales reconciles him to the King. Walſing.

1385. During theſe Broils, no Preparations were made for the War, though the late Truce with France and Scotland was about to expire. It was imagined, it might be renewed; but the King of France had other Deſigns. As he ſaw the Court of England in a perfect Security, he reſolved to improve it, by making a powerful Effort, from which he promiſed himſelf great Advantages. To that end, he ſent a numerous Army into Guienne, hoping to finiſh the Conqueſt of that Dukedom, before the Engliſh ſhould be able to oppoſe it. At the ſame time he ſent the King of Scotland an Aid of a thouſand Men at Arms (2), under the Command of John de Vienne, who was to make a powerful Diverſion in the North (3), in order to favour the Deſcent of the French in the ſouthern Parts of the Iſland. The Alarm taken by the Engliſh at all theſe Preparations, turned to their Safety. The Court gave ſuch preſſing Orders to levy Troops, and the Orders were executed with ſuch ardour and diligence, that, if the Hiſtorians are to be credited, Richard quickly ſaw himſelf at the head of three hundred thouſand Men. He detached ſixty thouſand, under the Command of the Duke of Lancaſter, to march into Scotland (4), whilſt with the reſt, he himſelf expected the French on the ſouthern Coaſt. Upon the Duke of Lancaſter's Approach, the Scots, who were now ravaging the Borders of England, retired to the Center of their Kingdom, leaving the Engliſh General free to revenge his Countrymen, by his ravages in Scotland, where he had followed them. The great Army aſſembled by Richard, deſtroying the King of France's hopes of ſucceeding in his Project, he deferred the Execution to a more convenient Seaſon. By that means Richard was at liberty to march towards Scotland (5), with the Choice of his Army. In all likelihood, he would have entirely ſubdued that Kingdom, had he known how to improve his Advantages, ſince the King of Scotland was unable to withſtand him. But the Favorites Jealouſy of the Duke of Lancaſter, who commanded under him, was the reaſon, ſo fair an opportunity was irrecoverably loſt. The Scots, perceiving the King of England, inſtead of puſhing them vigorouſly, was amuſing himſelf with ravaging the Country about Edinburgh, began to recover from their Fright, cauſed by his formidable Forces. As they were not able to attack him, they judged the beſt way to oblige him to quit Scotland, was to make a Diverſion in his own Country. Purſuant to this Reſolution, they removed at a greater diſtance from the Engliſh Army, to make the King believe it was to avoid a Battle. But on a ſudden, by ſpeedy Marches they came into Cumberland, where they made terrible Ravages (6). Whilſt they were marching thither, Richard never troubled himſelf to inquire after them. So, imagining they were fled, and ſatisfied with the Advantages already gained, he reſolved, as not being fond of War, to return into England. He had Intelligence by the way, of the Scots entering Cumberland, and might eaſily have cut off their Retreat. But notwithſtanding all the Duke of Lancaſter's Endeavours to perſuade him to a vigorous Reſolution, he choſe rather to follow the Earl of Oxford's Advice. This Favorite, who had a great Influence over him, perſuaded him, that the Duke of Lancaſter only ſought to expoſe him to danger. This Advice correſponding with his Suſpicions and Inclinations, he continued his march, without going in queſt of the Enemy. All but the Favorites, were ſo amazed at his unconcern for the Calamities of his Subjects of Cumberland, that they could not help loudly murmuring, and conſidering the King himſelf, as a Prince regardleſs of the good of the Publick.

In vain did the Princeſs of Wales, their common Mother, intercede for her Son, ſhe could never obtain his Pardon. This refuſal ſat ſo heavy upon her Mind, that ſhe died with Grief a few days after (9). The Biſhops Power of impriſoning Hereticks revoked. Cotton's Abridg.

For that purpoſe, in the next meeting of the Parliament (1), the Houſe of Commons reſolved to remedy this Inconvenience, ariſing from the too great Authority the King began to aſſume. The Power given to the Biſhops to impriſon Hereticks, was conſidered as very deſtructive to Liberty, ſince the Clergy thereby became in a manner abſolute Maſters of the Honour and Fortune of private Perſons. The Complaints from all parts, obliged the Commons to preſent a Petition to the King, to revoke a Conceſſion to which they had not given their Conſent (2), Richard who wanted Money, durſt not reject the Parliament's Requeſt. Urban VI publiſhes a Cruſade againſt Clement VII. Froiſſart, l. 2. c. 108, &c.

The Schiſm ſtill continued in the Church, to the great Scandal of the Chriſtians, who were in doubt which of the two Popes was to be regarded as Chriſt's Vicar. Urban, whoſe Party was ſtrongeſt, perceiving Spiritual Weapons were inſufficient, thought it more advantagious to uſe Temporal Arms. To that end, he publiſhed againſt Clement and his Adherents a Cruſade, of which Henry Spencer Biſhop of Norwich was declared General. The Pope by this Bull granted the ſame Indulgences (3), to all that were willing to engage in this Undertaking, as to thoſe who bore Arms againſt the Infidels. The Effect produced in England, by the publication of the Cruſade, anſwered the Pope's Wiſhes. The Nobles, Gentry, People, and Clergy, ingaged in it with the ſame ardour as if they had been to wage War with the Enemies of the Chriſtian Name. Whilſt they waited for the Parliament's Approbation, which was not at all queſtioned, every one was diligently preparing to obtain the promiſed Indulgences, either by ſerving in Perſon in the War, or by contributing money for promoting the ſame.

That is, the King of Portugal uſed the Engliſh Succours, to make an advantagious Peace with the King of Caſtile, to whom he even gave Beatrix his only Daughter, promiſed to the Earl of Cambridge's eldeſt Son. So the Engliſh Prince returned extremely diſſatisfied, after loſing all hopes of procuring his Son the Crown of Portugal, and helping to place the Duke of Lancaſter his Brother on the Throne of Caſtile (4).

The Parliament, which met in the beginning of the Year 1383 (5), not only approved of the Cruſade publiſhed by Urban, but alſo granted a conſiderable Subſidy upon that account. When every thing was ready, the Biſhop of Norwich imbarked the Croiſés, conſiſting of fifty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe. But 1384. But when he was to be brought before the Council, he was found to be hanged over-night in the Priſon, without any poſſibility of diſcovering the Author of this outrage. This Accident did the Duke of Lancaſter great Injury, becauſe People were prejudiced againſt him, though it was as probable, that the Monk was murdered by the Authors of the Accuſation, as by the orders of the Party accuſed.

Walſing.

He is further ſuſpected.

Another Accident, ſhortly after, confirmed the People in the ſuſpicion raiſed by the Monk's Report againſt the Duke of Lancaſter. An Alderman of London, a great Favorite of the Duke, being charged with conſpiring againſt the King, was found guilty, after a ſtrict Examination. Though the Duke was then abſent, his cloſe Friendſhip with the Criminal, and the Endeavours of his Friends to prevent the Sentence, and afterwards to procure the King's Pardon, occaſioned Reflections not at all to the Duke's advantage. He was then upon an Embaſſy at Paris, where he ſpent fifty thouſand Marks, in obtaining only the Prolongation of the Truce for ſome Months.

The Truce with France prolonged. Act. Pub. VII. p. 430, 438.

If the Duke of Lancaſter was not beloved by the People, he was no leſs hated by the Favorites, who could not hope to diſpoſe of all things at their pleaſure, as long as he was in Credit with the King. It is well known, the way of moſt Favorites is, not to ſuffer about their Maſter, any but their Creatures. Theſe looking upon the Duke of Lancaſter as a troubleſome Inſpector, and incapable of condeſcending to court them, believed they ought before all things to be rid of that Prince. For that purpoſe, they all acted in concert, to create in the King Suſpicions, which ſhould cauſe him to conſider this Uncle, as a very dangerous Enemy. Richard, who neither did, nor would, ſee any thing but with their Eyes, ſuffered himſelf to be ſo prejudiced, that he conſented to a Reſolution of accuſing the Duke of High-Treaſon. Judge Treſilian, a Man of a cruel and daring Temper, took upon him to draw up the Articles of Accuſation, and manage the Evidences. He even offered to try him as a private Perſon, though by the Laws of the Land he could be judged only by his Peers. As this Plot could not be ſo ſecretly contrived, that the Duke ſhould have no notice thereof, he thought it imprudent to deliver himſelf into the hands of his Enemies, who were bent upon his Ruin. So, without troubling himſelf about his Vindication, he withdrew to his Caſtle of Pontfract, where he aſſembled ſome Troops, and made other Preparations in order to defend himſelf, in caſe of attack. Though he had not many Friends, yet being perſecuted by the Miniſters, who were ſtill leſs beloved than himſelf, he eaſily found People enough to take his Part. A Civil War was juſt going to be kindled in the Kingdom, when the Princeſs of Wales, the King's Mother, interpoſed to make Peace, before Hoſtilities were commenced. She ſucceeded at length, after many Journeys and Fatigues, and Richard, ſatisfied of the falſeneſs of the Suſpicions, ſuggeſted to him againſt the Duke his Uncle, received him again into favour (1).

1385. During theſe Broils, no Preparations were made for the War, though the late Truce with France and Scotland was about to expire. It was imagined, it might be renewed; but the King of France had other Deſigns. As he ſaw the Court of England in a perfect Security, he reſolved to improve it, by making a powerful Effort, from which he promiſed himſelf great Advantages. To that end, he ſent a numerous Army into Guienne, hoping to finiſh the Conqueſt of that Dukedom, before the Engliſh ſhould be able to oppoſe it. At the ſame time he ſent the King of Scotland an Aid of a thouſand Men at Arms (2), under the Command of John de Vienne, who was to make a powerful Diverſion in the North (3), in order to favour the Deſcent of the French in the ſouthern Parts of the Iſland. The Alarm taken by the Engliſh at all theſe Preparations, turned to their Safety. The Court gave ſuch preſſing Orders to levy Troops, and the Orders were executed with ſuch ardour and diligence, that, if the Hiſtorians are to be credited, Richard quickly ſaw himſelf at the head of three hundred thouſand Men. He detached ſixty thouſand, under the Command of the Duke of Lancaſter, to march into Scotland (4), whilſt with the reſt, he himſelf expected the French on the ſouthern Coaſt. Upon the Duke of Lancaſter's Approach, the Scots, who were now ravaging the Borders of England, retired to the Center of their Kingdom, leaving the Engliſh General free to revenge his Countrymen, by his ravages in Scotland, where he had followed them. The great Army aſſembled by Richard, deſtroying the King of France's hopes of ſucceeding in his Project, he deferred the Execution to a more convenient Seaſon. By that means Richard was at liberty to march towards Scotland (5), with the Choice of his Army. In all likelihood, he would have entirely ſubdued that Kingdom, had he known how to improve his Advantages, ſince the King of Scotland was unable to withſtand him. But the Favorites Jealouſy of the Duke of Lancaſter, who commanded under him, was the reaſon, ſo fair an opportunity was irrecoverably loſt. The Scots, perceiving the King of England, inſtead of puſhing them vigorouſly, was amuſing himſelf with ravaging the Country about Edinburgh, began to recover from their Fright, cauſed by his formidable Forces. As they were not able to attack him, they judged the beſt way to oblige him to quit Scotland, was to make a Diverſion in his own Country. Purſuant to this Reſolution, they removed at a greater diſtance from the Engliſh Army, to make the King believe it was to avoid a Battle. But on a ſudden, by ſpeedy Marches they came into Cumberland, where they made terrible Ravages (6). Whilſt they were marching thither, Richard never troubled himſelf to inquire after them. So, imagining they were fled, and ſatisfied with the Advantages already gained, he reſolved, as not being fond of War, to return into England. He had Intelligence by the way, of the Scots entering Cumberland, and might eaſily have cut off their Retreat. But notwithſtanding all the Duke of Lancaſter's Endeavours to perſuade him to a vigorous Reſolution, he choſe rather to follow the Earl of Oxford's Advice. This Favorite, who had a great Influence over him, perſuaded him, that the Duke of Lancaſter only ſought to expoſe him to danger. This Advice correſponding with his Suſpicions and Inclinations, he continued his march, without going in queſt of the Enemy. All but the Favorites, were ſo amazed at his unconcern for the Calamities of his Subjects of Cumberland, that they could not help loudly murmuring, and conſidering the King himſelf, as a Prince regardleſs of the good of the Publick.

The Action was ſo heinous, that notwithſtanding the Ties of Blood, Richard reſolved to abandon the Murderer to the rigour of the Law. In vain did the Princeſs of Wales, their common Mother, intercede for her Son, ſhe could never obtain his Pardon. This refuſal ſat ſo heavy upon her Mind, that ſhe died with Grief a few days after (9). new King of Portugal finding his Enemy was about to receive Aid from the King of France, sent Ambassadors to England, to make an Alliance with Richard, offering to acknowledge the Duke of Lancaster for King of Castile, and support his Right with all his Forces. Affairs in England were then in a posture, very proper to render the Negotiation of the Portuguese Ambassadors successful. Richard, prejudiced against the Duke his Uncle, heartily wished his removal; his Favorites representing him as a dangerous Relation, and a very troublesome Governor. They told him moreover, it was his Interest to dethrone the King of Castile, sworn Enemy of the English, which was the more practicable, as the King of Portugal offered to make a powerful Diversion. The Duke of Lancaster hastened with all possible ardour, the Conclusion of this Affair, imagining, with the Forces of England, and Assistance of Portugal, it would not be impossible to succeed in his Designs. All these Considerations induced the King's Council, to give a favorable hearing to the King of Portugal's Proposals, and to promise the Duke of Lancaster an Aid proportionable to the Importance of the Undertaking. Pursuant to this Resolution, the King called a Parliament (1) to demand a Subsidy to enable him to accomplish this Project. The Commons readily granted it, and expressed great earnestness for the Expedition, not so much out of love to the Duke, as to remove him out of the Kingdom, where it was continually feared he would at last occasion Troubles fatal to the State. For that reason, they had this Affair so much at heart, that the Clergy refusing to pay their part of the Subsidy (2), they petitioned the King to seize their Temporalities. Richard, who loved not his Uncle enough to quarrel with the Clergy for his sake, refused to comply with the Commons Request. His Moderation procured him from the Clergy, what Force would hardly ever have extorted from them. Thus the Duke of Lancaster, secure of the Parliament's Assistance, made, as King of Castile, a League offensive and defensive with the King of Portugal, and prepared for the War with all possible diligence.

He could not help raising these two Princes to higher Degrees of Honour, unless he would leave them below the Earl of Oxford (6), whom he created at the same time Marquis of Dublin, and quickly after, Duke of Ireland. But if he succeeded not in his Project, at least he obtained from Richard a considerable Present, and a yearly Pension of a thousand Pounds (8). 1386.

As soon as the Duke of Lancaster had finished his Preparations for his Spanish Expedition, he embarked at Portsmouth (9), with an Army of twenty thousand Men, among whom were two thousand Men at Arms (10). He carried with him Constantia of Castile, his Wife, and his two Daughters Philippa and Catherina, the first of whom he had by Blanch of Lancaster, and the other by Constantia. The King and Queen accompanied them to Portsmouth, and wishing them good Success, presented them with two Gold Crowns. The Duke setting Sail, made some stay at Brest, and obliged the Duke of Bretagne to raise the Siege of that Town, which all his Sollicitations had not been able to get out of the hands of the English. Then pursuing his Voyage, he arrived August the 9th at Corunna, where he landed his Troops. Upon his Arrival, he made himself master of several Places in Gallicia, and at last of Compostella, where he passed the Winter. Whilst the Season prevented him from continuing his Progress, he concluded a Marriage between Philippa his eldest Daughter and the King of Portugal, and spent the rest of the Time in projecting the next Campain. Great Preparations in France to conquer England. Walsing. Froissart. l. 2. c. 178.

The Duke of Lancaster's departure, which had long before made a great Noise, prompted the Court of France to improve so favorable a conjuncture As England, deprived of her best Troops, would be probably defenceless, Charles resolved to make a fresh Effort to conquer that Kingdom. To that end, he made such prodigious Preparations, that all Europe expected with Astonishment the success of this Undertaking. He had prepared nine hundred Transport-Ships (11), and caused a wooden Fort to be made, (which could be taken in Pieces,) for the Defence of his Army after landing. If the Duke of Berry his Uncle, who wanted to render the Project abortive, because, says a Historian, he was not the Author, had not too long delayed his coming, the French would have found England unprovided with Troops for her defence. But the Duke not repairing to Sluice till the 14th of September (12), Richard had time so to prepare, as to have no reason to fear the mighty Efforts of his Enemies. Very likely, the great diligence of the English, rather than the Season, which was not too far advanced for so short a Passage, obliged the King of France to send his Troops into Winter Quarters. Richard raises a great Army. Walsing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 507, 539, 545.

As soon as the grand Designs of France were known in England, Troops were levied with that speed and success, that an Army of two hundred thousand Men were drawn together (13). Part of these Forces were put into the Places most exposed, whilst the rest stood ready to hinder the Enemies landing. But as this Army was to be maintained, as well as raised, which could not be done without a very great Expence, a Parliament was called to consider of Ways and Means (14.) The King demanding a Subsidy, proportionable to his Wants (15), the Parliament was very willing to grant it, but could not think of leaving the Money in the Power of the King and his Favorites, among whom the Marquis of Dublin, and the Earl of Suffolk, held the first Rank. These Lords were so universally and excessively odious, that in order to ruin them the Parliament scrupled not to hazard the loss of the whole Kingdom. They presented an Address to the King, desiring that the Treasurer (16), and the Earl of Suffolk the Chancellor, might be removed from their Places. Moreover that all those might be called to an Account, through whose hands the publick Money had passed, affirming, the King would find in the Con- He demands Money of the Parliament; Cotton's Abridg. fiscation 1386. fiscation of the Mismanagers Estates, wherewithal to answer the occasions of the State. Richard, who expected quite another thing, in the present Juncture of Affairs, received the Address with an Indignation, which it was not possible for him to conceal. He answered very sharply, that the Parliament ought to mind the Business for which they were called, and not meddle with what belonged not to them. He rashly added, that, To please the Parliament, he would not turn out the meanest Scullion in his Kitchen. At the same time he withdrew to Eltham, not staying for a Reply.

The King's rash Answer. Knighton.

Though the King could not doubt, but so offensive an Answer would extremely incense the Commons, he sent, a few days after, the Chancellor himself to order them, in an imperious manner, to grant the desired Subsidy. This Order, hitherto unusual in Affairs of this nature, was received with so great a Concern, that the two Houses uniting upon this occasion, as having one and the same Interest, sent the King word that they would proceed to no Business till he returned to his Parliament, and his Ministers were punished according to their Deserts. This Reply provoking the King to the highest degree, he commanded the two Houses to send to him forty of their Members, to give an account of their Proceedings. But the Parliament was so far from complying, that they would have come to an open Rupture, if the most prudent had not prevailed with them, though with great difficulty, to send to the King the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, and the Bishop of Ely (1). These two Lords being come to Eltham, told the King in the Name of the two Houses, that as the Sovereign had Power to assemble them, they had likewise a Right to require his Presence in his Parliament. They added, it was enacted by an old Statute, That in case the King absented himself forty days from his Parliament, without lawful cause, the Members might return to their Homes; which they were resolved to do, if the King persisted to deprive them of the Honour of his Presence. To this vigorous Declaration Richard replied in a great Passion, and with no less Imprudence, That he plainly saw his Subjects were resolved to rebel against him, and therefore he had nothing more to do, than to desire the Assistance of the King of France, to reduce them to their Duty. The Lords made Answer, the King of France was the most mortal Enemy of the English Nation, as appeared in his present Endeavours to destroy them; therefore the King's desperate Resolution could not but proceed from the pernicious Advice of his evil Counsellors, who sought only to set him at variance with his faithful Subjects. Upon these Words they withdrew, saying, their Orders were only to intreat him to return to his Parliament, whose sole View was his and the Kingdom's Welfare.

Disputes between the King and Parliament. Knighton. Col. 2681.

The Deputies being retired, Richard came to more moderate Resolutions. Probably, the Ministers and Favorites were afraid of the Consequences which might attend a Rupture with the Parliament. In this disposition, he repaired to the Parliament, and with a good grace granted whatever they had required. The Chancellor was not only removed from his Office (2), but summoned to appear and give an account of his Administration, wherein he was notoriously guilty of many Misdemeanors (3). As for the Marquis of Dublin, lately made Duke of Ireland, he was sent thither with a Pension of three thousand Marks (4), his whole Estate being confiscated by order of Parliament. This done, the two Houses appointed fourteen (5) Commissioners to take care of the Publick Affairs jointly with the King. The Duke of Gloucester and the Earl of Arundel, were authorized to examine the Publick Accounts, and how the King's Revenues had been disposed of. A few days after, the Chancellor being found guilty of Mismanagement, was compelled to restore all the Grants he had received of the King (6). The French Fleet lost by a Storm. Walsing.

Among the last were found some laden with Plank for building the Fort abovementioned.

The Parliament breaking up as soon as the fear of the Invasion was passed (8), the King quickly gave Proofs of his Levity, by recalling to Court the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and the Archbishop of York. He even affected to caress them more than before their Disgrace, and load them with fresh Favors. The Favorites resumed their former Post with Hearts full of Revenge, especially against the two Commissioners of the publick Accounts, who by a strict Examination of their Conduct, had occasioned their Condemnation. It was not difficult to persuade the young King, they had suffered for his sake, and that the designs of their Enemies aimed not so much at the Ministers, as at the King himself. They represented to him, "That accusing the Coun-" sellors, is a clear Evidence that the Sovereign is " thought incapable of governing, and that the readiest " way to discredit a Prince, is to persuade his Subjects, " he makes use of ill Ministers." These Insinuations frequently repeated, made so strong an impression on the King's Mind, that he resolved to free himself from the Subjection of the Parliament. But the Favorites intimated to him, it would be a very difficult thing to execute, so long as the Duke of Gloucester was at the head of the Factious. By this means they led him to consent to all their Plots for his Uncle's Destruction. When they were sure of the King's Approbation, they concerted the means to compass their Ends. They found no better way than to poison (9) the Duke, and some other of their principal Enemies, at a Feast to which they were invited by the City of London. But as they durst not execute this Plot, without securing the Mayor (10), he gave the Duke of Gloucester notice of it, who came not to the Feast.

The Favorites stir up the King against their Enemies.

Had it been as easy for the Favorites to destroy their private Enemies, as it was to draw upon them the King's Hatred, there would scarce have been left in the Kingdom a Lord capable of giving them any umbrage. But in a Government like that of England, particularly during a Minority, it is no easy thing for the King and his Ministry to do whatever they please. The Favorites then, in their continual Fears of being themselves prevented, were obliged to recur to secret ways to ruin their Enemies. Mean while they continued to prejudice the King against his best Subjects, till being of Age he might act with a more absolute Authority. The Earls of Arundel (11) and Nottingham (12), Admirals of England, putting to Sea in the beginning of the Spring (13), took a Fleet of French, Spanish and Flemish Merchant-Men, and brought some of them to England (14), laden with Wine. After that they sailed to Bretagne and relieved Brest, besieged by the Duke. This Service which deserved some Return from the King, only made them incur his Indignation. When they came from their Expedition, he would not vouchsafe even to speak to them; so much was he prejudiced against them by his Ministers. It was intimated to him that the taking of these Ships would not fail of bringing Troubles upon him, which would very

The Duke of Ireland diworces his Wife, Couſin to the King. Walſing.

Thus did the Favorites ſtir up their Maſter againſt the principal Lords, in hopes of reaping the Fruit of their Artifices, when the King ſhould be of Age, of which he wanted but little. But an Accident which happened ſoon after, made them haſten the Execution of their Projects. The Duke of Ireland preſuming upon his Influence over the King, had the Inſolence to divorce his Wife (1), Daughter of the Lord Coucy, and Grand-Daughter of Edward III, in order to marry Lancerona, Maid of Honour to the Queen, a Bohemian of mean Birth (2). Though this Divorce was very injurious to the Royal Family, Richard ſhewed not the leaſt Concern. But it was not the ſame with the Duke of Gloceſter, who highly reſented the Affront, and declared he would revenge it the firſt opportunity. This Threat made the Duke of Ireland reſolve to prevent him. To that end, after concerting the means with the King, he feigned to go into Ireland, and took the Road to Wales where the King was pleaſed to accompany him. But this pretended Voyage was only to conſult more privately how to execute their Project of aſſuming an arbitrary Power, of which the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, Nottingham (3), were to feel the Effects. The Reſult of this Conſultation was, that the King ſhould raiſe an Army to terrify theſe Lords, and then call a Parliament, the Election whereof ſhould be ſo managed, that the Members ſhould be all at his devotion; and that he ſhould cauſe to be paſſed all ſuch Acts as were neceſſary to ſecure him an unlimited Power.

Richard communicates his Deſign to the Sheriffs, Walſing.

As ſoon as the Plot was contrived, they went to Nottingham, where the King ſent for all the Sheriffs, ſome of the principal Citizens of London, and all the Judges. When they were met, he communicated to them his Deſign of raiſing an Army to chaſtiſe ſuch Lords, as he named to them, among whom was the Duke of Gloceſter, and demanded of the Sheriffs what number of Troops each could furniſh him with. Then he told them, he intended to call a Parliament, and ordered them to let no Repreſentative be choſen, but what was in the Liſt he ſhould give them himſelf (4). The Sheriffs made anſwer, it was not in their Power to execute his Orders. That the People were ſo well inclined to the Lords he had mentioned, that there was no proſpect of levying an Army againſt them: That it was ſtill more difficult to deprive the People of their Right of freely electing their Repreſentatives in Parliament. But the Judges (5) were not ſo ſcrupulous in what related to them. The King asked them, whether he had not Power to turn out the fourteen Commiſſioners appointed by Parliament, and annul ſuch Acts as were prejudicial to him? They replied, The King was above the Laws (6). Nevertheleſs, when they were required to ſubſcribe their Opinion, ſome endeavoured to be excuſed, but were compelled to it by the Menaces of the Favorites. It is affirmed, one of the Judges (7) ſaid aloud after ſigning, That never did Action better deſerve hanging than that he had juſt done. The Opinion of the Judges being thus extorted, Richard thought he had ſurmounted all Difficulties. He immediately iſſued out Commiſſions to levy an Army; but found ſo few willing to ſerve him, that he was forced to deſiſt from his Project. Enraged at this diſappointment, he returned to London, after a fruitleſs Declaration of his Deſigns, which rendered him more odious to the publick.

The Duke of Gloceſter tries to appeaſe the King. Knighton. Walſing.

A Plot of this nature, ſo openly contrived, and not executed, ſeldom fails of proving fatal to the Authors. The Duke of Gloceſter, and the other Lords of his Party, perceived their Deſtruction was reſolved; and if the King and his Favorites had not already ſacrificed them to their Animoſity, it was not for want of Will but of Power. The only Remedy left, in their Opinion, was, a recourſe to Arms. But as prudent People uſe not that Method till all others prove ineffectual, the Duke of Gloceſter thought he ſhould try once more to remove the King's Prejudices. For that purpoſe, he ſent the Biſhop of London with reſpectful Aſſurances of his Allegiance, and an Offer to clear himſelf by Oath of the Crimes falſely laid to his Charge. Richard ſeemed at firſt inclinable to admit of this Juſtification; but the Earl of Suffolk ſoon made him alter his Mind, by telling him, even before the Biſhop, he would never be ſafe on the Throne as long as the Duke of Gloceſter was alive. The Biſhop of London was ſo offended at theſe Words, that he could not forbear ſaying to the Favorite, that being condemned by the Parliament, and holding his Life purely by the King's Grace, it became him leſs than any Man, to accuſe Loyal Subjects. This Boldneſs was ſo diſpleaſing to the King, that he commanded the Prelate to depart from his Preſence. Affairs being come to this Point; and the proſcribed Lords believing that a vigorous Defence was the only way left to ſcreen them from the Deſigns of the Court, reſolved at length to take Arms. As they were in great Credit with the People, who conſidered them as their Protectors, they had ſoon drawn together an Army of forty thouſand Men, with which they marched directly to London. 1387.

The Lords take Arms.

The Diligence of the Lords broke all the meaſures of the King and his Miniſters. Richard was reſolved to go to France, and reſtore to King Charles, Calais and Cherbourg, in order to obtain a powerful Aid, which might enable him to reduce his rebellious Subjects, as he termed them. But the ſudden Approach of the Lords not ſuffering him to execute this Deſign, there was a neceſſity of having recourſe to other means, to free himſelf from the preſent Difficulties. The beſt way, as he thought, was to amuſe the Male-contents, whilſt the Duke of Ireland raiſed an Army in Wales, where he had many Friends. Purſuant to this Project, he ſent word to the Male-content Lords, that he was ready to grant them all their reaſonable Deſires, and ſhould be on the morrow in Weſtminſter-Hall, where they might come and preſent their Petition. The Lords gladly embraced the Offer, and taking care not to be ſurprized (8), repaired to the Place appointed. They found the King ſeated on a Throne, in his Royal Robes, expecting their coming. As they approached the Throne, they fell on their Knees, in a ſuppliant Poſture, though in effect it was not ſo much to ask Pardon, as to obtain of him the Puniſhment of his Miniſters. The Biſhop of Ely, who was Chancellor (9), asking the reaſon of their taking Arms, they replied, it was ſolely with Intention to procure the Good of the King and Kingdom. Adding, the King's Perſon ſhould be always inviolable to them, and that their Deſign was only to bring the Traitors about him to condign Puniſhment. Then they named in particular, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, the Archbiſhop of York, Judge Treſilian, and one Brembar, an Alderman of London, who was of the ſame Cabal. The King gravely anſwered, that in the next Parliament (10) Juſtice ſhould be done to all. Then he upbraided them for their Preſumption, intimating, it was in his Power to cruſh them, but out of pure Condeſcenſion he was pleaſed to give them a favorable hearing. After that he took the Duke of Gloceſter by the hand, and bidding them all riſe, ſaid, their Complaints ſhould be conſidered. As he intended only to amuſe them, he ordered a Proclamation to be publiſhed, to juſtify their appearing in Arms, in hopes they would be induced to diſmiſs their Troops. But they were too well acquainted with the Character of the King and his Miniſters, to rely on their bare Word. Apprehenſive of being ſuddenly oppreſſed, when they ſhould be no longer feared, they reſolved to continue in Arms till the Parliament was aſſembled. They quickly ſaw how neceſſary this Precaution was. The Duke of Ireland having levied an Army in Wales with great Expedition (11), marched with all ſpeed to the King's Aſſiſtance. 1387. Is defeated. Walſing. proach London, it was not certain that the Citizens would join the Confederates. To prevent this Danger, the Earl of Derby (1), eldeſt Son of the Duke of Lancaſter, went with part of the Army to meet the Duke of Ireland, and finding him in Oxfordſhire (2) gave him Battle, and gained an eaſy Victory over a General who was nothing leſs than a Warrior. In the beginning of the Fight, the Duke, who was afraid of falling into the hands of his Enemies, took to flight, without troubling himſelf about what became of his Army. All his Baggage being taken, in a Casket was found a Letter from the King, commanding him to march to London with all poſſible ſpeed, and promiſing him to live and die with him. This Defeat breaking all the King's meaſures, the Duke fled into Holland, and, after ſome ſtay at Utrecht, went and lived at Louvain, where he died three Years after. The Earl of Suffolk would have retired to Calais, but the Governor (3) not daring, at ſuch a Juncture, either to arreſt or protect him, choſe to ſend him back to the King. He had the more reaſon to fear, as a Frenchman was ſeized at that time, bringing him a Safe-Conduct to come to Boulogne, where King Charles expected him. 1388. Conference of the Lords with the King. Walſing. Knighton. The Confederate Lords being now fully ſatisfied of the pernicious Deſigns of the King, and his Miniſters, marched their whole Army into London, and then demanded a Conference with the King. Richard would fain have been excuſed, but, as he ſaw no remedy, and was apprehenſive of ſtarving in the Tower, durſt not refuſe it. At this Interview, they bitterly upbraided him with the Nottingham Plot to deſtroy them; with his deſign to make himſelf abſolute, by means of an Army; with his attempting to have a Parliament at his devotion; with his Orders to the Duke of Ireland to march to London, whilſt he was amuſing them with vain Promiſes: Laſtly, with his Treaty with the King of France, to deliver up Calais and Cherbourg. Richard anſwered theſe Reproaches, with a Shower of Tears, which moved the Lords. They imagined, the King's ill Conduct proceeded only from his little Experience, and the bad Counſels of his Favorites, and as they were removed he would be reclaimed. This belief rendering them more tractable, it was agreed, the King ſhould on the morrow be at Weſtminſter, to ſettle with them the Affairs of the Government. Hardly were they out of the Tower, before he altered his mind, and ſent them word, he would not confer with them. This Fickleneſs ſo incenſed them, that they immediately let him know, in caſe he came not to Weſtminſter next day, according to his Promiſe, they would go themſelves, and proceed to the Election of a new King. So preciſe a Declaration threw him into ſuch a Fright, that he not only came to the Place of Conference, but conſented alſo to the Baniſhment of his two principal Favorites, with the Archbiſhop of York (4), the Biſhops of Durham and Chicheſter (5), and ſeveral other Lords (6) and Ladies (7), who had favoured the Deſigns of the Court. 1389. The Parliament meets. Knighton. Col. 2713, &c. Walſing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 566, 590. The Parliament being aſſembled in February (8) 1389, ſeveral Perſons were accuſed of High-Treaſon, and ſentenced to divers Puniſhments. Treſilian, Brembar (9), and ſome other Knights and Gentlemen were hanged at Tyburn. The reſt of the Judges, with the Biſhop of Chicheſter, received the ſame Sentence; but had their Lives granted them, and were baniſhed to Ireland (10). As for the two Favorites, and the Archbiſhop of York, they were condemned to exile, and their Eſtates confiſcated to the King's Uſe (11). 1388.

After the Parliament had thus paid what was thought due to Juſtice, two Acts were paſſed, the firſt of which forbad the aſcribing to the King the late Commotions, and the other, granted a general Pardon to both Parties. Matters being thus ſettled, the King renewed his Coronation-Oath, as if he begun a new Reign, and all the Lords did him Homage, and repeated their Oaths of Allegiance (12). This Parliament, called the Mercileſs, did not break up till June the 4th.

Since the laſt Parliament, England remained in Tranquillity. The new Miniſters being guided by different Maxims from thoſe of the old, took care not to engage the King in ſuch Proceedings that had like to prove his Ruin. But though the King's Council was ſucceſsfully changed, it was not ſo eaſy to change his Temper. Full of his own Merit, he was extremely concerned to be under the direction of others, when he was of Age to hold the Reins of the Government himſelf. Upon his entering into his two and twentieth Year, he called his Council, ordering all the Members to be preſent. When they were met, he demanded of them how old he was, to which anſwer was made, he was full Twenty Years of Age. Since it is ſo, added he, I will govern my Kingdom my ſelf; the Condition of a King ought not to be worſe than that of his Subjects, who are at Liberty at that Age to manage their own Affairs. Having thus made known his Intentions, he commanded the Chancellor (14) to deliver him the Great-Seal, which he gave to the Biſhop of Wincheſter (15). At the ſame time he turned out the Biſhop of Hereford from being Treaſurer, and removing from the Council-Board the Duke of Gloceſter his Uncle, the Earl of Warwick, and ſome others, whom he did not like, put ſuch in their room as he believed more pliant to his Will. This Proceeding was not in it ſelf ſtrange, ſince it was in his Power to make theſe Alterations. However, it was remarked, he had never given leſs Signs of Prudence, which thoſe who begin to be of Age are ſuppoſed to have, than in the choice of his new Miniſters, who were by no means qualified for their Poſts. Accordingly it was not long before Diſorder and Confuſion were viſible in the Publick Affairs. This Threat made the Duke of Ireland reſolve to prevent him. To that end, after concerting the means with the King, he feigned to go into Ireland, and took the Road to Wales where the King was pleaſed to accompany him. But this pretended Voyage was only to conſult more privately how to execute their Project of aſſuming an arbitrary Power, of which the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, Nottingham (3), were to feel the Effects. The Reſult of this Conſultation was, that the King ſhould raiſe an Army to terrify theſe Lords, and then call a Parliament, the Election whereof ſhould be ſo managed, that the Members ſhould be all at his devotion; and that he ſhould cauſe to be paſſed all ſuch Acts as were neceſſary to ſecure him an unlimited Power.

Richard communicates his Deſign to the Sheriffs, Walſing.

As ſoon as the Plot was contrived, they went to Nottingham, where the King ſent for all the Sheriffs, ſome of the principal Citizens of London, and all the Judges. When they were met, he communicated to them his Deſign of raiſing an Army to chaſtiſe ſuch Lords, as he named to them, among whom was the Duke of Gloceſter, and demanded of the Sheriffs what number of Troops each could furniſh him with. Then he told them, he intended to call a Parliament, and ordered them to let no Repreſentative be choſen, but what was in the Liſt he ſhould give them himſelf (4). The Sheriffs made anſwer, it was not in their Power to execute his Orders. That the People were ſo well inclined to the Lords he had mentioned, that there was no proſpect of levying an Army againſt them: That it was ſtill more difficult to deprive the People of their Right of freely electing their Repreſentatives in Parliament. But the Judges (5) were not ſo ſcrupulous in what related to them. The King asked them, whether he had not Power to turn out the fourteen Commiſſioners appointed by Parliament, and annul ſuch Acts as were prejudicial to him? They replied, The King was above the Laws (6). Nevertheleſs, when they were required to ſubſcribe their Opinion, ſome endeavoured to be excuſed, but were compelled to it by the Menaces of the Favorites. It is affirmed, one of the Judges (7) ſaid aloud after ſigning, That never did Action better deſerve hanging than that he had juſt done. The Opinion of the Judges being thus extorted, Richard thought he had ſurmounted all Difficulties. He immediately iſſued out Commiſſions to levy an Army; but found ſo few willing to ſerve him, that he was forced to deſiſt from his Project. Enraged at this diſappointment, he returned to London, after a fruitleſs Declaration of his Deſigns, which rendered him more odious to the publick.

The Duke of Gloceſter tries to appeaſe the King. Knighton. Walſing.

A Plot of this nature, ſo openly contrived, and not executed, ſeldom fails of proving fatal to the Authors. The Duke of Gloceſter, and the other Lords of his Party, perceived their Deſtruction was reſolved; and if the King and his Favorites had not already ſacrificed them to their Animoſity, it was not for want of Will but of Power. The only Remedy left, in their Opinion, was, a recourſe to Arms. But as prudent People uſe not that Method till all others prove ineffectual, the Duke of Gloceſter thought he ſhould try once more to remove the King's Prejudices. For that purpoſe, he ſent the Biſhop of London with reſpectful Aſſurances of his Allegiance, and an Offer to clear himſelf by Oath of the Crimes falſely laid to his Charge. Richard ſeemed at firſt inclinable to admit of this Juſtification; but the Earl of Suffolk ſoon made him alter his Mind, by telling him, even before the Biſhop, he would never be ſafe on the Throne as long as the Duke of Gloceſter was alive. The Biſhop of London was ſo offended at theſe Words, that he could not forbear ſaying to the Favorite, that being condemned by the Parliament, and holding his Life purely by the King's Grace, it became him leſs than any Man, to accuſe Loyal Subjects. This Boldneſs was ſo diſpleaſing to the King, that he commanded the Prelate to depart from his Preſence. Affairs being come to this Point; and the proſcribed Lords believing that a vigorous Defence was the only way left to ſcreen them from the Deſigns of the Court, reſolved at length to take Arms. As they were in great Credit with the People, who conſidered them as their Protectors, they had ſoon drawn together an Army of forty thouſand Men, with which they marched directly to London. 1387.

The Lords take Arms.

The Diligence of the Lords broke all the meaſures of the King and his Miniſters. Richard was reſolved to go to France, and reſtore to King Charles, Calais and Cherbourg, in order to obtain a powerful Aid, which might enable him to reduce his rebellious Subjects, as he termed them. But the ſudden Approach of the Lords not ſuffering him to execute this Deſign, there was a neceſſity of having recourſe to other means, to free himſelf from the preſent Difficulties. The beſt way, as he thought, was to amuſe the Male-contents, whilſt the Duke of Ireland raiſed an Army in Wales, where he had many Friends. Purſuant to this Project, he ſent word to the Male-content Lords, that he was ready to grant them all their reaſonable Deſires, and ſhould be on the morrow in Weſtminſter-Hall, where they might come and preſent their Petition. The Lords gladly embraced the Offer, and taking care not to be ſurprized (8), repaired to the Place appointed. They found the King ſeated on a Throne, in his Royal Robes, expecting their coming. As they approached the Throne, they fell on their Knees, in a ſuppliant Poſture, though in effect it was not ſo much to ask Pardon, as to obtain of him the Puniſhment of his Miniſters. The Biſhop of Ely, who was Chancellor (9), asking the reaſon of their taking Arms, they replied, it was ſolely with Intention to procure the Good of the King and Kingdom. Adding, the King's Perſon ſhould be always inviolable to them, and that their Deſign was only to bring the Traitors about him to condign Puniſhment. Then they named in particular, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, the Archbiſhop of York, Judge Treſilian, and one Brembar, an Alderman of London, who was of the ſame Cabal. The King gravely anſwered, that in the next Parliament (10) Juſtice ſhould be done to all. Then he upbraided them for their Preſumption, intimating, it was in his Power to cruſh them, but out of pure Condeſcenſion he was pleaſed to give them a favorable hearing. After that he took the Duke of Gloceſter by the hand, and bidding them all riſe, ſaid, their Complaints ſhould be conſidered. As he intended only to amuſe them, he ordered a Proclamation to be publiſhed, to juſtify their appearing in Arms, in hopes they would be induced to diſmiſs their Troops. But they were too well acquainted with the Character of the King and his Miniſters, to rely on their bare Word. Apprehenſive of being ſuddenly oppreſſed, when they ſhould be no longer feared, they reſolved to continue in Arms till the Parliament was aſſembled. They quickly ſaw how neceſſary this Precaution was. The Duke of Ireland having levied an Army in Wales with great Expedition (11), marched with all ſpeed to the King's Aſſiſtance. 1387. Is defeated. Walſing. proach London, it was not certain that the Citizens would join the Confederates. To prevent this Danger, the Earl of Derby (1), eldeſt Son of the Duke of Lancaſter, went with part of the Army to meet the Duke of Ireland, and finding him in Oxfordſhire (2) gave him Battle, and gained an eaſy Victory over a General who was nothing leſs than a Warrior. In the beginning of the Fight, the Duke, who was afraid of falling into the hands of his Enemies, took to flight, without troubling himſelf about what became of his Army. All his Baggage being taken, in a Casket was found a Letter from the King, commanding him to march to London with all poſſible ſpeed, and promiſing him to live and die with him. This Defeat breaking all the King's meaſures, the Duke fled into Holland, and, after ſome ſtay at Utrecht, went and lived at Louvain, where he died three Years after. The Earl of Suffolk would have retired to Calais, but the Governor (3) not daring, at ſuch a Juncture, either to arreſt or protect him, choſe to ſend him back to the King. Mean while, Richard, uncertain how the victorious Lords would deal with him, took refuge in the Tower. He had the more reaſon to fear, as a Frenchman was ſeized at that time, bringing him a Safe-Conduct to come to Boulogne, where King Charles expected him. It was farther diſcovered by a Letter found upon the ſame Perſon, that Charles expected to be put in poſſeſſion of Calais and Cherbourg, and had even advanced part of the Sum, he was to give for theſe two Places.

1388. Conference of the Lords with the King. Walſing. Knighton. The Confederate Lords being now fully ſatisfied of the pernicious Deſigns of the King, and his Miniſters, marched their whole Army into London, and then demanded a Conference with the King. Richard would fain have been excuſed, but, as he ſaw no remedy, and was apprehenſive of ſtarving in the Tower, durſt not refuſe it. At this Interview, they bitterly upbraided him with the Nottingham Plot to deſtroy them; with his deſign to make himſelf abſolute, by means of an Army; with his attempting to have a Parliament at his devotion; with his Orders to the Duke of Ireland to march to London, whilſt he was amuſing them with vain Promiſes: Laſtly, with his Treaty with the King of France, to deliver up Calais and Cherbourg. Richard anſwered theſe Reproaches, with a Shower of Tears, which moved the Lords. They imagined, the King's ill Conduct proceeded only from his little Experience, and the bad Counſels of his Favorites, and as they were removed he would be reclaimed. This belief rendering them more tractable, it was agreed, the King ſhould on the morrow be at Weſtminſter, to ſettle with them the Affairs of the Government. Hardly were they out of the Tower, before he altered his mind, and ſent them word, he would not confer with them. This Fickleneſs ſo incenſed them, that they immediately let him know, in caſe he came not to Weſtminſter next day, according to his Promiſe, they would go themſelves, and proceed to the Election of a new King. So preciſe a Declaration threw him into ſuch a Fright, that he not only came to the Place of Conference, but conſented alſo to the Baniſhment of his two principal Favorites, with the Archbiſhop of York (4), the Biſhops of Durham and Chicheſter (5), and ſeveral other Lords (6) and Ladies (7), who had favoured the Deſigns of the Court. As for the Judges, ſince it was deſigned to treat them with the utmoſt Rigour, they were taken off the Benches in Weſtminſter-Hall, and ſent to the Tower.

1389. The Parliament meets. Knighton. Col. 2713, &c. Walſing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 566, 590. The Parliament being aſſembled in February (8) 1389, ſeveral Perſons were accuſed of High-Treaſon, and ſentenced to divers Puniſhments. Treſilian, Brembar (9), and ſome other Knights and Gentlemen were hanged at Tyburn. The reſt of the Judges, with the Biſhop of Chicheſter, received the ſame Sentence; but had their Lives granted them, and were baniſhed to Ireland (10). As for the two Favorites, and the Archbiſhop of York, they were condemned to exile, and their Eſtates confiſcated to the King's Uſe (11). 1388.

After the Parliament had thus paid what was thought due to Juſtice, two Acts were paſſed, the firſt of which forbad the aſcribing to the King the late Commotions, and the other, granted a general Pardon to both Parties. Matters being thus ſettled, the King renewed his Coronation-Oath, as if he begun a new Reign, and all the Lords did him Homage, and repeated their Oaths of Allegiance (12). This Parliament, called the Mercileſs, did not break up till June the 4th.

But the Earl of Dunbar coming upon him during the Battle, with a Body of freſh Troops, ſo changed the Scene, that the Engliſh Army was at length defeated, and Hotſpur taken Priſoner.

In his return, the Earl of Arundel took from the French eighty freighted Ships, and plundered the Iſles of Ree and Oleron: after which he ſailed with his Fleet to England. Truce with France. Walſing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 622.

Since the laſt Parliament, England remained in Tranquillity. The new Miniſters being guided by different Maxims from thoſe of the old, took care not to engage the King in ſuch Proceedings that had like to prove his Ruin. But though the King's Council was ſucceſsfully changed, it was not ſo eaſy to change his Temper. Full of his own Merit, he was extremely concerned to be under the direction of others, when he was of Age to hold the Reins of the Government himſelf. Upon his entering into his two and twentieth Year, he called his Council, ordering all the Members to be preſent. When they were met, he demanded of them how old he was, to which anſwer was made, he was full Twenty Years of Age. Since it is ſo, added he, I will govern my Kingdom my ſelf; the Condition of a King ought not to be worſe than that of his Subjects, who are at Liberty at that Age to manage their own Affairs. Having thus made known his Intentions, he commanded the Chancellor (14) to deliver him the Great-Seal, which he gave to the Biſhop of Wincheſter (15). At the ſame time he turned out the Biſhop of Hereford from being Treaſurer, and removing from the Council-Board the Duke of Gloceſter his Uncle, the Earl of Warwick, and ſome others, whom he did not like, put ſuch in their room as he believed more pliant to his Will. This Proceeding was not in it ſelf ſtrange, ſince it was in his Power to make theſe Alterations. However, it was remarked, he had never given leſs Signs of Prudence, which thoſe who begin to be of Age are ſuppoſed to have, than in the choice of his new Miniſters, who were by no means qualified for their Poſts. Accordingly it was not long before Diſorder and Confuſion were viſible in the Publick Affairs. 1390. Return of the Duke of Lancaſter. Walſing. Froiſſart. l. 3. c. 79.

Whilſt Richard was apprehenſive of the Attempts of this Uncle, who was repreſented to him as a very dangerous Enemy, he ſaw another arrive, who was no leſs formidable. This was the Duke of Lancaſter, who was returned from the Spaniſh Expedition (1). The Progreſs he had made in that Country, had at length obliged the King of Caſtile to make a Treaty with him, promiſing to pay down ſix hundred thouſand Livres, with a yearly Penſion of forty thouſand (2), during the Lives of him and his Ducheſs. This Treaty was followed by a Marriage of the Princeſs Catherine, the Duke's Daughter by Conſtantia, with Henry, eldeſt Son of the King of Caſtile, on account of which the Duke and Ducheſs reſigned their Pretenſions to that Crown.

The King is reconciled to his Uncles. Walſing.

Though Richard was not very well pleaſed with the Duke of Lancaſter's Arrival, he received him however with ſuch Careſſes, as gave room to hope for a happy Union in the Royal Family for the future. This hope was confirmed by the Reconciliation procured by the Duke of Lancaſter (3), between the King and the Duke of Gloceſter; a Reconciliation ſeemingly ſo ſincere on the King's ſide, that all the World was deceived. Notwithſtanding theſe fair Appearances, the Duke of Lancaſter's Preſence was very grievous to Richard. This may be judged by the Price wherewith he was willing to purchaſe his Abſence. To attain his Ends, he made him the richeſt Preſent that a King of England could then make a Subject, by inveſting him with the Duchy of Guienne, with the ſame Privileges as were granted to the late Prince of Wales, the King's Father. As he had never any Affection for him, his making him ſo noble a Preſent, could be only with a view to remove him from England (4).

Shortly after the Earl of Derby, eldeſt Son of the Duke of Lancaſter, went (5) and bore Arms in Pruſſia, where he ſignalized himſelf by many gallant Actions. Whilſt this Prince was endeavouring to gain a Reputation by his warlike Exploits, Richard paſſed his time in Sham-Fights. He ſpent immenſe Sums in Tournaments, which gave occaſion to compare him, very much to his Diſadvantage, with his Couſin the Earl of Derby who was in great Eſteem (6).

Whilſt the King was employed in theſe Diverſions, the Parliament revived a Statute, enacted in the Reign of Edward III, and confirmed in this. By this Act it was made High-Treaſon to bring into the Kingdom Proviſions from the Court of Rome, without the King's Licenſe. A Nuntio, ſent to England upon this account (7), made a great Noiſe, and even threatned that the Pope would proceed to Extremities. But his Menaces were incapable of obliging the Parliament to annul the Act. All he could obtain was a Reprieve for this new ſort of Offenders, till the enſuing Parliament (8).

Exceſſive Expences of the King. Walſing. Knighton.

Though a terrible Plague, and a Famine no leſs intolerable, then afflicted England, the King, who was exceſſively fond of Pageantry and Pomp, retrenched none of his Diverſions or Expences, which ran out to prodigious Sums. He is ſaid to entertain daily ſix thouſand Perſons. He valued himſelf upon ſurpaſſing in Magnificence all the Sovereigns of Europe, as if he had been poſſeſſed of an inexhauſtible Fund of Treaſure. In his Kitchen alone, three hundred Domeſticks were employed, and the Queen had the like Number of Women in her Service. The Courtiers ſo readily obtained whatever they asked, that the King's Favours were the leſs valued. In ſhort, he affected in every thing a Profuſeneſs, which could not but be very chargeable to his Subjects, and by a neceſſary Conſequence draw on him their Averſion. 1391.

As his Revenues were not ſufficient for ſo many Expences, he had a mind to try to obtain ſome Aſſiſtance from the Londoners. But, not to frighten them, he was contented firſt to ſee how they ſtood affected, by borrowing only a thouſand Pounds, probably with deſign not to confine himſelf afterwards to ſuch a Trifle. How inconſiderable ſoever this Sum was, he had the vexation to be refuſed in a very mortifying manner, even to the cutting in pieces by the Populace an Italian Merchant, who offered to lend the Money himſelf. Richard highly reſented this Affront, which he ſoon after found an opportunity to revenge. Under colour of puniſhing a Tumult of little conſequence, raiſed by a Baker's Apprentice, he ſtripped the City of all her Privileges (9), took away her Charter, and removed the Courts of Juſtice to York. It is true, he afterwards reſtored the whole, but the Londoners were obliged to redeem their Charter with a Preſent of ten thouſand Pounds, and two Gold Crowns. But though they paid dearly for refuſing to lend the King a thouſand Pounds, it was nothing in compariſon of the Prejudice the King himſelf received by it. By this Proceeding he entirely forfeited the Affection of the Citizens, who made him ſenſible afterwards, how dangerous it is for a King of England to have London for his Enemy (10). 1392.

He takes away their Charter, Knighton. Caxton. which he reſtores for Money. Act. Pub. VII. p. 713, 730, 735.

In the beginning of the Year 1393, arrived at London Deputies from the Engliſh ſettled in Ireland, imploring Aſſiſtance againſt the Natives (11). For ſome time there had been frequent Inſurrections in the Iſland, which ſhowed, the Iriſh wanted to ſhake off the Yoke of the Engliſh. Theſe Diſorders ſhould have had a ſpeedier Remedy, but Richard too much addicted to his Pleaſures, had neglected the Affairs of Ireland, as if he had been wholly unconcerned. At laſt, the Miſchief was ſo increaſed, that he could not, without hazarding the Loſs of the Iſland, any longer delay applying a ſuitable Remedy. The Duke of Gloceſter offered to go and ſuppreſs the Rebels (12); but the King not thinking proper to truſt him with the Command of an Army, reſolved to go himſelf. In this Reſolution he called a Parliament (13), which granted him a large Sum as well for the Iriſh War, as for the Charges of an Embaſſy of the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, who were to negotiate a final Peace with France. But this Affair came to nothing, by an Accident which prevented the meeting of the Plenipotentiaries between Ardres and Guiſnes, according to Agreement. King Charles, who was from time to time ſeized with a Diſtemper, which deprived him of his Underſtanding, being come to Abbeville on purpoſe to let the Engliſh ſee he was in his Senſes, fell into one of his uſual Fits. This Relapſe occaſioned the deferring of the Negotiation to a more convenient Seaſon. 1393.

The King goes to Ireland, and makes ſome Progreſs. Froiſſart. Walſing. Knighton, Act. Pub. VII. p. 782.

How great ſoever Richard's Grief was for the Death of the Queen, he ſet out however for Ireland, according to his Project (2). He arrived there in September (3), and at firſt made ſome Progreſs againſt the Rebels. But as the Seaſon would not permit him to proceed, he went to Dublin, where he held a Parliament, whilſt the Duke of York aſſembled another in England (4), which granted a Subſidy for proſecuting the Iriſh War.

1395. Deſigns of the Lollards which oblige the Clergy to ſend to the King. Walſing.

Richard was preparing to take the Field again, when the Archbiſhop of York, and Biſhop of London, arrived from England, to intreat him in the Name of the Clergy, to haſten his return. They even intimated, that the leaſt Delay might bring an irreparable Damage to Religion. The Foundation of this great Alarm was, that in the late Parliament, the Lollards had made Inſtances to ſet on foot a Reformation of the Church (5). As they had many Friends in the Kingdom, and in the Parliament itſelf, the Clergy were afraid they would proceed to this Reformation. For which Reaſon, the two deputed Prelates ſo magnified the Danger Religion was in, that Richard immediately departed for England (6), leaving to the Earl of March the management of the War. Upon his Arrival at London, he took certain meaſures with the Clergy to ſuppreſs the Sect of the Lollards, and compelled Sir Richard Story publickly to abjure their Doctrine, threatning to puniſh him with Death if ever he relapſed to that Sect.

The Corpſe of the Duke of Ireland is brought into England. Knighton. Walſing.

Shortly after, was brought into England, by the King's Order, the Corpſe of the Duke of Ireland, who died at Louvain. This Object reviving the King's Affection, he cauſed the Coffin to be opened, that he might once more have the Pleaſure to ſee the Man whom he had ſo tenderly loved. Then he ordered him a magnificent Funeral, and was pleaſed to honour it with his Preſence, as Edward II, had formerly done with regard to Gaveſton. But the Nobility would not ſhow that Reſpect to a Favorite, of whom they had ſo much Cauſe to complain. So that, like Edward II, Richard was attended at the Funeral Pomp, with only ſome of the Clergy (7).

1396. The Gaſcons refuſe to acknowledge the Duke of Lancaſter. Froiſſart. l. 4. c. 11. Walſing. Knighton.

Whilſt the King was employed in his Iriſh Expedition, the Duke of Lancaſter, who was gone to Bourdeaux to cauſe his Sovereignty to be acknowledged, had met with unexpected Obſtacles. The Gaſcons, pretending, their Country was inſeparably united to the Crown of England, maintained, it was not in the King's Power to alienate it. This pretenſion was ſtrengthened with a motive of Intereſt, which confirmed them in their Obſtinacy. They ſaid, if they were once ſeparated from England, they ran the risk of being deprived of the only Protection, capable of preventing their falling under the Dominion of France. For this reaſon, they aſſerted the Alienation in queſtion was equally prejudicial to themſelves and the Crown of England. It was objected, that they had never made the ſame Scruple with regard to the Prince of Wales, the King's Father. But they replied, there was a wide Difference between that Alienation and this. That the firſt being made in favour of the next Heir to the Crown, was to be only for a time, whereas this might eaſily happen to be for ever. After ſeveral Conteſts on this Subject, which laſted ſome time, the King reſolved at length to revoke the Grant, to which the Duke of Lancaſter, ſince he could not help it, readily ſubmitted. To comfort him in ſome meaſure for this loſs, the King gave him leave to marry Catherine Rowet, Widow of Sir Thomas Swinford (8). The Duke had long kept her as his Miſtreſs, and had by her ſeveral Children, who were legitimated by the King and Parliament, by the Name of Beaufort. Some time after, the King created the eldeſt, Earl of Somerſet (9).

1396. His third Marriage. Walſing. His Baſtards legitimated. Act. Pub. VII. p. 849.

Before the Duke of Lancaſter's Arrival the King had ſent Ambaſſadors to France (10), to demand in marriage Iſabella, Daughter of Charles VI. The Court of France had at firſt rejected this Propoſal, becauſe the Princeſs was but ſeven Years old, and beſides was promiſed to the Duke of Bretagne. However, notwithſtanding theſe Difficulties, the Marriage was concluded, in a ſecond Negotiation, and withal, a twenty eight Years Truce, between the two Crowns. Shortly after, both the Kings met between Ardres and Calais, under Tents pitched on purpoſe, where the two Courts diſplayed all their Magnificence, and where the Treaty was ſigned and the Nuptials ſolemnized (11). Richard is ſaid to expend on this occaſion three hundred thouſand Marks, a Sum far exceeding that of two hundred thouſand, which he received in deduction of what was promiſed him with his Queen. The Duke of Gloceſter, who liked neither the Marriage nor the Truce, could not forbear ſhowing his Diſcontent. He frankly told the King, it would have been more adviſeable to attempt, by a vigorous War, to recover what England had loſt in France, than to enter into an Alliance with a Crown, that had all along gained more advantages by Treaties with the Engliſh, than by the Succeſs of its Arms.

1397. The King's excеſſive Expences. Walſing.

The King's uſual Expence, with the Charges of his late Marriage, having entirely drained his Exchequer, and even obliged him to borrow large Sums, there was a neceſſity of recurring to extraordinary Ways to fill his Coffers. Though the Parliament which met in the beginning of the Year 1397 (12), granted him a very conſiderable Sum, it was not ſufficient to enable him to pay his Debts. Beſides, he took occaſion to increaſe the Expence of his Houſhold, from a Report that the Electoral Princes had caſt their Eyes upon him, to raiſe him to the Imperial Dignity, and thereby reduced himſelf to ſtill greater Streights. As he was aſhamed to demand a freſh Supply from the Parliament, he had recourſe again to Borrowings, or rather to extorted Grants, which he exacted from the Rich. There was not a Lord, Biſhop, Gentleman, or rich Burgeſs, but what was obliged to lend him Money, though it was well known he never deſigned to repay it. But though this Method of raiſing Money upon the People, had ever been conſidered by the Engliſh, as one of the greateſt Breaches of their Privileges, it occaſioned no Commotion. Every one was intimidated, and though this Injuſtice was highly reſented, it was taken patiently, in hopes it would be the laſt.

He makes uſe of illegal Ways to raiſe Money. Walſing.

He gives up Breſt and Cherbourg. Walſing. Act. Pub. VII. p. 756, 759, 852. The Publick murmurs at it.

The Reſtitution of Cherbourg (15) to the King of Navarre, and of Breſt to the Duke of Bretagne, was not looked upon with the ſame Tranquillity. Though theſe two Places belonged not originally to England, the Engliſh had been at ſo great an Expence, in aiding the Princes, to whom they appertained, that they might have been juſtly kept till the whole was repaid. This occaſioned a general Diſſatisfaction, and the more, becauſe it brought the King but an inconſiderable Sum, which was alſo laviſhed away in needleſs Expences. It is true he pretended, his Engagement to reſtore theſe Places after a Peace, or a long Truce with France, made this Reſtitution neceſſary; but it was well known alſo that the King of Navarre, and the Duke of Bretagne had failed him firſt. Be this as it will, the Duke of Gloceſter thought this Fault ſo prejudicial to England, that he could not help upbraiding the King in very ſharp Terms; to which Richard made ſuch a Reply as plainly ſhowed how much he was offended at his Remonſtrance. This Accident revived the King's former hatred of the Duke of Gloceſter, which being rather ſtifled than extinguiſhed, ſhewed itſelf from time to time; how careful ſoever he might be to conceal it.

Richard ſuſpects his Uncles. Froiſſart, l. 4. c. 32.

He complained to the Dukes of Lancaſter and York, that the Duke of Gloceſter took upon him to controll his Actions, and amongſt his complaints, he dropped ſome Expreſſions, which made them think he ſuſpected all three of having ill Deſigns upon him. The two Princes proteſted they had an unſhaken Loyalty for him, and did not queſtion but the Duke their Brother had the ſame, though his haſty Temper cauſed him ſometimes to ſpeak with too much Warmth. The King appeared ſatisfied with their Juſtification. However, his Eaſineſs to be appeaſed, after ſhowing ſo great Anger, bred in them Suſpicions, which induced them to quit the Court, and retire to their Eſtates. Their withdrawing was probably the occaſion of the Duke of Gloceſter's Ruin, as it gave his Enemies an opportunity to inflame the King's Diſpleaſure againſt him, and to determine him at length to be rid of ſo troubleſome an Inſpector. But as nothing could be found in his Conduct which might expoſe him to the Rigour of the Law, and beſides it would be dangerous to deſtroy him that way, Richard reſolved to make uſe of a ſpeedier and more certain Method. To execute this Deſign, he came one Morning to his Uncle's Country Houſe, and finding him in Bed, deſired him to riſe immediately, and go with him to London. He pretended, he wanted him in a very important Affair, which he would impart to him on the Road. The Duke preſently mounting his Horſe, rode by the King, who talked to him about the pretended Affair, without ſhowing he had any other Deſign. Whilſt they were diſcourſing together, they came to a hollow Way, where the Duke was ſuddenly ſurrounded with ſome Horſemen, and carried on board a Ship, which lay ready in the Thames to convey him to Calais (1). When the King came to London, he ſent for the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, and after familiarly talking with them ſome time (2), ordered them to be apprehended and ſent to the Tower. He ſerved the Lord Cobham in the ſame manner with ſome others (3), whom he deſigned to get rid of. Mean time the Intelligence he received of the People's beginning to ſtir, obliged him to iſſue out a Proclamation, declaring, theſe Lords were taken into cuſtody for new Miſdemeanours, and promiſing they ſhould be proceeded againſt according to Law.

A Proclamation about it. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 6.

The Peers are ſummoned. Walſing.

This Proclamation having ſomewhat appeaſed the People, the King ſummoned all the Peers of the Realm to Nottingham (4). This was done with deſign to ſound them, rather than ask their Advice concerning the manner of proceeding againſt the Priſoners, ſince he was already determined. However he made uſe of this Pretence to convene them. After the Affair was debated in Council, the Lords (5) fearing to incur either the King's Indignation, or the Hatred of the Publick, if they came to any reſolution, declared it to be of ſuch a nature that it could only be decided by the Authority of the Parliament. This was preciſely what the King wanted. He had already taken all neceſſary Meaſures to have a Parliament at his devotion. Some time ſince, he had changed all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, and ſuffered none, but what had promiſed to be ſubſervient to his Deſigns. He had taken the ſame Precautions, with reſpect to all Officers that had Credit and Power in the Burroughs and Counties. So by means of the Magiſtrates, and Perſons in publick Poſts, he had cauſed ſuch Repreſentatives to be choſen as he had ſecured beforehand. If any were elected not agreeable to him, the Sheriffs were ordered not to return them, but to cauſe others to be choſen in their room. Beſides, as the Houſe of Commons were the ſole Judges in the Affair of Elections, he was well aſſured that ſuch a Parliament would confirm or reject whom he pleaſed. 1397.

The King gets a Parliament at his devotion.

It muſt not be thought very difficult for a King of England to execute ſuch a Project. Experience has ſince confirmed, on numberleſs Occaſions, that by the like ways, it is very poſſible, to cauſe Repreſentatives to be choſen devoted to the Court. However, Hiſtorians remark, that it was in this Parliament, that ſuch Practices were firſt uſed. But it muſt likewiſe be added, that it was one of the principal Cauſes of Richard's Deſtruction, as will be ſeen hereafter. And indeed it is impoſſible that a Nation can ſee their Liberties in the hands of Men, whom they have not themſelves freely choſen, without deſiring to be delivered from ſuch an Oppreſſion.

The Biſhop of Exeter's Speech upon the abſolute Power of the King. Walſing. Cotton's Abridg. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 34.

The Parliament being thus compoſed (6), the Biſhop of Exeter (7) opened the Seſſion with a Speech, labouring to prove that the Regal Power was unlimited, and that ſuch as endeavoured to bound it, deſerved the ſevereſt Puniſhments. Purſuant to this Principle, which met with a general Approbation, the Parliament repealed the Act of Grace, paſſed nine Years before in favour of the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, and all their Adherents. All the Acts were likewiſe annulled paſſed in the Parliament, which appointed the fourteen Governours to the King, as being extorted during his Minority.

Unjuſt and violent Proceedings of the Parliament. Cotton's Abridg. Archbiſhop Arundel baniſhed. Walſing.

If the Parliament of 1386, deſerved to be called the Mercileſs, I know no Name odious enough for this. By a manifeſt Prevarication, this Aſſembly made no ſcruple to ſacrifice to the Paſſions of the King and his Miniſters, the moſt diſtinguiſhed Lords of the Kingdom, as well as the Liberties and Privileges of the People. Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was impeached of High-Treaſon, for being one of the Commiſſioners appointed by the Parliament of 1386, to whom was committed the Inſpection of the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs. For this new ſort of Offence, the Archbiſhop was condemned to Baniſhment, and his Eſtate confiſcated to the King's uſe. Then the Earls of Arundel (8) and Warwick (9), were accuſed (10) of the ſame Crimes, for which nine Years before the King had granted a Pardon, and ſentenced to die by this truly mercileſs Parliament. Froiſſart ſays, the King would be preſent at Arundel's Execution. Another Hiſtorian adds, that the Spectacle remained ſo deeply imprinted in his Memory, that his Sleep was often interrupted by Dreams, repreſenting to him the Earl covered with Blood, and upbraiding him with his Injuſtice. To this contributed, perhaps, the Rumour that ſeveral Miracles were wrought at the Tomb of the deceaſed (11), and that his Head was miraculouſly re-joined to his Body. Though to prevent the ill Conſequences of this falſe Notion, the King had ordered the Corpſe to be taken up and expoſed to publick view, ten days together, in a Church, it was not poſſible to cure the People of their Prepoſſeſſion. As for the Earl of Warwick who willingly confeſſed himſelf guilty, without taking advantage of the Pardon, he was treated with leſs rigour, his Puniſhment being changed into perpetual Baniſhment in the Iſle of Man. As to the Duke of Gloceſter, in all appearance, the King was apprehenſive it would be very dangerous to put him to death publickly, or that the Parliament would not be ſo compliant as to ſacrifice ſo conſiderable a Perſon. Be this as it will, he had taken care

[Thomas de Holland] Earl of Kent, received the Title of Duke of Surrey. [John de Holland,] Earl of Huntington, the King's half Brother, was created Duke of Exeter. [Thomas Mowbray,] Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; and [Sir William le Scroope] Earl of Wiltſhire (2). Laſtly, out of complaiſance to the Duke of Lancaſter, the King made [John Beaufort] his eldeſt Son by his third Marriage, who was already Earl of Somerſet, Marquiſs of Somerſet (3). To theſe honourable Titles he added other Favors, by diſtributing among theſe Lords the forfeited Eſtates of the Duke of Gloceſter, and of the Earls of Arundel and Warwick (4).

The Parliament adjourned to Shrewſbury. Walſing.

In thoſe days the Parliament ſeldom ſat above one Seſſion, unleſs the Buſineſs required a ſhort Prorogation. But this was too well diſpoſed for the King, to be willing to run the hazard of having one leſs devoted to him. So not thinking fit to diſſolve it, he was pleaſed to adjourn it to Shrewsbury; this Town in the Neighbourhood of Wales, where he had many Friends, ſeeming more proper for his Deſigns than London, where he knew he was not beloved.

1398. The extraordinary Proceedings of the Parliament of Shrewſbury. Cotton's Abridg.

The new Seſſion (5) was only a Continuation of the extraordinary Proceedings already began at Weſtminſter. The Parliament ſtrove to carry the Prerogative Royal to a greater height, than any King of England had ever pretended to ſtretch it, and eſtabliſhed ſuch Maxims as were deſtructive of the Conſtitution, and the Liberties of the People. They approved, as conformable to Law, the Opinions for which nine Years before, the Judges were condemned. Purſuant to this Principle, the Judges who attended during the ſitting of the Parliament, decided, that When the King propoſed any Articles to be debated in Parliament, it was High Treaſon to bring in others before the King's were firſt diſpatched. By this and the like deciſions, the Caſes of High Treaſon were ſo multiplied, that hardly was it poſſible to prevent falling into that Crime, unleſs by making the King's Will and Pleaſure the ſole Rule of Walſing. Action (6). At laſt under colour of diſpatching Buſineſs, the Parliament appointed a certain Number of Commiſſioners (7), who were inveſted with the Authority of the whole Houſe. Thus by an unprecedented Act, the whole Power of the Nation was devolved to Idem. the King, twelve Peers, and ſix Commoners. To give the more ſtrength to theſe irregular Proceedings, the King cauſed them to be confirmed by the Pope's Bull, which was publiſhed in all the Counties of the Kingdom (8).

Cheſhire made a Principality.

During this ſecond Seſſion, Richard brought into Shrewsbury a numerous Guard of the Militia of Cheſhire, who expreſſed ſo ſtrong an Inclination to ſerve him, that to gratify the County, he erected it into a Principality (9).

Remarks on the Engliſh Conſtitution.

Let us ſtay here a moment, and reflect on the Conſtitution of the Engliſh Government. It is certain, the Inſtitution of Parliaments is very advantagious to the Kingdom, being the only ſupport of the Liberties of the People, who, without that, would long ſince have fallen into a fatal Slavery. But on the other hand, it cannot be denied, that theſe Aſſemblies become ſometimes very dangerous, when influenced by Popular Factions, or the Cabals of an ambitious Prince. Accordingly, it has often happened, that inſtead of procuring the Good of the Realm, they have produced Confuſion, and the Subverſion of the Laws, one while by too much depreſſing the Prerogative Royal, another while, by carrying it higher than is conſiſtent with the Welfare of the Nation. At ſuch times, the Evil is ſo much the harder to be cured, as what is done by the Parliament is deemed to flow from the unanimous Conſent of the whole Nation. For this Reaſon, it rarely happens that this diſorder can be remedied, but by means as violent as thoſe made uſe of to produce it, from whence generally ſpring Civil Wars. This is one of the principal Cauſes of the domeſtick Troubles, which have all along afflicted England more than any other European State. 1398.

It may be further obſerved, that the violent Method practiſed by Richard to attain to Arbitrary Power, I mean forced Elections, and the Opinions of the Judges, was exactly copied in our days by one of his Succeſſors, who had without doubt the ſame Intention. But we may add, that the Attempts of theſe two Monarchs ſerved only to promote their own Deſtruction, and that their deſigns came to the ſame Cataſtrophe. This is what we are going to ſee, with regard to Richard II, in the remaining Part of his Reign.

Richard lives in a deceitful Security.

Every thing ſeemed to contribute to the ſupport of the King, in the Enjoyment of the deſpotick Power he had lately aſſumed. They who would have been moſt capable of oppoſing his deſigns, had ſuffered a tragical Death, or were baniſhed the Realm; and they who ſtill remained, were gained by Places, Grants, or other ſorts of Favours. The great Officers of the Crown, the Governors of the Towns and Counties, were all devoted to the King. Among the Magiſtrates of the Towns and Country, not one was ſuffered but what was ready to promote, to the utmoſt, the Increaſe of the Regal Power. Notwithſtanding all theſe Advantages, Richard was much miſtaken, in imagining this new-acquired Power was ſafe, ſince the People were not for him, but on the contrary, hated him for his violent Actions. It is even likely, that among thoſe whom he accounted his Friends, there were many, who, out of Weakneſs or Prudence, did but conceal their real Sentiments, till an opportunity offered to free the Kingdom from the Yoke it began to groan under. And an opportunity preſented itſelf ſooner than the King imagined; for ſuffering himſelf to be ſwayed by his Paſſion, he had not the Prudence to keep within ſome Bounds, an Error which Princes of his Character ſeldom fail of committing. As they are always ſurrounded with Flatterers, they fancy all the reſt of the People are in the ſame Sentiments, and generally it is too late before they perceive, that the ſmall Numbers they have gained, is a weak Defence againſt the Fury of an inraged Nation. For a while, five or ſix hundred Perſons, who compoſe the Parliament, and ſome hundreds of Magiſtrates in the Towns and Counties, ſeem to make the Body of the Nation, and the reſt are reckoned as nothing. But a time comes when every ſingle Perſon muſt be taken into the account, and then the Number of thoſe that are in Office, is infinitely ſmall in compariſon of the reſt of the Nation.

Quarrel between the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk. Walſing. Froiſſart, l. 4. c. 38, 39.

Richard, incapable of making theſe Reflections, ſuffered himſelf to be blindly guided by his Paſſion, which made him conſider, as a great Advantage, all occaſions of exerciſing the Arbitrary Power he thought to have ſo firmly eſtabliſhed. Towards the end of the Year 1398, he gave a ſignal Proof of the little regard he intended to have for his Subjects, on occaſion of a Quarrel between two of the principal Lords of his Court. The Duke of Hereford, eldeſt Son of the Duke of Lancaſter, awed by the Examples of the Duke of Gloceſter his Uncle, and the other Lords, whom the King had ſacrificed to his Revenge, limiting his Deſires, made it the height of his Ambition, to keep in his favour, and carefully endea-

It was, probably, from this Conſideration, that fearing the Duke of Norfolk had laid a Snare for him, in ſpeaking to him very diſreſpectfully of the King (1), he informed Richard of the ſame. The Duke of Norfolk denying he had ever ſpoken againſt the King, and the Duke of Hereford maintaining his Accuſation, it was ordered, that the Affair ſhould be decided according to the Law of Chivalry, that is, by ſingle Combat (2). Coventry was appointed for the Duel, at which the King would be preſent in Perſon. But juſt as the two Dukes were entering the Liſts, the King, on pretence of avoiding the Effuſion of Blood, but in reality to be rid of theſe two Lords at once, commanded them to proceed no farther. Then, though there could be but one guilty, he baniſhed them both, the Duke of Norfolk for Life, and the Duke of Hereford for ten Years. The former died ſhortly after at Venice, and the other retired into France (3). This Act of Authority was no leſs contrary to the Privileges of the Nobility, than what the King had hitherto done with regard to the whole Nation in general; for by the Laws of the Land, theſe Lords could only be tried by their Peers. But at that time the Privileges of the People were little regarded.

Duke of Lancaſter's Death. Injuſtice done his Son. Walſing.

Not long after the Duke of Hereford's departure, his Father, the Duke of Lancaſter, died (4) little lamented by the People, and ſtill leſs by the King, who could not help fearing him. By the Death of this Prince, his Honours and Eſtates, which were very conſiderable, fell to the Duke of Hereford his Son, to whom before his departure, the King had remitted four Years of his Baniſhment. Moreover, he had granted him Letters Patent, impowering him, though in Exile, to take poſſeſſion by his Attorney of his Fees, that ſhould happen to fall to him in his Abſence, with a ſuſpenſion of Homage till his return (5). Notwithſtanding immediately after the death of the Duke his Father, the King, by a Sentence no leſs unjuſt than the former, decreed, that his Baniſhment ſhould be perpetual, and confiſcated all his Eſtate.

Ill State of the Kingdom.

By ſuch Acts of deſpotick Power, the Laws and Liberties of England were in a deplorable ſtate. The Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, and the Earl of Arundel being dead, Warwick ſent away, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk in Exile, there was ſcarce a Man in the Kingdom able to oppoſe the Arbitrary Power uſurped by the King. The Duke of York alone, the King's Uncle, might have defended the Nation's Intereſts. But as he loved his eaſe, he was no proper Perſon to engage in ſuch an Undertaking. Richard ſeeing himſelf therefore above all reſtraint, gave himſelf up to a ſoft and effeminate Life, regardleſs of the Good of the Publick. Mean time, his Miniſters, little qualified for their Poſts, ſuffered their Affairs to decay, and ſaw without any concern, the Engliſh Nation fall into the utmoſt contempt. The Scots frequently broke the Truce (6), by Incurſions upon the Borders, being very ſure, the Court of England was far from thinking of revenging their Inſults. The Engliſh Poſſeſſions in France were almoſt reduced to nothing, and the Places which might one day have ſerved to repair theſe Loſſes, were ſold without any neceſſity. The Merchant Ships were daily plundered by the Corſairs of France and the Low-Countries, without any means uſed to protect the Trade. Amidſt theſe diſorders, the Miniſters, of whom the Earl of Wiltſhire was the chief, ſought only to augment the King's Revenues, by Borrowings, new Taxes, and ſtill leſs legal Ways. Pretences were no longer ſought to demand Subſidies; the Miniſters whole Buſineſs was only to find ſpeedy and effectual means to extort Money from the People, to whom the demanding it was thought to be too great an Honour. At length, having practiſed divers Expedients, as unjuſt as extraordinary, to ſupply the King's prodigious Expences (7), and ſatisfy his Miniſters Oppreſſions exerciſed by the King and Miniſtry.

Avarice, a Method was uſed which could not fail of procuring large Sums. As the late Parliament had reverſed the Pardon granted in 1386, to the Duke of Gloceſter's Adherents, Accuſations were brought againſt ſuch as had then taken Arms in favour of that Prince. By the Judgments given upon theſe Accuſations, ſeventeen Counties were condemned as guilty of Treaſon, and the Eſtates of all the Inhabitants adjudged to the King. In this Extremity, the richer ſort of Gentlemen and Burgeſſes were forced, in order to avoid the ſeizure of their Eſtates, to give blank Obligations, which the King cauſed to be filled with what Sums he was pleaſed to exact. Moreover, by what was inſerted in theſe Notes, which were termed Ragmans (8), every Perſon was bound, under great Penalties, to ſupport the Statutes of the Shrewsbury Parliament, and all the ſubſequent Acts; that is to ſay, they entirely threw themſelves upon the King's Mercy (9). It was impoſſible that a Government ſo tyrannical, ſhould not draw the hatred of the Nation upon the Prince and his Inſtruments. It was alſo very viſible, that theſe Oppreſſions kindled in the hearts of the People, an ardent deſire of freeing themſelves from them, inſomuch that the leaſt Spark was capable of producing a fatal Combuſtion. 1398.

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 109.

Whilſt England was expoſed to all theſe Calamities, the Iriſh, contemning the ſmall number of Troops left by Richard in their Country, took up Arms with one Conſent. Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Governor of Ireland, oppoſing the Rebels, was ſlain in the firſt Battle. This Prince, who was declared by an Act of Parliament preſumptive Heir of the Crown, left two Sons, Edmund and Roger, the eldeſt of whom ſucceeded him in his Honour of Earl of March, and died without Iſſue, as well as Roger his Brother. But the Marriage of Ann their Siſter with the Duke of York's ſecond Son, proved a fertile ſource of Troubles, which long afflicted the Kingdom.

Rebellion in Ireland. The Earl of March ſlain. Walſing.

Richard receiving the News of the Iriſh Revolt, reſolved to go in Perſon and chaſtiſe the Rebels, being in a terrible Rage, that ſuch a pitiful and wretched People ſhould dare to contemn his Power, at a time when he found no oppoſition in England. Purſuant to this Reſolution, he levied a numerous Army, which furniſhed him with a freſh occaſion to exact great Sums from his Subjects (10), whereby he conſiderably increaſed the hatred already entertained againſt him.

The King prepares to go to Ireland. Walſing. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 78. He extorts great Sums.

When he was ready to imbark, ſome Suſpicions inſtilled into him, of the Earl of Northumberland, Governor of the northern Counties, moved him to ſend that Earl a poſitive Order to come and join him without delay. But the Earl excuſing himſelf, on account that his Preſence was abſolutely neceſſary in thoſe Parts, the King, without further Examination, pronounced him a Traitor (11), and ordered all his Eſtate to be ſeized. Then leaving the Regency of the Kingdom to the Duke of York his Uncle, he ſet ſail, and arrived May the 31ſt at Waterford, from whence he marched to Dublin. He was attended by the Sons of the Duke of Lancaſter, by his third Wife, and by thoſe of the late Duke of Gloceſter, whom he carried like Hoſtages; and had taken with him the beſt part of his Jewels, as if he had foreſeen he ſhould never more return to his Palace. He made at firſt ſome Progreſs againſt the Rebels, and in ſeveral Encounters, gave Marks of Valour, which cauſed a belief, that if hitherto he had ſhewn no great Inclination for War, it was not to be aſcribed ſo much to a want of Courage, as to a bad Education. 1399.

But whilſt his Vanity was flattered with the Advantages he gained over the Iriſh, a Conſpiracy was forming in England to deprive him of the Crown. 1399. Prince, but they are far from being the Majority. So, though a King of this Character is commonly ſurrounded with a crowd of Flatterers, who endeavour to perſuade him, that the People bear his Yoke patiently; if he has any Knowledge of the World, he ought to conſider, there is no preſerving the Power acquired by force, but by the ſame way it was uſurped. And if he is ſo impolitick, as to confide in Subjects he has violently oppreſſed, in vain does he expect from them a Fidelity, which ſerves only to increaſe their Miſery. This is what Richard did not fail to experience. By an imprudent Security, he had left his Kingdom, and carried all his Forces into Ireland, at a time when the People's hatred of him was at the higheſt; wherein he committed a capital Error, which his Enemies failed not to improve. He was ſcarce gone for Ireland, with almoſt all the Lords his Creatures, but the Male-contents in England began to think of means to dethrone him. To that end, after ſeveral Conferences together, they ſent Word to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, ſince his Baniſhment, was retired into France, "That all England was ready to "riſe, and nothing was wanting but a Leader of Di-"ſtinction to head the Male-contents. That upon ma-"ture Deliberation, they thought none ſo proper as the "Duke of Hereford, for whom the People had a great "Eſteem and Affection, and who moreover had a very "plauſible Pretence to take up Arms, to demand Satis-"faction for the Injuries he had ſuffered: That if the "Duke would repair into England, they engaged to "aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their Power; and in the "preſent diſpoſition of the Nation, there was no doubt, "but they would join thoſe that ſhould undertake to "free them from the Oppreſſion they endured." The Archbiſhop, who was himſelf extremely incenſed againſt the King, communicating this Letter to the Duke, that Prince reſolved to lay hold of the Juncture, to try what Fortune would do in his favour. However, as he was ſenſible he could not carry on this Enterprize by himſelf, he took care ſo to manage it, that he might eaſily deſiſt, in caſe things were not diſpoſed as he was made to expect. Purſuant to this Reſolution, he privately repaired into Bretagne, where he fitted out three Ships, and embarked in Company with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (1), and about fourſcore Men, among whom there were but ſixteen or eighteen Lances (2). With this ſmall Force he ſet ſail, and hovered ſome time about the Coaſt of England, now in one Place, then in another, without landing any where. His deſign was to ſee what Effect his Approach would have among the People, and to engage the Engliſh openly to declare for him, in a belief that he was attended with greater Force. This Trial ſucceeded beyond expectation. When it was known that he was on the Coaſt, the People riſe in ſeveral Parts, not conſidering whether the Aid which appeared was ſufficient to protect them; and this readineſs determined the Duke to puſh his Enterprize farther. In the beginning of July (3), he landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, where the Earl of Northumberland and Henry Percy his Son (4) immediately joined him with ſome Troops. After this Junction, the concourſe of People, flocking in Crowds to liſt under his Banners, was ſo great, that in a few days his Army was threeſcore thouſand ſtrong. So eager were the Nobles and People to put themſelves under the Protection of a Prince, who ſtood himſelf in ſo great need of their Aſſiſtance.

As ſoon as the Duke of York, Regent of the Kingdom, heard of the Duke's Landing, he called a Council (5) to conſider of the neceſſary Meaſures on this occaſion. But the hourly News of the increaſe of the Duke's Forces, and the Diſpoſition of the Kingdom, quickly made the Counſellors, among whom there were few Perſons of Abilities, deſpair of being able to remedy the Evil. In this perplexity, they committed a capital Fault, in reſolving to quit London and retire to St. Albans. This imprudent Step was extremely prejudicial to the King's Affairs. The Lords of the Council were no ſooner departed from London, but the Citizens, no longer reſtrained by the Preſence of thoſe who repreſented the King's Perſon, declared for the Duke, and by their Example, drew in ſuch Towns, as would not yet have ventured to proceed ſo far.

London declares for the Duke.

Mean time the Duke, who, at his Arrival in England, had taken the Title of Duke of Lancaſter, publiſhed a Manifeſto, ſetting forth, without ſhewing he had any Deſign upon the Crown, that he had taken Arms purely to obtain Satisfaction for all the Injuſtices done him. This Manifeſto produced ſo great an Effect, that when the Regent would have iſſued out Commiſſions to levy Troops, he hardly found any willing to accept them. Every one ſaid publickly, he did not care to oppoſe the lawful Pretenſions of a Prince ſo unjuſtly oppreſſed. This Refuſal convincing the Earl of Wiltſhire, and the reſt of the Miniſtry, that inſtead of being able to ſupport their Authority, they ran the hazard of ſeeing themſelves ſacrificed to the publick Hatred, they deſerted the Duke of York and retired to Briſtol Caſtle. After the Flight of the Counſellors, the Regent perceiving there was no ſtemming the Torrent, threw up the care of the publick Affairs, and withdrew to his own Houſe, leaving the Kingdom like a Ship expoſed to the Winds and Waves, without Pilot or Mariners. All the other Lords, who had as yet remained Neuter, in order to join the ſtrongeſt Party, finding the King's Intereſt abandoned, no longer deferred openly declaring for the Duke.

Mean while, the Duke improving theſe Advantages, marched with all ſpeed to London, where the Citizens had invited him. He was triumphantly received in that noble City, with all the Demonſtrations of Zeal and Affection, which could be given by a People extremely incenſed againſt their Sovereign, and conſidering themſelves as delivered from Tyranny. But how pleaſing ſoever the Honours he received from the Londoners might be, he ſtaid no longer than was neceſſary to ſecure their Allegiance; after which he marched directly towards Briſtol. Upon his arrival, the Gates being opened to him with joy, he commanded the Caſtle to be aſſaulted, where the Counſellors were retired. The Siege was puſhed ſo vigorouſly, that in four days the Beſieged were forced to ſurrender at Diſcretion. The People's Fury againſt the Earl of Wiltſhire and his Companions was ſo violent, that the Duke thought he could not refuſe them the Satisfaction to ſee theſe odious Miniſters ſacrificed to their Vengeance. So without conſidering the Power he aſſumed was ſtill more illegal than the King's Uſurpations, he ordered the Earl of Wiltſhire to be beheaded, with ſome others of the Council (6), to ſatisfy the People who loudly called for their Death. The happy Succeſs of this Expedition made the whole Kingdom embrace the Duke's Party, and ſhortly after he had the Satisfaction to ſee his Uncle the Duke of York come and aſſiſt him with his Counſels.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting in England, Richard was in Ireland in a perfect ſecurity. The contrary Winds which continued to blow above three Weeks, hindered his receiving any News. When he heard of the Duke of Lancaſter's Deſcent, he impriſoned his Brothers, with the Duke of Gloceſter's Sons, and reſolved to go immediately into England, and fight his Enemy. But the Duke of Albemarle adviſed him to a ſtay few days, to have time to prepare Ships to tranſport all his Forces at once. He took this fatal Advice, which compleated his Ruin, ſince every Moment is precious at ſuch a juncture. And indeed, it was during that time that London declared for the Duke, which perhaps would not have been, had the King been known to be in England, with a Reſolution vigorouſly to oppoſe the Deſigns of his Enemies. Richard being determined to ſtay ſome days longer in Ireland, ſent the Earl of Salisbury before, to levy Troops in Wales, aſſuring him he would quickly follow him (7). The Earl uſed ſuch Expedition, that in a few days he aſſembled an Army of forty thouſand Men, the Welſh and Cheſhire Men zealouſly taking Arms for the King. If Richard had arrived with his Forces by the time he had promiſed, he might at leaſt have had the Satisfaction, of trying the fortune of a Battle in Defence of his Crown. But the Wind returning to the Eaſt, detained him eighteen days longer in Ireland, and would not permit him to make ſo ſhort a Paſſage. During that time a Rumour being ſpread in the Earl of Salisbury's Army, that the King was dead in Ireland, the Troops would have diſbanded themſelves. It was with great difficulty the Earl prevailed with them to ſtay a few days, in order to have certain News of the King. This Delay being expired, and Richard not appearing, the Welſh and Cheſhire Men deſerted their Colours, and retired to their Homes.

1399. when he heard that he had loſt that Refuge, and all the Nobility had declared againſt him, that his Miniſters were beheaded at Briſtol, and the People ardently eſpouſed the Duke of Lancaſter's Quarrel, he knew not what Courſe to take, all that were propoſed appearing equally dangerous. The Officers and Soldiers would have had him put himſelf at their head, and give his Enemy Battle. They promiſed to ſpill the laſt drop of their Blood in his Defence, and inſpired him with hopes that his Army would daily increaſe in his March, by the junction of thoſe, who through Force, or the belief of his Death, had deſerted him. Some adviſed him to return, and fortify himſelf in Ireland. Others were of opinion, that he ſhould fly for Refuge into France, to the King his Father-in-law, till a more favourable Seaſon afforded him an opportunity to return to his Dominions. Amidſt theſe Uncertainties, the unfortunate King, incapable of chuſing the beſt Advice, and having none about him but ſuch as wanted Courage or Capacity, could not come to any Reſolution. However as he diſtruſted every Body, he could not long remain in a Situation which ſeemed to him ſo very dangerous. On a ſudden, without adviſing with any Perſon, he privately withdrew from his Army in the Night, and ſhut himſelf up in Conway Caſtle, which was deemed impregnable, but at that time unprovided of all things. He had no ſooner diſappeared, but the Lord Thomas Percy, Earl of Worceſter, Maſter of the Houſhold, broke his White-Staff (1) before the King's Domeſticks, and went to meet the Duke of Lancaſter, who was advancing towards Cheſter at the head of his Army.

He goes to Conway Caſtle. Walſing.

Richard finding himſelf almoſt alone in the Caſtle he had choſen for his Sanctuary, without any proſpect of being able to defend himſelf, was afraid, if he attempted to eſcape, of falling into the hands of an enraged People, who gave him but too many Proofs of their Hatred. In this extremity, he ſaw no other Remedy but to throw himſelf upon the Generoſity of his Enemy. He ſent him word by one of his Attendants, that he was ready to ſubmit to what Terms he himſelf ſhould judge reaſonable, and deſired him to ſend ſome Perſon to confer with him. The Duke immediately diſpatched the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Earl of Northumberland, both ſworn Enemies of the King (2), to know his Intentions. In the ſhort Conference with theſe Deputies, Richard offered, if his Life were ſecured, with an honourable Penſion for himſelf and eight Perſons (3) he ſhould name, to reſign his Crown, and be content to lead the Reſidue of his Days like a private Perſon. The Deputies giving him hopes his Offer would be accepted, he deſired to confer with the Duke himſelf. To that purpoſe he went to Flint, not above ten Miles from Cheſter, where the Duke was now arrived. Next day the Duke being come to Flint, went to the King, who ſaid to him with a chearful Countenance: "Couſin of Lancaſter, you are welcome." Then the Duke thrice bowing to the Ground, replied, "My Lord the King, I am come ſooner than you appointed me, becauſe the common Fame of your People is, that you have for this one and twenty Years governed very ill, and rigorouſly, with which they are not at all ſatisfied; but if it pleaſe God, I will help you to govern them better for the future." To which the King only returned, Fair Couſin, ſince it pleaſes you, it pleaſes us too (4). Some add, that Richard intreated the Duke, in very ſubmiſſive Terms, not to touch his Life, in conſideration of his having ſpared his Brothers, whom he had only confined in Ireland, and that the Duke gave him a poſitive Promiſe he would not. There are Hiſtorians who ſay, that Richard was betrayed by the Earl of Northumberland, who perſuading him to demand this Conference, laid an Ambuſh for him in the way, and carried him Priſoner to the Duke. Be that as it will the two Princes went the ſame day (5) and lodged at Cheſter, from whence they ſet out together for London.

The King propoſes an Accommodation.

He offers to reſign his Crown. Walſing.

Interview of the King and Duke. Idem.

Chron. Lambeth.

They go together to London.

Upon their Approach, the Londoners came out in crowds, to receive, the one with a thouſand Curſes, and the other with exceſſive Applauſes and Commendations. Then the King was conducted to the Tower, and confined there, whilſt the Duke took meaſures with his Friends to complete his Work. The ſuddenneſs of this Revolution, and the Duke of Lancaſter's Diligence in traverſing ſo many Counties are very ſurpriſing. If it is conſidered that in ſeven and forty days, he marched from Ravenſpur, where he landed, to London, Briſtol, Cheſter, and from thence back to London, it will hardly be conceivable, that an Army of ſixty thouſand Men could poſſibly run over ſo much Ground in ſo ſhort a Space (6).

1399. Richard is confined in the Tower.

The moment the Duke had got the King in his Power, he took care to cauſe him to ſummon a Parliament at London, that no time might be loſt. In the Conferences he had with his Friends, before the meeting of the Parliament, the Queſtion was not ſo much concerning what was to be done, ſince the placing him upon the Throne was reſolved, as how to proceed. Some were for his taking poſſeſſion, upon Richard's bare Promiſe of reſigning the Crown. Others thought, the Promiſe appeared too conſtrained to be the Foundation of any Right, and the more, as there was a nearer Heir than the Duke. This was Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, Son of that Roger who was declared Richard's preſumptive Succeſſor. The Truth is, he was deſcended from Lionel, Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, whereas the Duke of Lancaſter was Son of John, younger Brother of Lionel. Though Edmund's Right was only derived from a Woman, that would have been no Objection, provided the uſual Practice had been obſerved, ſince there was no ſuch thing in England as the Salic Law. Thus by Richard's Reſignation, the Duke of Lancaſter had no Right to claim the Crown. For this Reaſon they added, that ſince there was a neceſſity of ſetting aſide the Law, the Authority of Parliament was abſolutely requiſite. Hence they concluded that Richard muſt be formally depoſed, and the Duke elected by the ſame Authority. This Opinion had likewiſe Difficulties, as it aſcribed to the Parliament a Power to diſpoſe of the Crown, contrary to the Laws and Cuſtoms, to the prejudice of the lawful Heir, to whom nothing could be objected to weaken his Title. At laſt, after many Debates upon ſo nice a Point, it was the Duke of York's Opinion to unite the three ways propoſed, in order to give the more Strength to what they had reſolved. In the firſt place, Richard ſhould be obliged to make an abſolute Reſignation. Secondly, the Parliament ſhould proceed to depoſe him before the Crown was diſpoſed of. Laſtly, theſe two Steps being taken, and the Throne declared vacant, the ſame Parliament, in conſideration of the Duke of Lancaſter's great Service to the State, ſhould adjudge him the Crown by their ſupreme Authority, which, in extraordinary Caſes, was ſuperior to the Laws. This Opinion was unanimouſly approved. Thus in puniſhing a King for ſetting himſelf above the Laws, a Power was given the Parliament no leſs contrary to them. So difficult it is on ſuch occaſions to keep within the Bounds of Juſtice and Equity. This Expedient, then thought proper to reſtore the Peace of the Kingdom, proved the real Source of the Calamities which afterwards afflicted the Nation, when theſe violent Proceedings ſeemed to be entirely forgotten. The Deſcendants of the Duke of York, who propoſed this Opinion, found it their Intereſt to deſtroy the Foundation on which it was built, and maintain that the Parliament had exceeded their Power, in transferring the Crown to the Houſe of Lancaſter.

The Duke of York's Propoſal is followed.

Purſuant to the Reſolutions the Duke of Lancaſter had taken with his Friends, he repaired to the Tower, the Day before the opening of the Parliament (7), attended by a great number of Lords. There, in the preſence of all, Richard delivered up the Crown and Scepter, with the other Enſigns of Royalty, and by an Inſtrument ſigned with his own Hand, confeſſed himſelf unworthy and unfit to govern any longer (8). Next Day the Parliament being 1399. being met, the Inſtrument of Reſignation was produced, and approved by unanimous Conſent. But as this Reſignation alone, according to the Meaſures agreed upon, did not appear ſufficient, the two Houſes ordered Articles of Accuſation againſt Richard to be drawn up, to ſerve for reaſons of his Depoſition, to which they intended to proceed. The Articles were as follow (1):

Articles of Accuſation againſt Richard. Rot. Par. 1 Hen. IV. n. 10. X. Scriptor. Col. 2743, &c.

" I. It is objected to King Richard, That for his evil " Government, by giving the Goods and Poſſeſſions of " the Crown to unworthy Perſons, and indiſcreetly diſ- " ſipating of them; and for this cauſe impoſing grievous " and intolerable Burthens upon the People, and other- " wiſe committing other innumerable Evils: Having, " by his Aſſent and Command, by the whole Parliament, " choſen and aſſigned certain Prelates and other Lords " Temporal, who with all their Power ſhould faithfully " labour, at their own Coſts, about the juſt Government " of the Kingdom, made a Conventicle of his Accom- " plices, propoſing to impeach of high Treaſon the ſaid " Lords Spiritual and Temporal, ſo employed about the " Government of the Kingdom, and violently drew the " Juſtices of the Kingdom to confirm his wicked purpoſe, " for fear of Death and Torment of Body, endeavouring " to deſtroy the ſaid Lords.

" II. The ſame King lately at Shrewsbury, cauſed to " come before him, and others that favoured him, in a " Chamber, many Perſons, and the greater Part of the " Juſtices, where, by Threats, and divers Terrors, he " induced, cauſed, and forced them ſingly to anſwer to " certain Queſtions on his behalf, touching the Laws of " his Kingdom, againſt their Will, and otherwiſe than " they would have anſwered, had they not been forced; " by colour of which anſwers the ſame King propounded " to have proceeded to the Deſtruction of Thomas Duke " of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and " other Lords, with whom he was very angry, eſpecially " becauſe they deſired him to be under good Govern- " ment; but by divine Providence, and the Reſiſtance " and Power of the ſaid Lords, the King could not bring " his Deſign to effect.

" III. When the Lords Temporal, in defence of them- " ſelves, reſiſted his Malice and Craft, the ſaid King pre- " fixed a Day for the Parliament to do them and others " Juſtice, who upon Faith and Confidence therein, re- " mained quietly in their own Houſes; the King privately, " with his Letters or Commiſſion, ſent the Duke of Ire- " land into Cheſhire, to raiſe Arms againſt the ſaid Lords, " Great Men, and Officers of the Common-wealth, " publickly erecting his Banners againſt the Peace he had " ſworn to, from whence Murders, Captivities, Diſſen- " ſions, and other infinite Evils followed in the whole " Kingdom, for which cauſe he incurred Perjury.

" IV. That although the ſaid King had pardoned the " Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, " and all their Aſſiſtants in full Parliament, and for many " Years had ſhewn chearful Signs of Peace and Love to- " wards them; yet the ſame King always bearing Gall in " his Heart, taking opportunity, cauſed to be ſeized the " Duke of Gloceſter, and the ſaid Earls of Arundel and " Warwick; and ſent the Duke to Calais, to be impri- " ſoned under the keeping of the Earl of Nottingham, one " of his Appellants; and without Anſwer, or lawful Pro- " ceſs, cauſed him to be ſtrangled, and inhumanly and " cruelly murdered. The Earl of Arundel pleading his " Charter of Pardon, and demanding Juſtice in Parlia- " ment, was encompaſſed with great Numbers of armed " Men, and had his Head damnably ſtruck off; and com- " mitted the Earl of Warwick and Lord Cobham to per- " petual Priſon; confiſcating their Lands, againſt Juſtice, " the Laws of the Land, and his expreſs Oath, giving " them to their Appellants.

" V. At the time when in his Parliament he cauſed " the Duke of Gloceſter, and Earls of Arundel and War- " wick, to be adjudged; that he might more freely exer- " ciſe his Cruelty upon them, and in others fulfil his inju- " rious Will, he drew to him a great Multitude of Male- " factors out of the County of Cheſter, who marching up " and down the Kingdom with the King, as well within " his own Houſe, as without, cruelly killed his Lieges, " beat and wounded others, plundering the Goods of the " People, refuſing to pay for their Victuals, violating " and raviſhing Men's Wives, and other Women. And " although Complaints were made to the King of theſe " Exceſſes, yet he took no care to apply Remedy, or do " Juſtice in them; but favoured thoſe People in their " Wickedneſs, confiding in them and their Aſſiſtance " againſt all others of his Kingdom; wherefore his good " Subjects had great matter of Commotion and Indigna- " tion. 1399.

" VI. Though the ſaid King cauſed Proclamation to " be made through the Kingdom, That he cauſed his " Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Arundel " and Warwick, to be arreſted not for any rebellious Con- " gregations, or marching with Horſe within the King- " dom; but for many Extortions, Oppreſſions, and other " things done againſt his Regality and Royal Majeſty; " and that it was not his Intention, that any of their " Company at the time of the Congregation and March- " ing with Horſe aforeſaid, ſhould for that reaſon be que- " ſtioned or diſturbed: Yet the ſame King afterwards, in " his Parliament, impeached the ſaid Lords, not for Ex- " tortions, Oppreſſions, or other things aforeſaid; but for " rebellious Tumults, and Congregations and Marching " with Horſe, adjudged them to Death; and cauſed many " of their Company for fear of Death, to make Fine and " Ranſom as Traitors, to the great Deſtruction of many " of his People; and ſo he craftily, deceitfully and ma- " liciouſly deceived the Lords, their Followers, and Peo- " ple of the Nation.

" VII. After many of theſe Perſons had paid their " Fines and Ranſoms, and had obtained his Letters Pa- " tents of full Pardon; yet they received no Benefit by " them, until they made new Fines for their Lives, " by which they were much impoveriſhed: and this was " much in derogation to the Name and State of a " King.

" VIII. In the laſt Parliament holden at Shrewsbury, " the ſame King propounding to oppreſs his People, " ſubtilly procured and cauſed to be granted, that the " Power of Parliament, by conſent of all the States of " the Kingdom, ſhould remain in ſome certain Perſons, " who, after the Parliament ſhould be diſſolved, might " anſwer the Petitions depending in Parliament, then " undetermined, under pretence whereof they proceeded " to other general Matters touching that Parliament, " according to the King's Will, in derogation to the " State of Parliament, great Diſadvantage to the King- " dom, and a pernicious Example. And that theſe Ac- " tions might ſeem to have ſome Colour and Authority, " the King cauſed the Rolls of Parliament to be changed " and blotted, contrary to the Effect of the Grant afore- " ſaid.

" IX. Notwithſtanding the ſaid King at his Coronation " ſwore, That he would do in all his Judgments, equal " and right Juſtice and Diſcretion, in Mercy and Truth, " according to his Power; yet the ſaid King, without " all mercy, rigorouſly, amongſt other things, ordained, " under great Puniſhments, That no Man ſhould inter- " cede with him, for any favour towards Henry Duke of " Lancaſter, then in Baniſhment; in ſo doing, he acted " againſt the Bond of Charity, and raſhly violated his " Oath.

" X. That though the Crown of England, the Rights " of the Crown, and Kingdom itſelf, have been in all " times ſo free, as the Pope, or any other foreign Power, " had nothing to do in them; yet the ſaid King, for " the confirming of his erroneous Statutes, ſupplicated the " Pope to confirm the Statutes made in his laſt Parlia- " ment; whereupon he obtained his Apoſtolic Letters, or " Bull, wherein were contained grievous Cenſures againſt " all ſuch as ſhould preſume to contravene them. All " which things are known to be againſt the Crown and " Royal Dignity, and againſt the Statutes and Liberty of " the Kingdom.

" XI. Though Henry, now Duke of Lancaſter, by the " King's Command, exhibited his Bill of Accuſation againſt " the Duke of Norfolk, concerning the State and Honour " of the King, and duly proſecuted it, ſo as he was ready to " make it good by Duel, and the King had ordered it; yet " the ſame King put it by, and without any lawful Cauſe " baniſhed the Duke of Lancaſter for ten years, againſt all " Juſtice, the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, and the " Military Law, damnably incurring Perjury.

" XII. After the ſaid King had graciouſly granted to " the now Duke of Lancaſter, by his Letters Patents,

" ſame or any of them; alſo the Government and Adminiſtration of the ſaid Kingdoms and Lordſhip, and all mere and mixt Empire in the ſame; and " to all Honour and Royalty therein, ſaving to my Succeſſors Kings of England, in the Kingdoms, Dominions, and Premiſſes, for ever their competent " Rights. And I do confeſs, acknowledge, repute, and truly of certain Knowledge, judge myſelf to be inſufficient for the Government of the ſaid King- " doms and Dominions, and for my notorious Demerits not unworthily depoſed. And I ſwear by theſe Holy Goſpels of God by me corporally touched, " That I never will contravene this Reſignation, Renunciation, Dimiſſion, and Ceſſion, or will any way oppoſe them in Word or Deed, by myſelf or others, " nor will ſuffer them to be oppoſed or contravened, as much as in me is, publickly or privately, but the ſame Renunciation, Reſignation, Dimiſſion, and " Ceſſion, will for ever hold firm, and will firmly hold and obſerve them in the whole and every part, as God and his Goſpels help me."

(1) Inſtead of the imperfect Abſtract given of theſe Articles by Mr. Rapin, it has been thought proper to inſert them all at length, tranſlated from the authentick Copy of the Roll of Parliament, printed at the end of Decem Scriptores, Col. 2743, &c.

1399. " That while he was in Baniſhment his Attorneys might " ſue for Livery of any Inheritance that might fall to him " for which Homage was due, which ſhould be reſpited for " a reaſonable Fine; he injuriouſly revoked thoſe Letters " Patents, againſt the Laws of the Land, incurring Per- " jury.

" XIII. Notwithſtanding it had been ordained, That " every Year the King's Officers, with the Juſtices, and " others of his Council, ſhould nominate and chuſe the " Sheriffs of all Counties according to their Diſcretion; " yet he commanded others of his Party, and ſuch as " would do as he would have them, to be Sheriffs; " to the great Grievance of his People, contrary to " the Laws of his Kingdom, notoriouſly incurring Per- " jury.

" XIV. That whereas the ſaid King borrowed ſeveral " Sums of Money from Lords and others by his Letters " Patents, promiſing faithfully to pay them at a certain " Term; he did not perform his Promiſe; whence his " Creditors were much grieved; and not only they, but " many others thought him an unfaithful King.

" XV. Whereas the Kings of England uſed to live " upon the Revenues of the Kingdom, and Patrimony of " the Crown in time of Peace, without Oppreſſion of his " People; that the ſame King during his whole time, " gave the greateſt part of his Revenue to unworthy Per- " ſons, and impoſed Burthens upon his Subjects as it were " every Year; by which he exceſſively oppreſſed his Peo- " ple, and impoveriſhed his Kingdom, not employing theſe " Goods to the Advantage of the Nation, but prodigally " waſting them in Oſtentation, Pomp, and Glory, ow- " ing great Sums for Victuals and other Neceſſaries of his " Houſe, though his Revenues were greater than any of " his Progenitors.

" XVI. The ſame King not willing to keep and pro- " tect the juſt Laws and Cuſtoms of his Kingdom, but " do what he pleaſed, when thoſe Laws were declared " to him by the Juſtices and others of his Council, de- " ſiring Juſtice might be done accordingly, he ſaid ex- " preſly with an auſtere countenance, That the Laws " were only in his Mouth and Breaſt: and that he only " could make and change the Laws of this Kingdom. " and being ſo ſeduced, he would not permit Juſtice to be " done to many of his Lieges, but by threats and Ter- " rors, forced many to ceaſe from the Proſecution of com- " mon Juſtice.

" XVII. That whereas Laws made in Parliament do " always bind, until revoked by another Parliament, yet " the ſame King, deſiring to enjoy ſuch Liberty as no " Laws might bind him, and to do what he pleaſed, he " cunningly procured ſuch a Petition, on behalf of the " Community of his Kingdom, to be exhibited in Par- " liament, and to be granted, That he might be as free " as any of his Progenitors before him. By colour of " which Petition and Grant, he often commanded, and " cauſed many things to be done contrary to the Laws " not revoked, doing expreſly and knowingly againſt the " Oath taken at his Coronation.

" XVIII. Though it had been ordained, That no " Sheriff ſhould continue in his Office above a Year, and " could not be again choſen to that Office in three Years " after, the ſame King, for his ſingular Profit, and ſome- " times for the Benefit of others, ſuffered ſome Sheriffs to " remain in their Offices for two or three Years, con- " trary to the Tenor and Effect of the Statute, incur- " ring Perjury; and this was notorious, publick, and " famous.

" XIX. Although by Law and Cuſtom, the People " ought to be free to chuſe Knights to repreſent them in " Parliament, to propound their Grievances, and pro- " vide Remedies for them; yet the ſaid King, that he " might obtain his own raſh Will in his Parliaments, " directed by Writs often to the Sheriffs, to ſend ſuch as " he named, ſome of whom he induced by Favors, " others by Threats and Terrors, others by Bribes, to " conſent to things prejudicial to the Kingdom, and grie- " vous to the People; and eſpecially by granting to " him the Subſidy of Wool for his Life, and another " Subſidy for certain Years, too much oppreſſing the " People.

" XX. The ſame King, that in all things he might " act Arbitrarily, unlawfully made and commanded all " the Sheriffs to ſwear beyond their uſual Oath, That " they would obey all his Commands ſent to them under " the Great Seal, Privy Seal, or Signet; and in caſe " they ſhould know any in their Bailiwicks or Juriſ- " dictions, that ſhould ſpeak any ill publickly or privately, " to the diſgrace or ſcandal of the King's Perſon, they " ſhould arreſt and commit them to Priſon, there to re- " main while they received other Commands from the " King, as it might be found upon Record; which " Practice might likely tend to the Deſtruction of many 1399. " of his Subject.

" XXI. The ſame King, that he might ſupplant his " People, and get their Eſtates to enrich himſelf, cauſed " the People of ſixteen Counties, by Letters under their " Seals, to ſubmit to him as Traitors; by colour of " which, he obtained of them great Sums of Money to " procure his Favour: And although to pleaſe the People, " thoſe Letters Obligatory were reſtored to them; yet " their Procurators had full Power to bind themſelves for " them to the King, which he cauſed to be done; and " ſo deceived his People, and ſubtilly extorted their Goods " from them.

" XXII. Although the ſame King ſware at his Coro- " nation, to preſerve the Liberties granted to the Church " of England; yet by reaſon of his Voyage into Ire- " land, he by his Letters, commanded many religious " Perſons, Abbots, and Priors, ſome to ſend him Horſes, " others Waggons, others great Sums of Money; and " by his way of writing, he forced many by Fear, to " comply with his Demands; whence they were im- " poveriſhed and oppreſſed, in manifeſt derogation to " Eccleſiaſtick Liberty; by which pretext he incurred Per- " jury.

" XXIII. In many great Councils, when the Lords " and Juſtices were charged to counſel him faithfully, in " things that touched his own, and the State of the King- " dom, they were often ſo ſharply rebuked and reproved, " that they durſt not ſpeak Truth, in giving Advice con- " cerning the State of the Kingdom.

" XXIV. The Treaſurer Reliques and Jewels of the " Crown, which ought to be preſerved in the Treaſury, " for the Honour of the King, and Conſervation of the " Kingdom, if any thing might happen, the ſaid King " carried with him towards Ireland, without the Con- " ſent of the States of the Kingdom; whence the King- " dom had been greatly impoveriſhed, if God had not " otherwiſe provided for the taking of thoſe Goods from " him againſt his Will. And further, he cauſed the Re- " cords concerning the State and Government of his " Kingdom to be razed, in great prejudice of his Peo- " ple, and diſinheritance of the Crown, and very likely, " as it was believed, for the ſupport of his ill Govern- " ment.

" XXV. He was ſo variable and diſſembling in Words " and Writing, and ſo contrary to himſelf, eſpecially in " writing to the Pope, Kings, and other Lords, without " and within the Kingdom, and alſo to his Subjects, that " no Man living, knowing what he was could confide in " him; yea he was reputed ſo unfaithful and inconſtant, " that he was not only a ſcandal to his own Perſon, but " to the whole Kingdom, and all Strangers that knew " him.

" XXVI. Though the Lands, Tenements, Goods, and " Chattels of all Freemen, by the Laws of the Land, " ought not to be ſeized without Forfeiture; yet the ſaid " King intending to enervate thoſe Laws in the preſence " of many Lords, and others of the Community of the " Kingdom, he often ſaid and affirmed, That the Life " of every Subject, his Lands, Tenements, Goods, and " Chattels, were his, to be diſpoſed as he pleaſed without " forfeiture; which was altogether againſt the Laws and " Cuſtoms of his Kingdom.

" XXVII. Although it had been made a Law, which " had hitherto been confirmed, That no Freeman might " be taken, &c. nor any ways deſtroyed, nor that the " King ſhould proceed againſt him, but by lawful Trial " of his Peers, or the Law of the Land; yet according " to the Will, Command, and Appointment of the ſaid " King, very many of his Lieges being maliciouſly ac- " cuſed, for having ſpoke publickly, or privately, Words " that might tend to the ſcandal and diſgrace of the " King's Perſon, were taken, impriſoned, and brought " before the Conſtable and Marſhal in the Court Mili- " tary; where being accuſed, they could not be ad- " mitted to give any other Anſwer, than Not Guilty; " and could defend themſelves no otherwiſe than by their " Bodies, their Accuſers being young Men, luſty, and " ſound; whereas they were old, impotent, lame, and " infirm; from whence not only the deſtruction of " Lords and great Men, but of ſingular Perſons of the " Community of the Kingdom very likely might have " followed: When therefore the ſaid King willingly " contravened this Law, no doubt he incurred Per- " jury.

" XXVIII. Although the People of England, by vir- " tue of their Liegeance, were ſufficiently bound to their " King, and if they offended in any manner, he might " correct and puniſh them by the Laws and Cuſtoms of " the Kingdom; yet the ſaid King deſiring to ſupplant, " and too much oppreſs his People, that he might more 1399. " freely execute, and be able to follow the fancy of his " fooliſh and unlawful Will, he ſent his Letters into all " Counties of his Kingdom, that all his Lieges, as well " Spiritual as Temporal, ſhould take certain Oaths in " general, which were too burthenſome to them, and " which very likely might cauſe the final Deſtruction of " his People, and that under their Letters and Seals they " ſhould confirm theſe Oaths; which Command the Peo- " ple obeyed, leſt they ſhould incur his Indignation, and " for fear of Death.

" XXIX. When the Parties contending in the Eccle- " ſiaſtick Court, in Cauſes merely Eccleſiaſtick and Spi- " ritual, endeavoured to procure Prohibitions to hinder " Proceſs in the ſame, from the Chancellor of England, " who out of Juſtice refuſed to grant them, yet the ſame " King often granted them under his Signet, wickedly " infringing the Church Liberties granted in Magna " Charta, which he had ſworn to preſerve, damnably " incurring Perjury, and the ſentence of Excommunica- " tion pronounced by the Holy Fathers againſt the Viola- " tors of Church Liberties.

" XXX. The ſaid King in Parliament, compaſſed " about with armed Men, without reaſonable Cauſe or " legal Proceſs, contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom, " baniſhed Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and " his Spiritual Father, being then abſent by his Contri- " vance.

" XXXI. Upon peruſal of the ſaid King's Will under " his Great Seal, Privy Seal, and Signet, there was in it " this Clauſe: Alſo we Will, that the Debts of our Houſe, " Chamber, and Wardrobe being paid, for which we " allow twenty thouſand Pounds, and the Leproſe, and " Chaplains we appointed to be maintained at Weſtmin- " ſter, and Bermondſey, for which we allow five or ſix " thouſand Marks, the Reſidue of our Gold ſhall re- " main to our Succeſſor, upon condition he approves, ra- " tifies, confirms, holds, and cauſeth to be holden and " obſerved, all Laws, Statutes, Ordinances and Judg- " ments, made, had, or done, in the Parliament held at " Weſtminſter, on the 17th of September, in the 21ſt of " our Reign, and continued or adjourned to Shrewsbury, " and all things done at Coventry, on the 16th of Sep- " tember, in the 22d of our Reign, as alſo what was " done at Weſtminſter, on the 18th of March, in the " ſame Year, by Authority of the ſame Parliament. " But if he ſhall refuſe to do theſe things, then we " will that Thomas Duke of Surrey, Edward Duke of " Aumarle, John Duke of Exeter, and William le Scrope " Earl of Wiltſhire, my Debts, &c. as aforeſaid, being " paid, ſhall have the ſaid Reſidue for the Defence of " the Statutes, Ordinances, Judgments, and Stabiliments " aforeſaid, to the utmoſt of their Power, yea, to Death, " if it be neceſſary. Upon all which things we burthen " their Conſciences, as they will anſwer it at the Day " of Judgment." By which Article it appears evidently, That the ſame King endeavoured pertinaciouſly to main- tain thoſe Statutes and Ordinances, which were erroneous, wicked, and repugnant to all Law and Reaſon, not only in his Life, but after he was dead, neither regarding the Danger of his Soul, or the utmoſt Deſtruction of his King- dom or liege People.

" XXXII. In the eleventh Year of the ſaid King " Richard, at his Manor of Langley, in the preſence of the " Dukes of Lancaſter and York, and many other Lords, " deſiring, as it ſeemed, that his Uncle the Duke of Glo- " ceſter, there alſo preſent, might truſt and have Confi- " dence in him, of his own accord, ſware upon the ve- " nerable Sacrament of the Lord's Body placed upon the " Altar, that he would pardon unto him all things which " were ſaid to be committed againſt his Perſon, and that " he ſhould never receive any Damage for them; yet " afterwards the ſaid King, notwithſtanding this Oath, " cauſed the Duke for thoſe Offences horribly and cru- " elly to be murdered, damnably incurring the Guilt of " Perjury.

" XXXIII. After a Knight of the Shire, who had a " Vote in Parliament, impeached the Archbiſhop of Can- " terbury, publickly before the King and all the States 1399. " of the Kingdom, upon certain Defects committed " againſt the King, with little Truth, as it was ſaid; " Although he offered preſently to anſwer what was ob- " jected againſt him, and deſired to be admitted by the " King ſo to do, ſufficiently truſting, as he ſaid, to de- " monſtrate his Innocency, yet the ſame King contriv- " ing by all the ways and means he could, to oppreſs " and reduce to nothing the State of the Archbiſhop, as " the Event ſhewed, kindly ſpake to, and earneſtly de- " ſired him, that he would ſay nothing then, but expect " a more fit time: That day being paſt, for five days " and more together, the King deceived him, adviſing " and perſuading him not to come to Parliament, but to " remain at his own Houſe, promiſing, that in his Ab- " ſence he ſhould not receive Injury; but the ſaid King " in that Parliament, baniſhed the Archbiſhop during " his Pleaſure, being abſent, and not called to anſwer, " without any reaſonable Cauſe, confiſcating all his Goods " againſt the Laws of the Land and all Juſtice, by which " he incurred Perjury. Further, the King intending to " palliate his Inconſtancy, by flattering Words, endea- " voured to caſt the Injury done him upon others: " Whence the Archbiſhop having diſcourſe with the " King, the Duke of Norfolk, other Lords, and great " Men lamenting ſaid, he was not the firſt that had been " baniſhed, nor ſhould be the laſt, for that he thought " within a ſhort time the Duke of Norfolk, and other " Lords would follow him; and conſtantly told the " King, that the Conſequences of the Premiſes would " fall upon his own Head at laſt: To which the King, " as if he had been aſtoniſhed, preſently anſwered, he " thought it might ſo happen, he might be expelled his " Kingdom by his Subjects; and farther ſaid, if it ſhould " be ſo, he would go to the Place where he was; and " that the Archbiſhop might believe him, he ſhewed him " a great Jewel of Gold, which he would ſend to him " as a Token, that he would not defer his coming to the " Place where he was. And that the ſame Archbiſhop " might have greater Confidence in him, he ſent to him, " adviſing him, that he ſhould privately ſend all the Jew- " els belonging to his Chapel to be ſafely kept, leſt un- " der the colour of the Judgment of Baniſhment, they " might be ſeized; it being ſo done, the King cauſed " the Goods to be put in Coffers, which he cauſed to be " locked, and ſealed by one of the Archbiſhop's Clerks, " by whom he ſent the Keys to him; and afterwards " cauſed the Coffers to be broken, taking the Goods, " and diſpoſing of them as he pleaſed; the ſame King " alſo faithfully promiſed the Archbiſhop, that if he " would go to the Port of Hampton, in order to go out " of the Kingdom, that by the Queen's Interceſſion he " ſhould be recalled; and if it ſhould ſo happen as he " ſhould go out of the Kingdom, yet after Eaſter next " coming, without fail, he ſhould return into England, " nor ſhould he any way loſe his Archbiſhoprick: This " he faithfully promiſed, ſwearing to it, touching the " Croſs of Thomas the Martyr, Archbiſhop of Canter- " bury: Which Promiſes notwithſtanding, the King " cauſed the Archbiſhop to go out of the Kingdom, and " wrote to the Pope for his Tranſlation; and thus, and " otherwiſe, by the Frauds and Cheats of the King, was " the Archbiſhop, a Man of good Faith, craftily circum- " vented.

Theſe Articles being drawn up, were laid before the Parliament, who with one Voice acknowledged them to be well grounded and publickly known, and pronounced, that Richard ſhould be depoſed. At the ſame time, Com- miſſioners were appointed to give him notice of his Depo- ſition, and to annul the Oaths and Homage of the People of England, after much the ſame manner as in the Caſe of Edward II (1). Richard is depoſed.

This Affair being thus ſettled, and the Throne become vacant, the Duke of Lancaſter roſe up, and after croſſing himſelf, claimed the Crown. He built his Pretenſions, upon his being deſcended from Henry III, and upon the Right The Duke of Lancaſter claims the Crown.

(1) The Biſhop of St. Aſaph, the Abbot of Glaſtonbury, the Earl of Gloceſter, the Lord Berkely, Sir Thomas Erpingham, and Sir Thomas Grey, and William Thyrning Juſtice, were appointed to pronounce Sentence of Depoſition againſt King Richard, which being drawn up in writing, was read by the Biſhop of St. Aſaph as follows: " In the Name of God, Amen. We John Biſhop of St. Aſaph, John Abbot of Glaſtonbury, Thomas Earl of Gloceſter, " Thomas Lord Berkeley, Thomas de Erpyngham, and Thomas Grey, Knights, and William Thyrning Juſticiary, by the Spiritual and Temporal Peers, and " Great Men of the Kingdom of England, and by the Communities of the ſame, repreſenting all States thereof, being ſpecially deputed Commiſſioners " for the things underwritten, duly conſidering the many Perjuries, Cruelty, and many other Crimes committed by King Richard in the time of his " Government, and publickly exhibited and recited before the States, which were ſo publick, notorious, manifeſt, and famous, as they could no way be " denied; and alſo of his Confeſſion, acknowledging, and truly of his own certain knowledge, judging himſelf to have been altogether inſufficient for the " Government of the Kingdoms and Lordſhip aforeſaid; and that for his notorious Demerits he was worthy to be depoſed; which thing by his own Will " and Command were publiſhed before the States. Having had diligent Deliberation upon theſe things, for the greater Caution to the Government of the " Kingdoms, and Dominion aforeſaid, the Rights and Appurtenances of the ſame, in the Name and Authority to us committed, do pronounce, decree, " and declare, that very Richard to be depoſed deſervedly from all Royal Dignity and Honour, and for the like Caution, we depoſe him by our defini- " tive Sentence in this Writing, expreſly inhibiting all and ſingular Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Prelates, Dukes, Marquiſſes, Earls, Barons, Knights, Vaſ- " ſals, and Valvaſors, and all other Men and Subjects of the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominion or Places belonging to them, for the future to obey the ſaid " Richard as King." Then the States, that nothing might be wanting, being ſeverally interrogated, did conſtitute certain Perſons to be their Proctors, named by the ſaid Commiſſioners, to go and reſign to King Richard the Homage and Fealty that had been made to him, and give him notice of what had been done touching his Depoſition and Renunciation. *Rot. Remarks upon it.

It was not without reaſon that he affected to make uſe of obſcure Expreſſions, which left undetermined the Foundation on which he built his pretended Right. If he ſeemed to derive his Title from Henry III, rather than from Edward III his Grandfather, it was, becauſe there was a Rumour, that Edmund Earl of Lancaſter, ſirnamed Crouch-Back, was eldeſt Son of Henry III, but by reaſon of his Deformity, Edward I, his younger Brother, was placed on the Throne. According to this Suppoſition, the Duke would have made the Ignorant believe, he could ground his Title upon being Son of Blanch of Lancaſter, Grand-daughter of Edmund Crouch-Back, and Heireſs of that Family. But as he was ſenſible, every Body could not be impoſed upon by ſo groſs a Forgery, he added certain Expreſſions, intimating, that he built his Right alſo upon the Service he had juſt done the State. This is the meaning of the Claim, expreſſed in ſuch obſcure Terms.

As it was reſolved to adjudge the Crown to the Duke, the Parliament took care not to examine his Claim too cloſely, but were very willing to ſuppoſe it unconteſtable. Thus, without any Regard to the juſt Rights of the Earl of March, it was decreed that Henry of Lancaſter ſhould be proclaimed King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, which was done that very Day, being the 30th of September (2). 1399.

End of the Reign of Richard II.

Thus ended the Reign of Richard II, a Prince who in his younger Years ſeemed to have noble and generous Inclinations, but unfortunately ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by Flattery. He had the Advantage of being deſcended from a Father and Grandfather ſo univerſally eſteemed, that had he never ſo little anſwered the Nobleneſs of his Birth, he might have been one of the moſt glorious Kings that ever wore the Engliſh Crown. But like Edward II his Great-grandfather, he had the Weakneſs to give himſelf up to the Guidance of his Favorites. Accordingly he underwent the ſame Fate with that Prince, whom he did but too much reſemble in every other reſpect. The chief Difference to be obſerved between them is, that Richard was of a more cruel and inflexible Temper, and uſurped a more abſolute Power than Edward, which rendered him more odious, and leſs lamented. Let us cloſe this Reign with a Reflection which the ſad Cataſtrophe of theſe two Princes affords; namely, That in a Government like that of England, all the King's Endeavours to uſurp an arbitrary Power, are but ſo many Steps towards his Deſtruction (3).

THE STATE of the CHURCH, FROM THE Reign of EDWARD I, in 1272, to the End of the Reign of RICHARD II, in 1399.

Tyranny of the Court of Rome, with regard to England.

AFTER John Lackland became Vaſſal and Tributary to the See of Rome, the Popes conſidered England only as a conquered Country, for which they had no manner of regard. Of this the Reigns of John and Henry III, afford us ſuch flagrant Inſtances, that it would be needleſs to add any thing to ſhew to what Exceſs the Papal Power was carried in the Kingdom. It will ſuffice to remark, that the Incroachments of the Court of Rome continuing inceſſantly, or rather daily increaſing, the Engliſh grew ſo weary of them, that at length in the Reign of Edward I, they began to ſeek effectual means for their Deliverance. This was not however till after frequent Experience, that all their Complaints and Sollicitations to the Popes were to no purpoſe. Herein chiefly conſiſts what I have to ſay concerning Religion during the four Reigns we have gone through. But to render this matter more intelligible, it will be neceſſary briefly to obſerve the Occaſion of the Diſputes England had, as well with the Court of Rome, as with the Clergy.

Complaints of the Engliſh againſt the Pope. Ryley's Placit. Parl. p. 376. Statutes. Act. Pub. IV. p. 382, 385, &c.

I. The firſt Cauſe of Complaint, was the frequent Appeals to the Court of Rome, not one of which was rejected.

II. The frequent Citations were complained of, cauſed by theſe Appeals, which obliged People to ſpend their Subſtance in Journeys to Rome, to ſollicit their Affairs.

III. That the Pope had uſurped the Collation of almoſt all the Church-Preferments, not excepting the Biſhopricks

(1) He claimed the Crown in the Form following: "In the Name of the Fader, Sonne and Holy Ghoſt, I Henry of Lancaſter chalenge this Rewme of "Yngſonde and the Croune, with all the Membres and the Appurtenances, als I that am deſcendit be ryght Lyne of the Blode, coming fro the gude Lord King "Henry therde, and thorghe that Ryght that God of his grace hath ſent me, with helpe of my kyn and of my friendes to recover it: the which Rewme was "in poynt to be undone for defaut of Governance, and undoying of the gude Lawes."

(2) After all which King Henry ſaid, "Sires, I thank God and Zowe Spirituel and Temporel, and all the aſtates of the Lond, and do zowe to wyte, it "es noght my will that no Man thynk that be waye of conqueſt I wold diſherit any man of his heritage, franches, or other ryghts that him aght to have, "nor put hym out of that that he has, and has had by the gude Lawes and Cuſtumes of the Rewme; except thos perſons that has ben agan the gude purpoſe "and the commune profyt of the Rewme."

(3) In King Richard's Reign, was brought in the Cuſtom of wearing piked Shoes, tied to the Knees with Chains of Silver. Alſo Ladies uſed high Attire on their Heads, piked Horns, with long trained Gowns, and rode on Side-Saddles, after the Example of the Queen, Ann of Bohemia, who firſt brought that Faſhion into this Kingdom; for, before, Women uſed to ride aſtride like Men. Stow's Ann. p. 295.——In 1397. King Richard began repairing Weſtminſter-Hall, and cauſed the Walls, Windows, and Roof to be taken down and new built, with a ſtately Porch, as it now remains. Stow's Survey, B. 6. p. 43. Camden in Middleſex. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. VIII. p. 749.

In the 18th of Richard II, a Pound Weight of Gold of the old Standard was to make by Tale forty five Nobles, amounting to fifteen Pounds, or a proportionable Number of half or quarter Nobles: And a Pound Weight of Silver of the old Sterling, to make by Tale ſeventy five Groſſes or Groats, amounting to twenty five Shillings, or a hundred and fifty half Groſſes, at Two-pence a-piece, or three hundred Sterlings at a Penny a-piece, or ſix hundred half Sterlings: And Nicholas Malakine a Florentine, was Maſter and Worker. Theſe Roſe Nobles (if that in Speed be genuine, for it wants both the Roſe and the conſtant Legend of Jeſus autem, &c.) gives his Portraiture in a ſedentary Poſture, with a Sword in his Right hand, and RICAR. D. GRA. AGLIE. FRANCIE REX. D. AQVIT. On the Reverſe, AVXILIVM. MEVM. A. DOMINO. His Crown is Fleurie, as in thoſe of his Predeceſſors, but no Rays betwixt the Flowers. We ought perhaps to read HYB for AQVIT. ſince it's hard to imagine, why Aquitain ſhould be ſo much as mentioned after France; and AGLIE inſtead of ANGLIE, makes it probable, that this was rather coined by Richard III, (in whoſe Reign that way of writing was in uſe) than by the IId. His other Coins were exactly like his Grandfather's. RICARDUS. REX. ANGLIÆ. Reverſe, CIVITAS. EBORACI.

and Archbiſhopricks, contrary to the Rights of the King, the Chapters, and the Patrons.

This Encroachment was grown to that height, that there was not a Benefice great or ſmall, but what the Popes diſpoſed of, by the infallible means they had contrived to be maſters of all the Collations. One while, by the Plenitude of the Apoſtolick Power, they reſerved to themſelves all the Benefices which ſhould become void by Tranſlation. Another while, all ſuch as ſhould be vacant by Death, or any other way whatever. By this means they eluded all the Canonical Elections in England, without alledging other Reaſons, ſave, that they had reſerved to themſelves beforehand the Right of Nomination to theſe Benefices. It appeared ſo plainly, that their Aim was to procure by degrees the Collation of all the Benefices of the Kingdom, that every one could not but ſee it. For whenever they could not make uſe of theſe Pretences, they ſeldom failed to object againſt the Party elected, and confer the Benefice upon another. Very often, when the Biſhop elect came to be confirmed, he found his Biſhoprick already diſpoſed of by the Pope.

Ibid. p. 371. 385. IV. But as this was generally the occaſion of great Conteſts, and as thoſe that were canonically elected were commonly ſupported by the King, the Pope found a certain means to free himſelf from theſe Importunities. He beſtowed theſe Biſhopricks, and other Benefices, before they were vacant, by way of Proviſion; and this was another great cauſe of the Complaint for the Engliſh.

V. It was moreover complained of, that moſt of the Benefices diſpoſed of by the Pope, by the Plenitude of his Power, were conferred on Foreigners, particularly on the Cardinals, and their Relations, who by virtue of the Pope's Diſpenſation, enjoyed the Profit without ever reſiding. Theſe Benefices were commonly farmed out to the Engliſh, who, to make the moſt profit, got the Cure ſerved for a very ſmall Salary. Hence Divine Service was neglected, the Churches ran to ruin, Hoſpitality was baniſhed, and the Inſtruction of Chriſtians almoſt wholly aboliſhed. Hence likewiſe this further Inconvenience, the Money was carried out of the Kingdom for ever. It may eaſily be judged how prejudicial this was to the Country, if it is conſidered, that by a Calculation made in the Reign of Henry III, the foreign Eccleſiaſticks were found to have greater Revenues in England than the King himſelf.

VI. Another cauſe of Complaint ſprang from the frequent Taxes impoſed on the Clergy by the Popes; one while, under colour of a Cruſade; another while, to ſupply the Neceſſities of the Holy See; and laſtly, by the Tenths, which they liberally granted to the King, becauſe they generally had a ſhare.

Act Pub. VI. p. 558. VII. In the next Place, the Legates and Nuntio's, ſent into England without any Neceſſity, were a great Grievance to the Engliſh. The Clergy were not only obliged to maintain them at a great Expence, but alſo to make them conſiderable Preſents, and pay them Procurations, and other Impoſitions, which the Pope allowed them to levy upon the Eccleſiaſticks. Hence the Money went out of the Kingdom, without any poſſibility of recovering it.

P. 747. VIII. The Popes were likewiſe poſſeſſed of the First-Fruits of all the Benefices, from whence aroſe the ſame Inconvenience, I mean a great exhauſting of the Kingdom's Treaſure.

IX. Peter-Pence, which originally was only a charitable Allowance, granted by the Saxon Kings for the Maintenance of the Engliſh College at Rome, was converted into a Tribute; which the Pope collected in a very rigorous manner, very different from that practiſed in former Days.

X. In fine, the Tribute King John had ingaged to pay the Holy See, and which the Popes exacted with great haughtineſs, was conſidered by the Engliſh as an intolerable Yoke, and a ſtanding Badge of their Servitude.

Complaints againſt the Clergy. XI. As to the Conteſts between the Crown and the Clergy, the King and the Magiſtrates complained, that the Clergy were continually endeavouring to encroach upon the Prerogatives of the Crown, ſecure as they were, of being always ſupported by the Pope.

XII. That the Clergy had extended their Juriſdiction to many things purely Civil, under pretence there is no Caſe but where Religion may be concerned. This Complaint chiefly regarded Matrimonial Cauſes.

XIII. They ſaid further, that the Eccleſiaſticks, inſtead of ſupporting, on occaſion, the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, were always ready to join with the Pope, as if he were their only Sovereign.

Theſe are the principal Grievances complained of by the Engliſh, and from which they endeavoured from time to time to free themſelves, either by Acts of Parliament, or Orders of Council. But theſe Precautions to ſcreen themſelves from the Papal Uſurpations, afforded the Popes at the ſame time, occaſion of complaining in their turn, that the Engliſh were ſtriving to rob the Church of her Privileges. Herein they had a great Advantage, by loudly urging the Cauſe of God, which they always took care to confound with their own Intereſt. In a Bull of Pope Clement V, inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, are ſpecified the Complaints of the Court of Rome againſt the Engliſh. And ſince I have related the Grievances of the Engliſh, it is reaſonable I ſhould likewiſe make known thoſe of the Pope. Act. Pub. III. p. 284.

Grievances of the Pope againſt the Engliſh. I. The Pope complained, that the Cardinals were hindered from enjoying the Prebends he conferred on them, without any conſideration of the Reſpect due to Perſons ordained by God, to bear their part of the Burden of governing the Church.

II. He ſaid, though he had an inconteſtable Right to collate Benefices, as well in England as in all other States, yet thoſe on whom he had beſtowed them were not permitted to take poſſeſſion, neither were they that had the boldneſs to oppoſe it excommunicated.

III. That ſuch as were ſummoned upon that account, were not ſuffered to obey the Summons. That Notaries were forbid to act, and the King's Subjects to appear out of the Kingdom.

IV. That the Pope's Nuntio's were hindered from exerciſing their Commiſſion, without the King's Licence. That ſome of them had even been publickly impriſoned, and not releaſed, without paying a large Fine.

V. That the Magiſtrates would not ſuffer the Excommunicated to be impriſoned, after the forty days, which, according to good and laudable cuſtom, were allowed them, to make the Church ſatisfaction.

VI. That the King ſent frequent Prohibitions to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, not to try Cauſes which were of their Cognizance.

VII. That the ſame Courts were abridged of their Juriſdiction over the Clergy, without conſidering, that Eccleſiaſtical Perſons are in no manner dependent upon the Laity.

VIII. That the Civil Courts dared to condemn Eccleſiaſticks, without the conſent of their Superiours.

IX. That Clergymen were made to appear in their Shirts in the Civil Courts, notwithſtanding they pleaded their Privileges. That indeed they were ſent back to the Eccleſiaſtical Court when they were demanded; but it very often happened, if they were not found guilty, the Civil Judges were ſo bold, as fully to acquit them, without ſuffering the Eccleſiaſtical Court to take any cognizance of the matter.

X. That Clergymen were ſubjected to the Tryal of twelve Lay-Perſons, and were acquitted or condemned by the Verdict of theſe twelve incompetent Judges.

XI. That the great Men frequently lodged in the Monaſteries, and put them to a great Expence, on the frivolous pretence of their being founded by their Anceſtors.

XII. That during the Vacancy of the Abbeys, thoſe who were entruſted with the Cuſtody by the King, waſted the Revenues, and committed great Damages.

XIII. Laſtly, that the Tribute of a thouſand Marks due to the Holy See, was not regularly paid, and the Arrears which were to be ſent to Avignon, were put to other uſes.

Theſe are the mutual Complaints of the Engliſh and the Popes, concerning which it may be obſerved, that both Parties were agreed as to Facts, and differed only as to Right. To diſcover on which ſide the Right lay, it would be neceſſary to imagine, whether the Pope and Clergy were originally poſſeſſed of the Rights they aſſumed; or, they were granted by ſome Authority; and laſtly whether that Authority could lawfully confer them. But this would be entring into an old beaten Diſpute, on which nothing new can be expected. Leaving every one therefore to his own Notions, I ſhall only relate the Means uſed by the Engliſh, to do themſelves Juſtice for the Injuries they complained of, and the Endeavours of the Popes, to ſupport the Privileges they were poſſeſſed of. But firſt, it will be proper to take notice, that in theſe Conteſts, the Popes had great Advantages. Every Pope conſtantly adhered to the ſame Maxims, without the leaſt Variation. But it was not the ſame with the Kings of England, who, to pleaſe their Humour, or gratify their Paſſions, ſcrupled not, very often, to derogate from the Prerogatives of the Crown. This is the true Cauſe of the ſlow Progreſs of the Engliſh in their Deſign of freeing themſelves from the oppreſſions of Rome. The leaſt Re- Advantages of the Popes.

Schiſms diſadvantageous to Rome.

laxation made them loſe a great deal of Ground. And it may be, they would never have accompliſhed the redreſs of any one Grievance, if the Schiſms in the Church had not afforded them Opportunities, which they wiſely improved. For the Popes, who, at ſuch Junctures, ſtood often in need of the Kings of England, found themſelves many times obliged to Compliances, to which doubtleſs they would never have ſubmitted at any other Seaſon.

Means of redreſſing the Grievances.

Statute of Mortmain.

As the Pope and Clergy mutually ſupported each other, one of the moſt effectual means practiſed in England to oppoſe the Papal Power, was to check the Growth of the Clergy's Riches. To that end, in the Reign of Edward I, the Statute of Mortmain was enacted, as has been related. This was a fatal Blow to the Clergy, who, without this Statute, would have been maſters of all the Lands in the Kingdom, ſince they inceſſantly acquired, and never alienated. But this Statute was almoſt as prejudicial to the Pope, ſince bounds could not be ſet to the Clergy's Power, without leſſening, at the ſame time, that of the Court of Rome. Edward I, ſtruck likewiſe at the Papal Authority, at leaſt with regard to the Collation of the Biſhopricks, by obliging the Biſhops to renounce the Article of the Proviſion-Bull, which gave them their Temporalities, wherein he was followed by his Succeſſors (1).

Renunciation of the Biſhops.

Fruitleſs Attempts under Edward II.

If Edward II, had ſhown more Reſolution and Firmneſs, or had not been forced by the Circumſtances of the Times to keep fair with Rome, he might have greatly promoted the Work of Liberty, which the Engliſh had ſo long and ſo paſſionately deſired. Never were they in a better diſpoſition to ſhake off the galling Yoke. This appears in the King's Letters to the Pope, and in the vigorous Reſolutions of ſeveral Parliaments in his Reign. But Edward, expecting always to find in the Pope's Authority, a Protection againſt his Subjects, frequently ſtooped to Condeſcenſions for the Court of Rome, deſtructive of the Intereſt of his Kingdom. This rendered the Parliament's Endeavours ineffectual during the Courſe of his Reign.

The Statute of Proviſors.

But under Edward III, more effectual meaſures were taken to be delivered from the ſo long complained of Oppreſſions. I mean the two Statutes, which tended to cut up by the Roots two of the moſt conſiderable Grievances, had they been punctually executed. The firſt was the Statute of Proviſors, whereby it was enacted, that in caſe the Pope collated any Archbiſhoprick, Biſhoprick, Dignity, or other Benefice, contrary to the Rights of the Kings, Chapters, or Patrons, the Collation was to devolve to the King for one turn. And if any Perſon ſued for, and procured, Reſervations, or Proviſions from the Court of Rome, he ſhould be impriſoned till he had made Fine to the King at his Will, and found ſufficient Security not to proſecute any Man in the Court of Rome, on account of his Impriſonment.

Statute of Præmunire

The ſecond Act was the Statute of Præmunire, by which it was enacted, That in caſe any of the King's Subjects ſhould carry into a foreign Court, Cauſes, the Cognizance whereof belonged to the King's Court, they ſhould be impriſoned, and their Lands, Goods, and Chattels be forfeited to the King.

Memorial to the Parliament againſt the Court of Rome. Rot. Parl. 50. Edw. III. N. 94.

Notwithſtanding theſe two Acts, which ſeemed to take from the Pope all hopes of diſpoſing for the future of any Benefice, and ought to have made him apprehenſive, that the Parliament would proceed to redreſs other Grievances, the Court of Rome ſtill continued her Oppreſſions. In 1376, that is, about a Year before the Death of Edward III, a Memorial was preſented to the Parliament, ſhowing, that by the Death and Tranſlation of Biſhops, the Pope exacted five times the yearly Revenue of the vacant See, and by that means drew out of the Kingdom twenty thouſand Marks a Year. That the Pope's Agents collected the ſame Sum, for the Neceſſities of the Holy See. That this very Year, the Pope had ſeized the Firſt-Fruits of all the Benefices in England. That he had encreaſed the Number of the Cardinals to thirty, among whom there were not above two or three well-affected to England. That the Pope's Avarice was worſe than the Plague. That in ſpite of the Statute of Proviſors, there were Perſons every day provided with Benefices by the Court of Rome, and there was no hindering it, but by baniſhing all that ſhould dare to accept of theſe Proviſions. In ſhort, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to put a ſtop to theſe Oppreſſions, in order to prevent England from falling into a fatal Slavery. Upon theſe Complaints, which were carried to Gregory XI, there was a ſort of Agreement made between the King and the Pope, but ſo full of Equivocations and Reſervations on the part of the Pope, that it was eaſy to perceive he did not mean to deſiſt from his pretended Rights. He was content with promiſing in general, that he would conſider the Complaints of the Engliſh, and behave with more Moderation for the future. Gregory dying ſoon after, his Succeſſors regardleſs of his Engagements, ſtill continued to beſtow Engliſh Benefices upon Foreigners. This Conduct obliged the Houſe of Commons to petition Richard II, to ſeize all the Effects of the Beneficed Agents, and baniſh them the Realm, which the King did accordingly.

Freſh Efforts of the Engliſh.

In the ſame Reign, the Statute of Proviſors was confirmed [and enlarged.]

Two Years before, Richard forbid the Clergy under great Penalties, to pay a Tax impoſed by the Pope.

The next Year he iſſued out a Proclamation commanding, upon pain of Death and forfeiture of Eſtate, all Perſons that were gone to Rome to ſollicite the Repeal of the Statutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, to return into England within ſuch a time.

The Statute of Præmunire enlarged.

All theſe Precautions being inſufficient to check the Popes, who pretended not to be bound by Acts of Parliament, the Statute of Præmunire was revived in 1392, with Enlargements, which ſeemed to leave the Court of Rome no hopes of evading it. The Act ran, That all Perſons that ſhould purſue, in the Court of Rome, Tranſlations, Sentences of Excommunication, Bulls, Mandates, or any other things whatſoever, contrary to the Rights of the King and Crown, ſhould be put out of the Protection of the Laws, and proceeded againſt according to the Statute of Præmunire. That all thoſe who ſhould bring into the Kingdom theſe foreign Inſtruments, or receive and publiſh them, ſhould be liable to the ſame Penalties. Laſtly, that they who purſued any Proceſs in a foreign Court, to the prejudice of the King's Right, ſhould be treated in the ſame manner.

The Pope goes on, notwithſtanding.

This rigid Act might well curb the Engliſh who were ſubject to the Laws, but not the Pope, who was out of their reach; accordingly he deſiſted not from his Pretenſions. In 1398 he tranſlated the Biſhop of Lincoln to the See of Cheſter (2), and gave the Biſhoprick of Lincoln to Henry Beaufort, a Son of the Duke of Lancaſter. But the Biſhop of Lincoln, who had not ſued for this Tranſlation, not daring to accept it, by reaſon of the Statute of Præmunire, retired to a Monaſtery, and the Pope tranſlated the Biſhop of Landaff to the See of Cheſter. Richard was extremely offended, that the Pope ſhould take upon him, without being deſired, to remove Biſhops from one See to another. He ſummoned the Clergy upon this occaſion, and demanded their Opinion of theſe Tranſlations contrary to his Will. This was a puzzling Queſtion for the Clergy, who, fearing to diſpleaſe the King or the Pope, avoided giving a poſitive Anſwer. Some time after, the Pope ſent a Nuntio into England, to try to procure a Repeal of the foremention'd Statutes. But though the Nuntio met with an honourable Reception, he could not poſſibly ſucceed in his Commiſſion. Richard being depoſed the next Year, the Conteſts with the Court of Rome remained in this Situation.

Deſign of the Popes to extend their Authority over Temporals.

Certainly it was time for the Engliſh Nation, as well as the reſt of Europe, to uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to ſtop the Growth of the Papal Power. They muſt have voluntarily ſhut their Eyes, not to ſee that all the Proceedings of the Popes tended to render them Temporal Sovereigns of Europe. Of this the Decretal Unam Sanctam of Boniface VIII, which ſhows, that Pope thought himſelf inveſted with the Temporal as well as Spiritual Power, is a clear Evidence. But ſince it might be ſaid, it is not reaſonable to aſcribe the ambitious Deſign of Boniface to all the Popes, this Evidence may be ſupported by another, which demonſtrates that Boniface did but tread in the Steps of his Predeceſſors. I mean John XXII, who by his ſole Authority, publiſhed a Truce between England and Scotland, againſt the Conſent of one of the Parties, and impowered his Legates to conclude a Peace between the two Kingdoms, upon what terms they pleaſed; with Orders to compel the two Kings and their Subjects, punctually to obſerve the ſame, under pain of Excommunication. Does not this proceeding ſhow that the Popes all acted with the ſame Spirit, and if their Ambition had been indulged, would have conſidered Chriſtian Princes but as Subjects, or at leaſt, as Vaſſals of the See of Rome?

Herefies.

Let us proceed now to the Hereſies, or rather the Opinions branded with that Name, during the Interval we have gone through.

Opinions condemned. T. Wikes, p. 114. Knighton. Col. 2467. Spelman. Conc. T. II. p. 347.

In 1286 or 1287, Peckam Archbiſhop of Canterbury, cenſured eight Propoſitions, maintained by one Richard Knapwell a Dominican Friar. Some of theſe Propoſitions, which will ſerve to ſhow what Subjects were diſcuſſed in the Schools, and wherein Knowledge was made to conſiſt, were as follows:

I. That the dead Body of Jeſus Chriſt had not the ſame ſubſtantial Form, as when living.

III. That if the Euchariſtical Bread had been conſecrated with theſe Words, This is my Body, during the three Days Jeſus Chriſt lay in his Grave, the Bread would have been tranſubſtantiated into the New Form, which the Body of Chriſt took at the Separation of his Soul.

IV. That after the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, the Euchariſtical Bread is tranſubſtantiated by virtue of theſe Words, This is my Body, into the whole living Body of Chriſt, that is, the Matter of the Bread is converted into the Matter of his Body, and the ſubſtantial Form of the Bread, into the Subſtantial Form of his Body, that is to ſay, into his intellectual Soul, ſo far as it conſtitutes the Form of his Body.

VII. That in the Articles of Faith, a Man is not bound to reſt upon the Authority of the Pope, or of any Prieſt or Doctor (1), but that the Holy Scriptures and evident Deductions from thence (2), are the only Foundation of our Aſſent.

VIII. That the rational Soul is the only Form by which a Man is a Man (3).

This laſt Article was conſidered as the Foundation of the reſt, and all together were condemned by the Archbiſhop.

In 1314, In the Reign of Edward II, ſome Students of Oxford, maintained in their Diſputations certain Opinions, concerning the Trinity and Creation of the World, which being brought before the Univerſity, were condemned as Heretical.

Wickliff publiſhes his Doctrine.

Theſe Opinions, being wholly founded on Scholaſtick Notions, were ſtifled in the birth, becauſe the People underſtood nothing of ſuch matters. But it was not the ſame with Wickliff's Doctrine, publiſhed towards the cloſe of the XIVth Century, in the ſame Univerſity. The Reaſon is, his Doctrine was of another nature, and tended to reform the Abuſes crept into the Church. Accordingly his Opinions were embraced by great Numbers. As this is the moſt important Eccleſiaſtical Affair of the XIVth Century, it will be neceſſary fully to ſhow theſe Opinions, and the Zeal wherewith they were received by ſome, and condemned by others.

John Wicklef, or rather Wickliff, was educated at Oxford in Merton College, where he took his Degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was ſo eminent for his Learning, Parts, and fine Genius, that Simon Iſlip, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, having founded Canterbury College (4) in Oxford, made him Rector. Wickliff behaved in his Poſt with univerſal Approbation till the Death of the Archbiſhop, who had a great Eſteem for him. Langham, Succeſſor of Iſlip (5), willing to favour the Monks, and introduce them into the College, attempted to turn out Wickliff, and put one Woodhull a Monk in his room. But he could never obtain the Conſent of the Fellows of the College, who were deſirous to keep their old Rector. This Affair being brought to Rome, the Monks of Canterbury ſollicited the Pope ſo earneſtly in behalf of Woodhull, that Wickliff was deprived of his Rectorſhip. However, this was no Injury to the Doctor's Reputation. Every Body ſaw it was a general Affair, and that the Monks did not ſo much ſtrike at his Perſon, as at all the Seculars that were Members of the College. And indeed, they were all turned out as well as he, to make room for the Monks. Shortly after, Wickliff was preſented to the Living of Lutterworth in the Dioceſs of Lincoln, and then it was that he publiſhed, in his Sermons and Writings, certain Opinions, which appeared to be Novel, becauſe contrary to the received Doctrine of thoſe Days. As he did not declare his Sentiments till after the loſs of his Rectorſhip, his Enemies have taken occaſion, to accuſe him of acting from a Spirit of Revenge, by reaſon of the Injury done him. I ſhall not undertake to clear him from this Charge. As there is none but God alone that ſees into the Hearts of Men, it is raſhneſs to accuſe, or excuſe them, with regard to the ſecret Motives of their Actions. I ſhall only take notice, that Wickliff's bittereſt Enemies have never taxed him with any Immoralities. Theſe are the chief Articles maintained by Wickliff in his Writings and Sermons.

Wickliff Doctrine. Walſing. p. 192, 201, &c. 283, 285. Ypod. p. 531. Knighton. Col. 2644. —2670.

I. That the Euchariſt, after Conſecration, is not the real Body of Chriſt, but only its Emblem or Figure.

II. That the Church of Rome is no more the Head of the Univerſal Church, than any other Church; nor was there any greater Power given to St. Peter, than to the reſt of the Apoſtles.

III. That the Pope of Rome has no more Jurisdiction in the Exerciſe of the Keys, than any other Prieſt.

IV. That in caſe the Church misbehaves, it is not only lawful, but meritorious to diſpoſſeſs her of her Temporalities.

V. That when a Prince, or Temporal Lord, is convinced, that the Church makes an ill uſe of her Endowments, he is bound, under pain of Damnation, to take them away.

VI. That the Goſpel is ſufficient to direct a Chriſtian in the Conduct of his Life.

VII. That all other Rules inſtituted by Holy Men, and practiſed in the Monaſteries, add no more Perfection to Chriſtianity, than whiteneſs to a Wall.

VIII. That neither the Pope nor any other Prelate, ought to have Priſons for the puniſhing Offenders againſt the Diſcipline of the Church, but that every Perſon ought to be left at his Liberty in the Conduct of his Life.

It muſt be obſerved that Wickliff, in the laſt Article, did not pretend, as he explained himſelf afterwards, to take from the Pope or the Prelates, the Power of Binding and Looſing, but only meant, that the Church had no Right to inflict Temporal Puniſhments on Sinners.

Whether Wickliff and his Followers ſtretched theſe Articles, by the Conſequences which may naturally be deduced from them, or his Adverſaries, from whom we have all we know of him, made any Additions, in order to render him odious, we find in the Hiſtorians, many other Opinions aſcribed to him. Among theſe additional Opinions, there may be ſome not to be maintained, and there are others, which, being contrary to the Articles of the Church of England, have made ſome Engliſh Writers ſpeak of Wickliff with contempt, and even call him Heretick. But it would be too long, fully to examine here all theſe Opinions. Let us therefore be contented with thoſe that firſt appeared, which are really his, and have ſerved for Foundation to all the reſt.

Wickliff has many Followers. Walſing.

Theſe Opinions, maintained by Wickliff with great Vivacity, were immediately eſpouſed by great Numbers, not only among the Students of Oxford, but the great Men at Court; particularly the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Lord Percy, Earl Marſhal, declared for him. It muſt be obſerved, that this happened towards the End of the Reign of Edward III, at a time when that Monarch, old an infirm, left the Adminiſtration of the Government to the Duke of Lancaſter his Son, as we have ſeen in his Hiſtory.

The Pope takes Information againſt him; but he is ſupported by the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Percy. Fox Acts and Mon.

Gregory XI, being informed that theſe Articles were publickly maintained at Oxford, diſpatched an Order to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of London, to apprehend and examine Wickliff, and ſend the Depoſitions to Rome. But it was difficult for theſe two Prelates fully to execute theſe Orders, the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Earl Marſhal, having openly declared, they would not ſuffer Wickliff to be impriſoned. Indeed, there was yet no Act of Parliament, impowering the Biſhops to impriſon Hereticks, without the King's Conſent. The two Prelates therefore were contented with ſummoning Wickliff before them, in St. Paul's Church, where there was a vaſt Concourſe of People to hear the Examination. The Duke of Lancaſter, and the Lord Percy accompanied the Doctor, aſſuring him, there was no danger, and that he might make his Defence with Courage, againſt Men, who were but mere Ignoramuſes, in compariſon to him. Here is a ſhort Dialogue which paſſed between theſe two Lords, and the Biſhop of London, upon Wickliff's account. The Lord Percy bidding the Doctor ſit down, the Biſhop of London oppoſed it, and commanded him to ſtand up, but the Earl Marſhal would not let him.

(5) After the Death of this Simon Iſlip, William Edington Biſhop of Wincheſter was offered the Archbiſhoprick; but he refuſed it, ſaying, That Canterbury was the higher Rack, but Wincheſter the better Manger. Tyrrel, Vol. IV. p. 661.

The Duke of Lancaſter. Yes, he ſhall play the Maſter here for all you.

The Lord Percy. Wickliff, ſit down; you have need of a Seat, for you have many things to ſay.

Biſhop. It is unreaſonable that a Clergyman, cited before his Ordinary, ſhould ſit down during his Anſwer. He ſhall ſtand.

Duke of Lancaſter. My Lord Percy is in the right. And for you, my Lord Biſhop, who are grown ſo proud and arrogant, I will take care to humble your Pride, and not only yours, but that of all the Prelates in England. Thou dependeſt upon the Credit of thy Relations, but far from being able to help thee, they ſhall have enough to do to ſupport themſelves.

Biſhop. I place no Confidence either in my Relations or in any Man elſe, but in God alone, who will give me the Boldneſs to ſpeak the Truth.

The Duke ſpeaking ſoftly to the Lord Percy:

Rather than take this at the Biſhop's hands, I'll drag him by the Hair of the Head out of the Church.

The Duke of Lancaſter muſt needs have been very paſſionate, ſince it is certain the Biſhop's laſt Words were not inſolent enough, to occaſion ſo great a tranſport of Anger. But it may be, the Biſhop uſed harſher Expreſſions, which the Hiſtorians, Friends of the Clergy, have taken care to ſoften, that the Duke might appear to be in the wrong. However, the Duke's Words to the Lord Percy, being over-heard by ſome Stander-by, occaſioned the Tumult mentioned in the Reign of Edward III, the particulars whereof it will be needleſs to repeat. It ſuffices to obſerve, that upon this Accident the Aſſembly broke up, and Wickliff's Examination was deferred to another time.

Wickliff's Proſecution drops.

The Death of Edward III. happening ſhortly after, and the Duke of Lancaſter being Preſident of the new King's Council, the Biſhops durſt not proceed againſt Wickliff. During that time, the number of his Followers increaſed ſo conſiderably, that the Univerſity of Oxford debated, whether they ſhould receive the Pope's Bull, commanding them to proſecute Wickliff with the utmoſt rigour. The Hiſtorian who relates this particular, not acquainting us with their final Reſolution, the Bull was probably rejected. Hence it appears, that Wickliff's Doctrine was not embraced by ſome ignorant Perſons only, but by Men of Letters, and Perſons of Quality. Some would make us believe, that People were frightned into a feigned Approbation of his Doctrine. But it may be ſaid, on the contrary, with much more probability, that Fear hindered many from being his followers. For a Man ran no risk in continuing to adhere to the old, whereas it was dangerous to embrace the new Doctrines.

Collier.

Bull to the Archbiſhop to cite Wickliff. Walſing. p. 202. Spelman, Conc. T. II. p. 621.

The Pope finding, his Bull to the Univerſity of Oxford produced no great Effect, ſent freſh Orders to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London, to proſecute Wickliff. But as he had Intimation, that the Biſhops could not proceed in the Affair without the King's Licence, he enjoyned them to repreſent to Richard and his Council, that Wickliff's Errors were not only dangerous to Religion, but likewiſe to the State. However, the King's Council, it ſeems, did not think ſo. Perhaps no body was willing to offend the Duke of Lancaſter, Wickliff's open Protector.

They cite him,

but drop the Affair.

The two Prelates however willing to obey the Pope to the utmoſt of their Power, ſummoned Wickliff a ſecond time before them at Lambeth. He appeared, and by his manner of explaining his Opinions, ſeemed ready to give the Prelates ſome ſort of Satisfaction. But, probably, they would not have been contented with ſo general an Explanation, if one Clifford a Gentleman had not rudely entered the Aſſembly, and forbid them to proceed. It is ſaid, the two Prelates were over-awed by this abſolute Order, though they knew not from whence it came; believing that Clifford durſt not act thus of himſelf. Beſides, the Populace intimated by their menacing Words, that they would not ſee Wickliff ill-treated. Theſe Conſiderations obliged the Biſhops to diſmiſs the Doctor, forbidding him to amuſe the People any more with diſputations of ſo dangerous a conſequence. But he had no regard to this Injunction, ſince, according to the Teſtimony of an antient Hiſtorian, he continued to preach and defend his Doctrine. By the way, this Steadineſs ill agrees with the Explanation of his Opinions, which it is pretended he gave to the Biſhops, and is repreſented as full of Equivocations and Evaſions. The Truth is, this diſguiſing his Sentiments is little agreeable to his natural Temper, which was far from being timorous. Be this as it will, from that time he lived in quiet upon his Cure of Lutterworth, without any farther diſturbance. Some time after, Courtney Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Succeſſor of Simon Sudbury, beheaded by the Kentiſh Rebels, ſummoned a Provincial Synod at London, where Wickliff's Doctrine was condemned. An Hiſtorian affirms, that Wickliff was cited, and explained his Opinion in a manner very different from the literal Senſe of the Words. But as the Records of the Synod mention nothing like it, the Hiſtorian has, very probably, confounded this Synod with that of Lambeth.

Knighton, Col. 2647.

His Doctrine condemned by a Synod. Spelman, T. II. p. 629. Knighton.

The Condemnation of Wickliff's Doctrine, prevented not its ſpreading all over the Kingdom, and with ſuch Succeſs, that the fore-mentioned Hiſtorian aſſures us, two Men could not be found together, and one not a Lollard. Richard II, as was obſerved in his Hiſtory, permitting the Biſhops to proſecute and impriſon Hereticks, ſeveral Lollards were cited before their reſpective Biſhops. Some recanted, and others bravely ſtood the Shock. But among theſe laſt, there was not one delivered over to the ſecular Arm, there being yet no Law to that purpoſe. It was not till the next Reign, that thoſe barbarous Executions commenced in England. So, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of the Biſhops, Wickliff's Opinions flew over the Kingdom with a wonderful ſwiftneſs, becauſe the Clergy were not at Liberty to employ the only means they have all along thought proper to extirpate Hereſy. It ſeems alſo, the Biſhops durſt not perſonally attack Wickliff, for fear of having their Ignorance too much diſplayed by his ſuperior Learning. Be that as it will, Wickliff was left in quiet at Lutterworth till his death, in 1384 (1). Probably, in proceſs of time, his Followers made ſome Additions to his Doctrine, and hence it is, they have aſcribed to him whatever was advanced by his Diſciples.

Wickliff's Followers increaſe. Knighton. Col. 2655, &c.

The Loſs of the Maſter diſheartned not his Followers. They continued to preach and maintain their Opinions, with the ſame Courage as during his Life. The daily progreſs of their Doctrine became at length ſo conſiderable, that in 1386, the Parliament thought themſelves obliged, to petition the King to take care that the Church and State received no detriment by the novel Opinions of the Lollards. Whereupon the King appointed Commiſſioners to peruſe Wickliff's Books; but this Commiſſion was very negligently executed.

The Wickliffites ſeparate from the reſt of the Church.

In 1389, the Wickliffites or Lollards began to ſeparate from the Church of Rome, and appoint Prieſts from among themſelves, to perform Divine Service, after their way. Though ſome were from time to time proſecuted by the Biſhops, theſe Proſecutions were not very rigorous. Their Aim ſeemed to be only to hinder them from pleading Preſcription. Beſides, a Petition preſented to the King by a former Parliament, to revoke the Power granted the Biſhops to impriſon Hereticks, reſtrained the moſt forward.

Remonſtrances to the Commons.

But in 1395, the Endeavours of the Lollards, in the King's Abſence, to get their Doctrine approved by the Parliament, put the Biſhops upon taking other Meaſures. Theſe pretended Hereticks finding themſelves ſupported by an infinite Number of Followers, preſented to the Houſe of Commons a Remonſtrance (2), containing theſe twelve Articles.

Spelman. Conc. T. II. p. 646.

I. That when the Church of England, treading in the Steps of the Church of Rome, began to make an ill uſe of her Temporalities, Faith and Charity began to diſappear.

II. That the Engliſh Prieſthood derived from Rome, and pretending to a Power ſuperior to Angels, is not the Prieſthood ſettled by Chriſt upon his Apoſtles.

III. That the Celibacy of the Clergy, was the occaſion of many ſcandalous Irregularities in the Church.

IV. That the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, renders the greateſt part of Chriſtendom guilty of Idolatry.

V. That Exorciſms, Benedictions pronounced over Water, Bread, Oil, Stones, for the Altar, Church-Walls, Prieſt's Veſtments, the Mitre, Croſs, Pilgrim's Staff, have more of Necromancy than Religion.

VI. That it was a great Crime, to join in the ſame Perſon Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Offices.

VII. That Prayers for the Dead, in which one Perſon is preferred to another, are not conformable to the Charity preſcribed by the Goſpel.

VIII. That Pilgrimages, and Offerings made to Images and Croſſes, and eſpecially the Pictures repreſenting the Holy Trinity, are a ſort of Idolatry.

IX. That Auricular Confeſſion ſerves only to make the Prieſts proud, and by letting them into the Secrets of the Penitent, gives opportunities for many Sins, and ſcandalous Intrigues.

X. That the taking away any Man's life, either in War, or Courts of Juſtice, is contrary to the Doctrine of the Goſpel, which is a diſpenſation of Grace and Mercy.

XI. That the Vow of ſingle life, undertaken by Women, is the occaſion of numberleſs diſorders, and of the murder of multitudes of Children unbaptized, or even unborn.

XII. That it is neceſſary to baniſh from civil Society all uſeleſs Trades, which ſerve only to ſupport pride and luxury.

All theſe Articles were backed with proofs too long to be inſerted.

This Remonſtrance, which very likely was privately approved by ſeveral Members of Parliament, ſo alarmed the Clergy, that they immediately deputed the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of London to the King; praying him to return with all ſpeed into England, that he might by his preſence and authority check the growth of the new Doctrine, as was related in the Reign of Richard II.

Spelman. Conc. T II. p. 662. Some time after, Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſummoned a Synod at London, where eighteen Articles extracted from Wickliff's Book, entitled Trialogus, were condemned.

Theſe are the moſt remarkable particulars concerning Wickliff and his Doctrine, before the depoſing of Richard II. But I muſt not forget to add, that certain Bohemian Students, being at Oxford when Wickliff began to publiſh his Doctrine, they carried it into their own Country, where it ſpread wonderfully. It is time now to proceed to other affairs relating to the Engliſh Church, and in the firſt place to the Councils.

COUNCILS. Council of Lyons. 1274. I ſhall begin this head with the General Council of Lyons, opened May 1. 1274. This Council was ſummoned chiefly to receive the Greeks into the Communion of the Church of Rome, from which they had ſeparated a ſecond time, upon the Latines being driven out of Conſtantinople. This union indeed was accompliſhed, but did not laſt long. Another reaſon of the Council's meeting, was to reſtore the affairs of the Chriſtians in Syria. As great endeavours were pretended to be uſed in their favour, the Pope demanded a Subſidy of every Church. It was eaſy to ſee the Pope's intereſt in this demand. His Predeceſſors had made ſo frequent uſe of this means to procure Money, that there was no being deceived. However, not a Prelate dared to open his mouth againſt it, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was preſent, kept ſilence like the reſt. Richard Mepham (1) Dean of Lincoln, was the only Perſon that ventured to ſpeak for the intereſts of England. He boldly ſaid, the Engliſh Clergy were not able to contribute to the War, by reaſon of the continual exactions of the Court of Rome, which ſcarce left them wherewithal to ſubſiſt. This freedom coſt him his Deanery, of which the Pope inſtantly deprived him. Hence we may judge of the liberty in this Council. I come now to the Councils held in England during the four laſt Reigns.

Synod of Reading. 1279. M. Weſt. T. Wikes. Spelman Conc. T. II. p. 523. The firſt was convened in the Reign of Edward I. (2), by John de Peckham Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In this Council were ratified the Canons of the General Council of Lyons, concerning Pluralities. Then the Archbiſhop paſſed ſome Canons directly contrary to the Prerogative Royal, and for that reaſon he was obliged to repeal them afterwards.

The firſt decreed Excommunication againſt ſuch as ſued for the King's Letters, to prohibit certain Cauſes from being tried in the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

The ſecond rendered liable to the ſame Penalty the Magiſtrates, who refuſed to impriſon excommunicated Perſons, after the forty days allowed by the Canons.

By the third, they that invaded the Church's Lands, were likewiſe to be excommunicated.

The fourth prohibited under the ſame penalty the ſelling of Proviſions to the Archbiſhop of York, whenever he ſhould come within the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Juriſdiction.

This was a ſhort and ſure way to end his diſpute with the Archbiſhop of York, about carrying the Croſs. So, in caſe this Canon had not been annulled, the Archbiſhop of York would have found it difficult to be preſent at the Parliament, which was generally held at London.

The fifth ordered the Copies of Magna Charta to be ſet up on Church-doors, that every one might read them.

Hence may be judged with what ſpirit this Prelate, who had long ſojourned at Rome, was returned to England, and how far he would have extended the Church's power, if the King had not oppoſed his deſigns (3).

Synod of Lambeth. 1281. In 1281, the ſame Archbiſhop convened at Lambeth a provincial Synod, where, among others, the following Canons were made.

The ſecond enjoined the Prieſts to acquaint the more ignorant ſort of the Laity, that the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt are delivered to them, together with the Species of Bread, and that what they receive in the Chalice, is not holy, but only mere Wine, to help them to ſwallow the other Species with more eaſe. For (as the Canon goes on) the Blood of our Lord is allowed only to the Prieſts that celebrate divine Service in theſe leſſer Churches (4).

The IIId Canon forbids Prieſts to re-baptize the Children that had been baptized by the Laity, unleſs there is reaſon to doubt, whether the Child was baptized or not.

In that caſe, the Canon allowed the Prieſt to baptize the Infant, with theſe additional words, If thou art not already baptized, I baptize thee in the Name of the Father, &c.

The Xth enjoins the Prieſts to inſtruct the People committed to their Charge in plain intelligible Language, without making uſe of ſcholaſtick terms and diſtinctions. Then the Canon lays down the Heads they were to expound upon, and the ſenſe they were to give them.

Synod of Exeter. 1287. Spelman Conc. T. II. p. 350. In 1287, Peter Quivil Biſhop of Exeter, held a Dioceſan Synod, which enjoined, that care ſhould be taken to inſtruct the People concerning the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation. They were to be told, that the adoration of the Hoſt could not be carried too far, ſince they received under the Species of Bread, the ſame Body that hung upon the Croſs for their Salvation, and under the Species of Wine, the Blood which was ſhed from Chriſt's ſide. It ſeems that we may infer from hence, that in the Church of Exeter, the Laity received the Sacrament then in both Kinds (5).

Synod againſt the Templars. 1310. We meet but with one remarkable Council in the Reign of Edward II, held at London in 1310, where the Templars were condemned to perpetual Impriſonment.

Synod at London. 1328. In 1328, in the Reign of Edward III, Mepham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, held a provincial Synod at London. By this Synod, Good-Friday, and the Conception of the Bleſſed Virgin were made Holy-days, and all work forbidden; but however, the Country People were allowed to follow their buſineſs after divine Service. By the ſame Synod, all Monks, Hermits, and Canons regular, were prohibited taking Confeſſions. A Canon made in a former Synod at Oxford, which admitted Appeals only after a definitive Sentence, was revoked.

Synod at Magfield. 1332. In 1332, Mepham held another provincial Synod at Magfield, which ſettled all the Holy-days obſerved in the Province of Canterbury. Among the Feſtivals we find St. George's day, and St. Auguſtin's firſt Archbiſhop of Canterbury (6).

Synod at London againſt the Mendicant Friers. Stratford Archbiſhop of Canterbury, held at London in 1342 a provincial Synod, the moſt remarkable Canons whereof are theſe:

The IVth enjoined the Monks, who had any appropriated Livings, to relieve the Poor in proportion to the value of the Benefice. In caſe of failure, the Biſhops were impowered to compel them to their Duty, by ſequeſtring the Profits.

The IXth was levelled againſt the mendicant Friers, who abuſing the confidence of dying Perſons, perſuaded them to make Wills prejudicial to their Families. As the Synod durſt not directly attack the Friers, who were under the Pope's protection, thoſe who were prevailed on to diſpoſe of their Eſtates ſo unreaſonably, were barred the benefit of Chriſtian burial.

During the Reign of Richard II, we find no remarkable Councils, but thoſe held on occaſion of Wickliff and his Followers. But as theſe have been mentioned elſewhere, it will be needleſs to repeat here what has been ſaid.

Monſtrous Abſurdities! By this Canon it ſhould ſeem, that the Innovation of Communion in one kind, had not yet prevailed in Cathedral and Conventual Churches; and was to be inculcated only upon the illiterate, whoſe Ignorance was moſt likely to make them admit ſo unprimitive a Practice.

Of the Schiſms.

Though England was no more concerned than other Chriſtian States in the Schiſms that happened in the Church, I do not think it proper wholly to paſs them over in ſilence. This knowledge is not only abſolutely neceſſary, for the underſtanding of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of thoſe times, but it may in ſome meaſure be ſaid, that the beſt part of that Hiſtory conſiſts of what followed from theſe ſcandalous Schiſms.

John XXII. and Nicholas V.

From the beginning of the Reign of Edward I, to the end of the Reign of Richard II, Chriſtendom was divided by two Schiſms. The firſt laſted not long. Clement V, removing the Papal Chair to Avignon, died there in 1314, and was ſucceeded by John XXII, who kept his reſidence at the ſame place. This Pope's election was after an extraordinary manner. The Holy See remaining vacant about two years after the death of Clement, becauſe the Cardinals could not agree, they met at length at Lyons in 1316, in order to chuſe a Pope. But the ſame diviſions ſtill reigning among them, they agreed to refer the matter to the Cardinal of Oſtia (1) Biſhop of Oporto, who, without any ſuſpence, nominated himſelf, and took the name of John XXII. At the ſame time the Empire was divided by a double Election, one part of the Electors voting for Lewis of Bavaria, and the other, for Frederic Duke of Auſtria. John's refuſal to acknowledge the firſt, occaſioned a quarrel between them, which continually increaſed till 1328, when Lewis paſſing into Italy degraded Pope John, and cauſed Peter de Corbaria a Cordelier, to be elected, who aſſumed the name of Nicholas V, and reſided at Rome. This Anti-pope being ſupported by the Emperor and the General of the Cordeliers, kept his ground ſome time. But at laſt the Emperor being forced to quit Italy, and diſſention ariſing among the Cordeliers, Nicholas having none to defend him, was taken and carried to Avignon, where he asked John's pardon with a halter about his Neck. After this ſubmiſſion, he was put into cloſe confinement, where he died in a few months.

Mat. Weſt. p. 447. Walſing. p. 89.

Schiſm of Urban VI. and Clement VII.

The ſecond Schiſm between Urban VI, and Clement VII, was more conſiderable and of longer continuance. I have related the riſe of it in the Hiſtory of Richard II, for which reaſon I ſhall only ſhew its effects, to the end of this Century.

To Pope Urban VI, ſucceeded in 1389, Boniface IX, who, as well as Clement, pretended to be deſirous to put an end to the Schiſm; but nothing was farther from their intentions. Clement VII, who died at Avignon in 1394, had for ſucceſſor Benedict XIII.

All Chriſtendom being tired and offended at the Schiſm, the Court of France endeavcured to perſuade the two Popes to reſign their Dignity, that another Pope might be canonically elected. They both conſented, but broke their word. Benedict eſpecially uſed ſo many evaſions, that the King of France reſolved to withdraw his Kingdom from his obedience. For that purpoſe, he gained the Cardinals of that Party, who promiſed to deſert him; but Benedict having notice, fortified himſelf in his palace of Avignon, by introducing an Arragonian Garriſon. He was beſieged by Marſhal Boucicaut, but ſhortly after, that General had orders to raiſe the Siege. Thus by the Intrigues of ſome Princes of the Court of France, the Schiſm ſtill continued, notwithſtanding the King's endeavours to cloſe it.

Nothing more remains but to give a brief account of ſuch Eccleſiaſticks as were eminent for their Merit and Learning, in the Reigns of the three Edwards and Richard II.

Kilwarby.

Robert Kilwarby, a Cordelier, or Minorite, was Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the Reign of Edward I, and a Prelate of eminent Learning for the age he lived in. He wrote ſeveral Theological Tracts, which were in great repute in thoſe days. His Merit having raiſed him to the dignity of a Cardinal, he reſigned his Archbiſhoprick, and went and lived at Rome, where he died.

Burnell.

Robert Burnell, Biſhop of Bath, was choſen for Succeſſor to Kilwarby; but the Pope, by the plenitude of his Apoſtolick Power, gave the See of Canterbury to John Peckham an Engliſh Franciſcan, who was Auditor of his Chamber. This Prelate had great conteſts with Edward I, as well on occaſion of the Canons of his Synod, before-mentioned, as upon other accounts. The quarrel went ſo far, that the King was going to baniſh him the Realm. He was reckoned very learned, particularly in the Civil and Canon Law. There are ſome Theological Tracts of his, with Commentaries upon ſeveral Books of the Scripture.

Peckham.

Winchelſey.

Robert Winchelſey, Succeſſor of Peckham, preferred his Archbiſhoprick to a Cardinalate which the Pope would have honoured him with. This Prelate is chiefly praiſed for his Charities. He uſed to relieve four thouſand poor People twice a week at his Houſe, beſides his maintaining many young Scholars at both the Univerſities. Theſe Charities gained him the affections of the People, who, after his death, flocked in crouds to his Tomb, and payed him the regard of a Saint. Mean while, this Archbiſhop, ſo beloved by the People, had great conteſts with Edward I, for being deeply concerned in the Intrigues of the Lords who oppoſed the deſigns of the King. The Pope, whom Edward knew how to gain to his intereſt, cited the Archbiſhop to Rome, to juſtify his conduct, and laid him under a ſuſpenſion. It was not till the Reign of Edward II, that he was reſtored.

M. Weſt. Walſing. Act. Pub. II. p. 989, 1002.

Britton.

John Britton Biſhop of Hereford, chiefly excelled in the knowledge of the common Law. He wrote a Book much eſteemed, de Juribus Anglicanis, and died in 1275.

Duns Scotus.

Joannes Duns Scotus, commonly called, Doctor Subtilis, lived in the Reign of Edward II, and is too well known to be inlarged upon. It ſuffices to obſerve, that he differed in many things from the opinion of Thomas Aquinas, and was a great Champion for the immaculate conception of the bleſſed Virgin. After being Profeſſor in Divinity at Oxford and Paris, he died at Cologn in the ſame Office, in 1309 or 1310.

Stapleton.

Walter Stapleton Biſhop of Exeter, was eminent for his Learning, and Capacity in the adminiſtration of the publick affairs; and particularly for Loyalty to Edward II, his Sovereign, for which he loſt his life, as was related in the Hiſtory of that Prince (2).

Stratford.

Stratford Archbiſhop of Canterbury under Edward III, was more famous as a Stateſman, than as an Archbiſhop. I have related elſewhere his conteſt with Edward III, who accuſed him of miſdemeanors. But afterwards, the King commanded his accuſations againſt him to be cancelled, as containing things neither true nor reaſonable.

Bradwardin.

Thomas Bradwardin Succeſſor of Stratford, was a great Philoſopher and Mathematician, and withal a very learned Divine. He was commonly called the profound Doctor, according to the cuſtom of thoſe days, of giving ſuch Titles, to thoſe that were eminent for their Learning. He wrote a Book againſt the Pelagians, which gained him great reputation, intitled, Of the Cauſe of God. But what rendered him ſtill more eſteemed than his learning, was, his humility, and his zeal to inſtruct the People committed to his care. Before his promotion to the Archiepiſcopal See, he was Confeſſor to Edward III, and attended that great Prince in all his expeditions. Some have done him the honour to ſay, that the progreſs of Edward's Arms, in France, was in great meaſure owing to his prudent Counſels.

Occam.

William Occam, of the Order of St. Francis, Diſciple of Duns Scotus, is famous for being head of the Nominaliſts againſt the Realiſts, of whom his Maſter Scotus was chief. It would be needleſs to explain here, wherein conſiſted the difference between theſe two Sects of Philoſophers, with which, God be thanked, the publick Schools are now ſeldom troubled.

Fitz-Ralph. Walſing. p. 173.

Richard Fitz-Ralph, Archbiſhop of Armagh (3), born at Dundalk in Ireland, was a great enemy to the mendicant Friers. He attacked them vigorouſly in his Sermons preached at London, wherein he undertook to prove the nine following Propoſitions:

I. That, with reſpect to the place where Confeſſions are to be made, the Pariſh Churches are to be preferred before thoſe of the Friers.

II. That Pariſhioners ought rather to confeſs to a Curate, than to a Frier.

III. That, notwithſtanding Jeſus Chriſt was poor whilſt upon earth, yet he never affected poverty.

IV. That Chriſt did never beg, nor make profeſſion of voluntary poverty.

V. That he never taught people to make profeſſion of beggary.

VI. That Chriſt held the contrary, namely, that Men ought not to beg by inclination and choice, but only when forced to it by neceſſity.

VII. That to profeſs beggary, is a thing contrary to Religion and common Senſe.

VIII. That to be under engagements of voluntary poverty, is not agreeable to the Rule of the Friers Minorites, or Cordeliers.

IX. That the Bull of Alexander IV, which condemns the Libel of the Doctors of Paris, cenſures none of theſe eight Propoſitions.

Theſe Articles, which attacked the mendicant Friers in the moſt ſenſible part, it being by their voluntary poverty that they had gained, and preserved their credit with the People, were carried to the Pope, who cited the Archbiſhop before him. He appeared, and couragiouſly maintained all his aſſertions. But before this affair was decided, he died at Avignon 1360. He tranſlated the Bible into Engliſh, and wrote two Treatiſes, one in defence of the Pariſh Prieſts, againſt the Friers; the other, de Audientia Confeſſionum.

Treviſa. John de Treviſa, a Corniſh Man, who lived in the Reign of Edward III, tranſlated the Bible, and ſeveral other Books into Engliſh. He was of the ſame opinion as the Archbiſhop of Armagh, and maintained, that Jeſus Chriſt ſent Apoſtles, but never mendicant Friers, to preach the Goſpel.

Theſe are almoſt all that were eminent for their Piety and Learning, during the four laſt Reigns, unleſs we reckon among the famous and learned Men, a Company of Schoolmen, who, in my opinion, deſerve not to be placed in that Claſs. Some add, the Founders of Colleges and Monaſteries, as meriting to hold a conſiderable rank among the devout. But theſe are too ambiguous marks to be relied on. One may judge by this ſmall number of learned Perſons, how the Sciences were degenerated, ſince, among all the above-named, hardly is there one truly learned. In ſpite of the prejudices of Wickliff's enemies, I ſhall make no ſcruple to excepted that Doctor, of whom I have already ſaid enough to excuſe me from adding any thing farther (1).

(1) The moſt noted Hiſtorians of the Fourteenth Century were:

Wikes. THOMAS WIKES. His Hiſtory begins at the Conqueſt, and ends at the Death of Edward I, 1304. He was Canon Regular of Oſney near Oxford, and writes as clearly and fully (eſpecially in ſome Paſſages relating to the Barons Wars) as ſo compendious a Chronicle as his is, would allow him to do. Dr. Gale has publiſhed this Hiſtory in his Hiſt. Angl. Vol. II.

Brompton. The Author of the Chronicle, which goes under the Name of JOHN BROMPTON, Abbot of Joreval or Jorevaulx in Yorkſhire, lived about this time. The Chronicle begins with the coming of Auſtin in 588, and ends with the Death of Richard I, 1198. It is plain from this Hiſtory's taking no notice of the Foundation of that Monaſtery, &c. that neither Brompton, nor any Member of that Religious Houſe was Author of this Chronicle, but that it was procured by that Abbot, and by him beſtowed on his Monaſtery. The Author (whoever he be) is very full in his Collections for the Saxon Times, but takes no notice of the Chronological part in the whole Hiſtory of the Heptarchy. He gives the Saxon Laws at large, and tranſlates pretty honeſtly. This Chronicle is publiſhed among the Decem Scriptores.

Higden. RANULPH HIGDEN, Monk of St. Werburgh's in Cheſter, where he died very aged in 1377, was a downright Plagiary. He falls foul on William of Malmbury in many Places. He ſtiles his Work, Polychronicon. What he collected relating to the Times of the Britons and Saxons, has been lately publiſhed by Dr. Gale, Vol. I. who commends him for preſerving many Remains out of antient Chronicles, now wholly loſt or miſlaid.

Matthew of Weſtminſter Merimuth. MATTHEW, a Benedictine Monk of WESTMINSTER, ended his Hiſtory at the Year 1307, though it was afterwards continued by other Hands. He was a choice Collector of the Flowers of former Hiſtorians, from whence he is uſually ſtiled Florilegus. He entirely tranſcribes Matthew Paris. His moſt eminent Continuator was Adam Merimuth, Canon Regular of St. Paul's, and an eminent Civilian, who in his latter Days gave himſelf wholly to the Reading and Writing Engliſh Hiſtory. He begins his Work at 1302, and reaches to 1380.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XI.

The Reigns of HENRY IV, and HENRY V; Containing the Space of Twenty two Years and Ten Months.

13. HENRY IV. Sirnam'd of BULLINGBROKE.

1399. HENRY IV. continues the ſame Parliament called by Richard.

HENRY Duke of Lancaſter, ſirnamed of Bullingbroke the place of his Birth (1), having been proclaimed the 30th of September, took that very day the reins of the Government. As the Parliament then aſſembled was called in Richard's name, and as their Authority ceaſed upon his being depoſed, Henry's firſt care was to call another. To proceed according to cuſtom, the Repreſentatives muſt have been choſen anew. But Henry did not think fit to run the risk, of having a leſs favorable Parliament than that which had ſo heartily eſpouſed his Cauſe. He was contented therefore, with impowering the ſame Repreſentatives, to make, with the Houſe of Lords, a new Parliament under his Authority. I ſhall not venture to decide, whether this proceeding was ſomewhat irregular, or authorized by any former precedent. Be this as it will, after a few days interruption, the ſame Parliament met again on the 9th of October, as if called by the new King.

Cotton & Abridg. Brady.

The Earl of March retires to Wigmore.

Mean time Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, conſidering it would be no leſs dangerous than fruitleſs, at ſuch a juncture, to aſſert his juſt right to the Crown, retired to his Lordſhip of Wigmore (2), near the borders of Wales. The more inconteſtable his Title was, the more reaſon he had to dread the new King's jealouſy. So, giving way to the torrent which he could not ſtem, he reſolved to live in retirement, without ſhewing the leaſt ambition, or the leaſt uneaſineſs at the injuſtice that was done him. He had no other way to ſecure his repoſe, and even his life, againſt the ſuſpicions of a Prince whoſe Intereſt it was to deſtroy him. It was but too probable, that the new King would embrace the firſt occaſion, to free himſelf from the uneaſineſs which ſuch a Rival could create. 1399.

The Archbiſhop harangues the Parliament in praiſe of the new King. Cotton. Ibid.

The Parliament being aſſembled, as I ſaid, Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury made a long Speech, tending to inſpire a high opinion of the advantages procured to the Kingdom by the late Revolution. He enlarged chiefly on the diſorders of the late Reign, and aſſured, that the new Sovereign propoſed to govern after a very different manner, and to preſerve to All their Rights and Liberties. This Prelate was baniſhed the Realm in the late Reign, and Roger Walden, who was appointed in his room, had hitherto performed the Archiepiſcopal Functions. But as Arundel was not canonically depoſed, the Parliament in their firſt Seſſion (3) ordered that he ſhould reſume his Dignity, and the rather as the other had not yet obtained the Pope's Confirmation. The Archbiſhop's Speech, and ſome preliminary Formalities, were the only things remarkable in the firſt Seſſion of the new Parliament, which was adjourned to the 14th of October. This Adjournment was neceſſary in order to prepare for the Coronation, which was to be on the 13th.

The King fills the vacant Poſts; rewards the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland. Act Pub. VIII. p. 89, 90, 95. Walſing.

During this interval, the King filled ſeveral Poſts, which were vacant, or poſſeſſed by Perſons he did not like. Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, and Ralph Nevill Earl of Weſtmoreland, had ſhewn too great a zeal for the King, by joining him at Ravenſpur, preſently after his landing, not to have a ſhare in his favours. Henry willing to ſhew his Gratitude, made the firſt High-Conſtable, and the other, Earl-Marſhal (4). A few days after, he gave alſo to the Earl of Northumberland the Iſle of Man, Thomas his ſecond Son made High-Steward. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 90. Walſing.

After Henry had requited theſe two Lords, whom he conſidered as moſt attached to his Intereſt and Perſon, he made Thomas of Lancaſter his ſecond Son, High-Steward. It was abſolutely neceſſary to fill this Poſt before the Coronation, becauſe to the High-Steward's Court all muſt apply who claim any ſervice in that Ceremony, in order to be maintained in their Rights. But as the Prince was not above ten years old, the King gave him for Deputy, Thomas Percy Earl of Worceſter, Brother to the Earl of Northumberland.

The King is crowned, and anointed with an extraordinary Oil. Walſing. p. 360, 361. Froiſſart, l. 4. c. 55.

On the 13th of October, Edward the Confeſſor's day, Henry was crowned with all the uſual Formalities, being then thirty three years of age (2). He was anointed with a certain Oil, pretended to be brought by the bleſſed Virgin, to St. Thomas of Canterbury, whilſt he was in France. The Vial which held this precious Oil, was fallen into the hands of a Hermit, who preſented it to Henry Duke of Lancaſter, Grandſon of Henry III, with this Prophecy, That the Kings which ſhould be anointed with that ſacred Oil, ſhould become true Champions for the Church. The Duke of Lancaſter gave it afterwards to the famous Prince of Wales, Son of Edward III, who was reſolved to be anointed with it when crowned. After the death of that Prince, the Vial, which was of ſtone, having on the top a gold Eagle ſet with Diamonds, was laid up among the Jewels, without being minded. Richard II, his Son, finding it, ſome time before his laſt Voyage into Ireland, deſigned to be crowned again, on purpoſe to be anointed with this divine Oil. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury oppoſed it, by repreſenting, that the unction of Kings ought not to be repeated. At length, the Vial was fallen into Henry's hands (3), who, either out of devotion, or becauſe it came from the Duke of Lancaſter his Grandfather by the Mother's ſide, was pleaſed to be anointed with it at his Coronation. But if we examine the Reigns of this Prince, and ſeveral of his Succeſſors, who were anointed with the ſame Oil, we ſhall not find, that the good Hermit's Prophecy was accompliſhed.

Henry refuſes to own he holds the Crown of the People.

I have obſerved, in the Reign of Richard II, that when, after the depoſing of that Prince, Henry claimed the Crown, he affected to uſe obſcure expreſſions. His aim was to make the People believe, there was ſome foundation in the right, he pretended to derive from the firſt Houſe of Lancaſter, of which he was Heir by his Mother. But this pretext, which might then have ſome effect upon ſuch as voluntarily ſhut their eyes, was too groſs to deceive any longer. It was therefore neceſſary for the new King, to find ſome plauſible Title, to juſtify the Nation's choice of his Perſon. There was none more lawful than the ſervice he had juſt done the State. But he judged it dangerous to reſt his Right upon ſuch a foundation. When he was to receive the Crown, he very willingly owned the Parliament's power to confer it upon him. But when it was once placed on his head, he was afraid, from that principle it would be inferred, that they who had given the Crown, had power to take it away. He was therefore under ſome perplexity. It was requiſite the People ſhould be ſatisfied, that the Parliament could lawfully depoſe Richard, and that their Authority was ſuperior to the King's. On the other hand, it was convenient to let them underſtand, that in placing Henry on the Throne, the ſame Parliament proceeded not by way of Authority, and could not diſpenſe with owning him for King. In a word, they were to acknowledge in the Parliament an unlimited Power with reſpect to Richard's depoſing, and to decline their Authority in the late Election. Theſe two things ſeemed irreconcileable. But when a Man has power on his ſide, he does not ſo much trouble himſelf about finding good reaſons, as about dazzling the Publick with appearances. Henry, perſuaded that in this juncture, no one would have the boldneſs to contradict him, reſolved to let his Subjects know, he did not mean to derive his Right from their bare conſent. On his very Coronation day, he publiſhed a Proclamation, declaring, that he aſcended the Throne, Firſt, by right of Conqueſt: Secondly, by virtue of Richard's reſignation, and deſignation of him for his Succeſſor: Laſtly, as he was the next Male-Heir of the late King (4). By this means he excluded the only lawful Title he had, namely, the general conſent of the People, in order to build his claim upon three manifeſtly weak foundations. In the firſt place, how could he pretend to a right of Conqueſt? He entered the Kingdom but with fourſcore Men, who, probably, were for the moſt part Engliſh. Beſides, his good ſucceſs was entirely owing to the concurrence of all England, and conſequently he could not ſay he had conquered the Kingdom. In the next place, it was not true that Richard reſigned the Crown to him. It was ſeen in the Reign of that Prince, that Henry himſelf, as well as his Friends, did not think it proper. Richard was only obliged to make an abſolute reſignation, leaſt it ſhould appear too conſtrained, if he did it in favour of a Prince, to whom he was actually a Priſoner. Moreover, ſuppoſing Richard had appointed Henry for his Succeſſor, how could a King, depoſed for Tyranny and Inability, be allowed a Right to chuſe the Perſon who ſhould ſucceed him, eſpecially as the nomination was contrary to the Laws of the Land? Laſtly, it was ſtill leſs true, that Henry was Richard's next Heir, unleſs the Salic Law had been revived in England, as in France, and the deſcendants of the Daughters were debarred the Succeſſion. It is true, in the third Title alledged by the King, there was a ſort of equivocation capable of deceiving. He was Couſin-German of the late King, and conſequently a nearer Relation than the Earl of March, who was one degree farther removed. But it did not follow, that he was the next Heir, ſince, with reſpect to the Succeſſion, the Branch, and not the Degree of Relation, was to be regarded. Thus, after the death of Edward III, Richard his Grandſon ſucceeded him, though he was one degree farther removed than his Uncles. Again, ſuppoſing this rule had not been inviolably obſerved, Henry could not ſay, he was the neareſt Relation of Richard. He was firſt Couſin; but the Duke of York, who was Uncle, had no leſs right than he. So, on which ſide ſoever Henry's pretended Titles were viewed, they muſt have appeared ill-grounded. The only Title he could have produced with any colour, was the conſent of the People. But he would not uſe it for the reaſon abovementioned. 1399.

The King's Proclamation to ſhew his Title to the Crown. Hayward. Froiſſart, l. 4. c. 5.

The ſame day the King iſſued his Proclamation, he created Henry his eldeſt Son, aged thirteen Years, Duke of Cornwal, Prince of Wales, and Earl of Cheſter. But he added not to theſe Titles, as ſome affirm (5) that of Duke of Aquitain. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 91, 94. Walſing.

The Parliament meets. Cotton's Abridg.

The Ceremony of the Coronation being ended, the Parliament met the next day, being the fourteenth of October. The importance of the Acts paſſed in this Seſſion, obliges me to deſcend to particulars, abſolutely neceſſary for the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

Acts of Parliament.

In the firſt place, was paſſed an Act of Indemnity, to ſcreen thoſe, who during the late troubles, had taken Arms in favour of the King, then Duke of Lancaſter. This Act was abſolutely neceſſary, ſince the Laws condemned, without diſtinction, thoſe that oppoſed the Government eſtabliſhed, which was preciſely the caſe of the King's Friends, and of the King himſelf.

The Parliament examines the Proceedings of the former one. Walſing.

After this Act was paſſed, the Parliament examined whatever was done in the late Reign, to ſtretch the Prerogative Royal beyond the uſual bounds. They applied themſelves chiefly to the Proceedings of the Parliament begun at Weſtminſter in 1397, and continued at Shrewsbury in 1398. All the Acts, as well with regard to the three Lords unjuſtly condemned, as to the exorbitant privileges granted to the King, were ſo manifeſtly deſtructive of the Nation's Liberties, that they were unanimouſly repealed. At the ſame time were revived and confirmed, the Statutes of the Parliament of 1388, annulled by that of Shrewsbury. It was thought likewiſe abſolutely neceſſary to paſs a particular Act againſt the Pope's Bull, ratifying the Statutes of Shrewsbury. This Bull, whereby Richard II pretended to give more ſtrength to Acts of Parliament, was founded on a Principle too oppoſite to the Rights of the People to be ſuffered to ſubſiſt. For the Pope's power to confirm Acts of Parliament could not be acknowledged, without aſcribing to him a Right of Sovereignty over England. Wherefore, the Parliament declared in this Act, that the Kingdom of England was independent of all foreign power,

(1) He was to hold the Iſle of Man by that Office. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 8. p. 91, 95.------per ſervitium portandi, diebus Coronationis noſtræ & Hæredum noſtrorum, per ſe ipſum aut ſufficientem & honorificum Deputatum ſuum, illum gladium nudum, quo cincti eramus quando in partibus de Holderneſſe applicuimus, vocatum Lancaſtre Swerde.------

(5) Rapin is herein miſtaken, for it appears from Cotton's Abridg. That King Henry now enacted, that his eldeſt Son Henry ſhould be called Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain, Lancaſter, and Cornwall, and Earl of Cheſter, p. 392. See Walſing. p. 361.

1399. particularly of the Court of Rome, and that the Pope had no right to interpoſe in the civil Government of the Realm.

The Shrewsbury Parliament deſigning to extend the Royal Authority as much as poſſible, had ſo multiplied the Caſes of High-Treaſon (1), that none, but ſuch as acknowledged in the Sovereign an unlimited power, could poſſibly avoid the penalty of it. To redreſs ſo dangerous a Grievance, which tended to render the King abſolute maſter of the Lives and Fortunes of his Subjects, the Parliament revived a Statute, made in the Reign of Edward III (2), and enacted, that nothing ſhould be adjudged to be Treaſon, but what was contained therein.

Richard's Adviſers and Favorites are called to account. Walſing. Cotton's Abridg.

After the Rights and Privileges of the People were, by theſe Acts, reſtored to the ſame ſtate as before the incroachments of Richard, the Authors and Adviſers of the Uſurpations were called to an account When King Richard apprehended the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, he was not inveſted with that abſolute power, ſo liberally conferred upon him afterwards by the Shrewsbury Parliament; ſo that he was forced to proceed according to Law, in the condemnation of theſe three Lords. To that end, he ſo ordered it, that John Holland Earl of Huntington, his Half-Brother Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, his Nephew, Edward [Plantagenet] Earl of Albemarle, his Couſin, Son of the Duke of York, John Beaufort Earl of Somerſet, Son of the Duke of Lancaſter by his third Wife, and the Lord Thomas Spencer, were the Accuſers of the three impriſoned Lords. The Earl of Salisbury (3) and the Lord Morley (4), were reported to be the chief contrivers of this Plot. After condemnation, Richard diſtributed the Eſtates of the three Lords among the Accuſers and Evidences. Moreover, he made the Earl of Albemarle a Duke, and conferred the Title of Duke of Exeter on the Earl of Huntington, of Duke of Surrey on the Earl of Kent, of Duke of Somerſet on the Earl of Somerſet, and of Earl of Gloceſter on Thomas Spencer.

Walſing. As it was publickly known, that the three Lords were unjuſtly oppreſſed by the late King, the Parliament thought it neceſſary to puniſh the Authors and Inſtruments of this violence. For that purpoſe, after reverſing the ſentence againſt the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, as directly contrary to the pardon that was granted them, it was reſolved, that the Accuſers ſhould be deprived both of their new Titles, and the Eſtates diſtributed among them (5). As to their own Lands, it was left to the King, either to continue them in poſſeſſion, or turn them out as he pleaſed. Henry, willing to ſhow his clemency in the beginning of his Reign, not only left them their Eſtates, but likewiſe reſtored them to their Honours. Moreover, he made the Duke of Exeter his Brother-in-law (6) Governor of Calais. The Earl of Salisbury and the Lord Morley, Richard's deteſted Miniſters, and principal Authors of the violence practiſed upon the Duke of Gloceſter, and the other two Lords, were releaſed after a ſhort impriſonment, though the People loudly called for their death. As the Friends of theſe Lords alledged in their excuſe, that Richard compelled them to act, the Parliament took occaſion to paſs an Act, declaring, That for the future, compulſion ſhould be no legal excuſe to juſtify actions contrary to Law.

General Pardon. This affair being over, the Parliament prevailed with the King to grant a general Pardon, in which however were excepted, the Duke of Gloceſter's Murderers. One of the Villains (7) being apprehended and convicted, was hanged at London, and his head ſent to Calais, to be fixt on one of the Gates.

The Succeſſion ſettled on the Houſe of Lancaſter. Walſing. Cotton's Abridg.

Though the injuſtice done to the Earl of March was manifeſt, it might in ſome meaſure be coloured, with the pretence of rewarding Henry for the ſignal ſervice he had done the State. If this reward had been limited to his Perſon, perhaps it would not have ſeemed very ſtrange, that in ſo extraordinary a caſe the Laws ſhould be ſuperſeded in favour of a Prince, who had ſo freely expoſed himſelf for the Publick. But at ſuch Junctures, it is very difficult to keep within the bounds of Equity. The Parliament, not content with adjudging to Henry the Crown taken from Richard, would moreover ſecure it to his Poſterity. To that end, an Act was paſſed, ſettling the Succeſſion on the Houſe of Lancaſter; firſt on the Perſon of the Prince of Wales, the King's eldeſt Son and his Heirs, then on his three Brothers and their Iſſue. 1399.

The King aſks the Parliament what is to be done with Richard. Cotton's Abridg.

A very important affair ſtill remained, concerning which the King was deſirous to have the advice of the Parliament before they broke up. The Commons, not ſatisfied with the bare depoſing of Richard, after a very irregular manner, would have had him tried in form, and petitioned the King for that purpoſe (8). It was therefore to know how Richard was to be diſpoſed of, that the King wanted the advice of the two Houſes. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was charged with his Orders, having exacted an Oath of Secrecy from all the Members, made the firſt motion. It may well be thought, that Richard had not many Friends in the Houſe, and if any diſapproved of the Proceedings againſt him, they were too much awed to venture to ſpeak in his behalf. There was one however bold enough, to ſay publickly, what others only thought, namely, Thomas Merks Biſhop of Carliſle, who, without regarding the motives which might induce him, as well as the reſt of Richard's Friends, to keep ſilence, made a long Speech, wherein he alledged every thing that could with any plauſibleneſs be ſaid for the King depoſed, and againſt the King on the Throne.

The Biſhop of Carliſle's Speech in Defence of Richard.

The Biſhop undertook to prove three things. "Firſt, "That there was no Authority which could lawfully "depoſe a King of England. Secondly, That the of- "fences Richard was accuſed of deſerved not Depoſi- "tion, and beſides were not proved. Thirdly, That "the Crown was unjuſtly adjudged to the Duke of Lan- "caſter.

"He enlarged very much on the firſt, ſhowing the "great difference between the ſeveral kinds of Go- "vernment eſtabliſhed in the World. He confeſſed that "in ſome, the Prince or Head might be depoſed, be- "cauſe the ſupreme authority was not ſolely lodged in "his Perſon, but the People, or Nobles, had a ſhare. Of "this ſort he reckoned the Republicks, the antient Go- "vernment of Rome, the Empire of Germany, the King- "doms of Swedeland and Denmark, the Earldom of "Flanders, and ſome other States. But he maintained, "it was otherwiſe in the Governments where the ſu- "preme authority reſides in the ſingle Perſon of the "Sovereign. In this claſs he ranked the Kingdom of "Iſrael, among the Antients, with the three firſt Em- "pires; and among the Moderns, England, France, "Spain, Scotland, Muſcovy, Turkey, Perſia, and in ge- "neral all the Kingdoms of Aſia and Africa. With re- "gard to theſe he alledged, that though the vices of a "Sovereign ſhould be not only detrimental, but even "intolerable to his Subjects, he could not be lawfully "depoſed by any means whatever: That force could "not be uſed, without incurring the Crime of Rebelli- "on and Treaſon; and much leſs authority, ſince there "was not in the State any lawful authority but what "was derived from him. He produced Arguments and "Precedents from the Holy Scriptures and profane Au- "thors, which cannot be repeated without being exceſſively "tedious".

Upon the ſecond Article, he boldly aſſerted, "That "the Crimes for which Richard was depoſed, were ei- "ther falſe or aggravated: That indeed, he might be guil- "ty of ſome errors or overſights, but his faults could "not be ſtiled Tyranny: That if his Failings afforded "juſt cauſe to depoſe him, how many Sovereigns would "daily be treated as Tyrants, and depoſed by their Sub- "jects? Every Tax, execution of Rebels, in a word, "whatever was not reliſhed by the People, would furniſh "a pretence to dethrone the moſt lawful Prince". He paſſed over the more ſlightly the proofs of this ſecond Head, as the Parliament it ſelf ſeemed to queſtion the truth of the Crimes alledged againſt Richard, ſince there was no ſtep taken to prove them in a legal manner. By the way, it is very likely that for fear of this reproach, the Commons wanted to proceed in form againſt the depoſed King.

Upon the third Article the Biſhop maintained, "That "even ſuppoſing Richard guilty; and granting the Na-

1399. " tion had Authority to depoſe him, there was not the " leaſt colour of Juſtice to give the Crown to the Duke " of Lancaſter. That if the Duke was the true Heir of " Richard, as he pretended, he muſt wait his death be- " fore he could inherit. But it was known to all then, " there was a nearer Heir, whoſe Father was declared " Succeſſor of Richard by Act of Parliament." As for Henry's pretended right from Edmund Crouch-back Son of Henry III, the Biſhop diſdained to conſider it, affirming, " he was very certain, that People of ſenſe were " aſhamed of a Right, built upon ſo ſlender a Founda- " tion."

After this the Orator proceeded to examine the other two Titles contained in the King's Proclamation, namely, Conqueſt, and Richard's Reſignation. To the firſt he ſaid, " That a Subject could never pretend to a Right of " Conqueſt againſt his Sovereign, ſince the Victory it ſelf " was high and heinous Treaſon." As for the reſigna- tion, he ſaid, " it was not only extorted by Force, but " ſuppoſing it voluntary, could be of no Validity: That " in Richard's ſituation, it was not in his power to make " a valid Act: That beſides, ſince by the Laws of the " Land the King could not alienate the Crown Jewels, " much leſs ſurely could he give away the Crown it " ſelf (1)." Then he ſpoke of the general conſent of the People, though Henry had not thought proper to inſiſt upon it; " That the Kingdom of England having ne- " ver been Elective, it was ridiculous to aſcribe to the " People the power of diſpoſing of the Crown." Laſt- ly, he replied to the objection, which might be alledged from the depoſing of Edward II, " That wiſe Men " muſt be guided by Law, and not by Examples and " Precedents. That however the depoſing of Edward II, " was no more to be urged, than the poiſoning of King " John, or the murder of any other Prince: But even " in the depoſing of Edward II, care was taken to pre- " ſerve the Rights of the lawful Succeſſor."

What the Biſhop had hitherto ſaid, might paſs for rea- ſons, to queſtion whether Richard II could be lawfully de- poſed. At moſt, it might be conſidered as the private opinion of the Speaker. But towards the concluſion of his Speech, he launched out ſtrangely againſt Henry, and expreſſed a paſſion very injurious to the reaſons he had alledged. He ſaid, " it was to be feared the People of " England would ſoon find themſelves in the caſe of " Æſop's Frogs; boldly adding, as long as Richard was " alive, the Engliſh could not with Juſtice own any other " Sovereign. In fine, he maintained, that the Perſon " whom they called King, had committed much more " heinous crimes, than thoſe for which Richard was de- " poſed: That he had, after his Baniſhment, entered the " Kingdom, contrary to his Oath, and without being le- " gally recalled: That, not content with diſturbing the " quiet of the Land, by an unjuſt and impious Inſurrec- " tion againſt his Sovereign, he had moreover diſpoſſeſſed " him: That he had alſo demanded Judgment againſt " him, without offering to prove his accuſation, or per- " mitting the Party accuſed to make his defence, con- " trary to the expreſs Laws of the Realm." He conclu- " ded with ſaying, " That if the wrong done Richard " was not capable of moving the Hearts of the Engliſh, " at leaſt their common and manifeſt danger ought to ſtop " the courſe of theſe violent proceedings."

The Biſhop impriſoned. This Speech produced not the effect the Speaker ex- pected. It was ſo unſeaſonable, that, ſuppoſing the Ma- jority had been of his mind, it was impoſſible to recede from what had been done. But moſt of the Members perſiſted in the ſame Maxims they had followed when Richard was depoſed. Accordingly, the Biſhop reap- Godwin in Epiſ. Carl. ed no other fruit from his Harangue, than to be con- fined in the Abbey of St. Albans, from whence how- ever he was ſhortly after releaſed without farther puniſh- ment (2).

Extraordinary Sentence paſſed upon Richard. The Biſhop of Carliſle's opinion being unanimouſly re- jected, the Parliament came, with regard to Richard, to a reſolution, ſeemingly ſo extraordinary, that there is ſome reaſon to ſuſpect, that Hiſtory is defective in this place. However all the Hiſtorians agree, that it was re- ſolved, Richard ſhould be kept in confinement during Life, with a princely allowance: But in caſe any Perſon ſhould attempt his deliverance, Richard ſhould be the firſt Man that ſhould ſuffer death. If this be true, it cannot be denied that he was really condemned to die, ſince his Life was only granted him, on a condition not in his Power. Beſides, ſuch a condition cannot be annexed to 1399. the Sentence of a Criminal, but on ſuppoſition that he is already condemned.

Remarks on the Sentence. It is not my buſineſs to determine, how far the autho- rity of the Parliament may be extended, with reſpect to the King's Perſon. I ſhall only obſerve, that this is the ſecond inſtance of the depoſing of a King of England, without hearing his defence, or ſo much as obſerving the uſual Formalities preſcribed by the Law, in the Trial of the meaneſt Subject. The Parliament which depoſed Ed- ward II, was ſatisfied with decreeing, that he ſhould be kept in ſafe Cuſtody during Life. But this Parliament, to Richard's depoſing, adds the ſentence of Death: For no otherwiſe can the condition be conſidered, upon which his Life is granted. Let us farther remark, that one of the chief Articles of accuſation againſt this Prince, was his putting to death the Duke of Gloceſter his Uncle, with- out a previous Trial. And yet this ſame Parliament con- demns him unheard, upon his bare Confeſſion, when a Priſoner; not, that he is guilty of the particular crimes laid to his charge, but that he is in his own opinion un- worthy to wear the Crown. They are not content with ſtripping him of his Royalty, but order him to be impri- ſoned for Life. What do I ſay? They really condemn him to die, ſince in ſeeming to grant him his Life, they add a condition, which probably muſt ſoon make him loſe it. If in peruſing the Reign of Richard II, one can't help deteſting the Principles of the Shrewsbury Parliament, which tended to ſubject the Lives, Honours, and For- tunes of the Nation to the King's Will, what ought we to think of this? By a contrary exceſs, they put the Life and Honour of the King himſelf in the power of his Sub- jects, and refuſe the Sovereign a privilege, which every Engliſh Subject has a juſt Right to demand. The exam- ples theſe two Parliaments afford, are a clear evidence, that the Engliſh Conſtitution can never pretend to that degree of perfection, boaſted by ſome, till the bounds to be preſcribed to the Prerogative Royal, and the privileges of Parliament, are preciſely determined.

The King aſſures the Clergy of his Protecti- on. Whilſt the two Houſes acted in common, and with e- qual ardour, for the intereſt of the Prince they had placed on the Throne, the Convocation was ſitting in St. Paul's. As the King rightly judged, that, in order to ſupport him- ſelf in the Throne, it was abſolutely neceſſary to make the Clergy his Friends, he ſent the Earls of Northumber- land and Weſtmoreland, to aſſure them of his protection. The Earls being admitted into the Aſſembly, ſaid, they were come from the King, not to demand Money, as was cuſtomary in the late Reign, but to acquaint the Clergy of the King's reſolution to maintain their Pri- vileges and Immunities. Adding, they had Orders to aſ- He promiſes to extirpate Hereſy. ſure the Convocation, that the King was ready to con- cur with them, in whatever means ſhould be judged pro- per to extirpate Hereſy, and puniſh obſtinate Hereticks. They concluded, with deſiring the Clergy's Prayers for the welfare of the King and Kingdom. Nothing was more apt to gain the Hearts of the Eccleſiaſticks, than the King's promiſe with regard to Hereſy. The number of the Lollards, which daily increaſed, gave the Clergy juſt occaſion to fear, that in the end a Reformation might be ſet on foot, which could not be but very detrimental to their temporal Intereſts. Accordingly, the aſſurances the King gave the Convocation, were received with great Demonſtrations of Joy and Thankfulneſs.

The Parli- ament diſ- ſolved. Some days after, the Parliament having finiſhed the principal affairs to the King's ſatisfaction, and, in appear- ance, with the approbation of the whole Kingdom, was diſſolved according to Cuſtom. Prorogations were not then ſo frequent as ſince (3).

Ambaſſadors ſent to di- vers Courts. Walſing. During the whole Seſſion, Henry had little attended to foreign affairs. Thoſe at home ſeemed to him of much greater moment, ſince the buſineſs was to ſettle a Revo- lution that procured him the Crown. As ſoon as he found himſelf free from theſe firſt concerns, he thought of means to juſtify to the other Sovereigns, the late altera- tions in England. The depoſing of a King being odious in it ſelf, and ſeeming to affect all Princes, it was not eaſy to perſwade them, that a Nation had ſufficient reaſon to uſe ſo violent a remedy, to free themſelves from Tyran- ny. Upon this account, Henry diſpatched Ambaſſadors to all the principal Courts of Europe (4), to endeavour to give a plauſible colour to Richard's depoſition, and his own promotion. He was chiefly concerned to pacify the Court of France, as the only one whoſe reſentment was dangerous (1). He was not ignorant, that Charles VI had formed a design to revenge the injury done his Son-in-Law, and that his distemper, into which he was relapsed upon hearing the news, had hindered him from instantly breaking the twenty eight years Truce, made with England. Henry chose, for Ambassadors, the Bishop of Durham and Earl of Worcester (2), who had Instructions, to propose a perpetual League and Alliance between the two Crowns. Moreover, he ordered them to make overtures for a double Marriage. The first, which he had projected, was between Henry his eldest Son, and a Daughter of the French King, or one of his Uncles: The second, between his own Daughter and one of the same King's Sons, or nearest Relations. The Ambassadors met with a cold reception in France; but, as they had Orders not to obstruct their Negotiation, by standing on Ceremony, they patiently waited till the French were grown cooler.

Disposition of the other Courts.

As for the other Courts of Europe, Henry had no occasion to proceed so cautiously. The Emperor Wenceslaus, who was still alive, was a Prince grown stupid with drinking, and withal, like the rest of the German Princes, regardless of what passed in England. As for the Kings of Castile and Portugal, they were rather gainers than losers by a Revolution, that advanced their Brother-in-law to the Throne. So, they readily approved, or at least seemed to approve it.

The Gascons ready, to revolt. Froissart, l. 4. c. 56. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 110, &c.

But another affair of more importance created the new King great uneasiness. Guienne was going to revolt. Already the Gascons publickly talked, of putting themselves under the Dominion of France. It was the City of Bourdeaux, Richard's Birth-place, that stirred up the whole Province, prompted by her affection for that unhappy Prince, whose misfortune she lamented. On the other hand, the Court of France, watchful to improve these dispositions, had sent the Duke of Bourbon into Guienne, to inflame these discontents. The famous Robert Knolles Governour of that Province, who was no less commendable for his Prudence than Valour, could hardly curb the rebellious Spirit of the Gascons. Nay perhaps he would never have accomplished it, had he not been timely assisted by the Earl of Worcester (3), who being in Embassy at Paris, speedily posted to Bourdeaux. The moderation and prudent conduct of these two Lords, effected what could scarce have been executed by Force, and at length they had the satisfaction of seeing the commotions appeased.

The Scots take Werk-Castle. Walsing.

Henry had moreover upon his hands another affair, which gave him no less disturbance. As he was sensible, that amidst all the Acclamations he was flattered with, it could not be, but that the late Revolution had bred many Male-contents, it was his interest to keep Peace with his Neighbours. Accordingly this was his purpose, least a foreign War employing his Forces abroad, he should be unprovided, in case of any sudden Insurrection. Besides, a War would have obliged him to demand Supplies of the Parliament, which he was willing to avoid, till his Dominion was more firmly established. These considerations made him extremely uneasy, to hear that the Scots had broke the Truce, and taken Werk Castle (4). He thought best, however, to take no notice of this insult, till it was more in his power to revenge it. But least this dissimulation should incourage the King of Scotland, he sent Ambassadors to demand satisfaction for this outrage. However, as the Scots complained likewise, on their side, of some breach on the part of the English, he made use of that pretence to demand a Confirmation of the Truce, by a mutual reparation of the damages the two Nations had done each other. When Robert broke the Truce, he imagined France would take his part, and that the deposing of Richard would raise Commotions in England, which he designed to improve. But finding France remained quiet, and England undisturbed, he did not think fit to push his enterprize further. So, without much Sollicitation, he agreed to put his affairs with Henry in Negotiation.

A Negotiation.

Henry tries to gain the People's Affection.

Things being thus in a fair way abroad, Henry chiefly applied himself to what might contribute to support him on the Throne. Two things were absolutely necessary for that purpose. First, to preserve the affection the People had hitherto expressed for him. Secondly to guard Richard so strictly, that it should be impossible for him to make his escape. As to the first, he affected to make himself popular, by showing, upon all occasions, a detestation of his Predecessor's Tyrannical Government, and a greater concern for the People's interest than for his own. To that end, he ordered all the subscribed Blanks extorted by Richard from the Inhabitants of London, and the seventeen condemned Counties, to be brought into Chancery and publickly burnt. These Blank Bonds, which were called Ragmans, had been filled, not only with the Sums, Richard was pleased to exact from the Subscribers, but moreover with an engagement to observe, under certain Penalties, the Statutes of Shrewsbury and all the consequent Acts. In burning these Bonds, Henry's intent was to insinuate to the People, that he designed not to make an advantage of these extorted engagements, much less to practice the like Methods himself to fill his Coffers.

He burns the Bonds Richard had extorted. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 109.

As for the deposed King, he did not think proper to keep him any longer in the Tower of London, for fear he should move the compassion of the Citizens, but ordered him to be conducted to the Castle of Leeds in the County of Kent. Some time after, fearing still, that Richard's Neighbourhood to London would give too frequent occasion to talk of him, he caused him to be removed to Pontfract Castle in the North.

Richard is shut up in Pontfract Castle.

This year in November, John the Valiant, Duke of Bretagne, departed this Life in his Capital City. His first Wife was Daughter of Edward III, by whom he had no Issue. By his second, Joan of Navarre, he left two Sons, of whom John the eldest succeeded him, under the Guardianship of the Duke of Burgundy and Oliver de Clisson (5).

Death of the Duke of Bretagne.

In this manner passed the three first Months of Henry's Reign, in a deceitful Calm, followed by violent Storms. It was necessary to enlarge a little on the first events of this Reign, because they serve for Foundation to all the rest.

The year 1400, began with a Conspiracy against the King, from which he was as it were miraculously delivered. Historians somewhat differ concerning the first Author of this Plot, commonly ascribed to the Abbot of Westminster. However it is more likely, the Abbot was only the Agent of the Lords Conspirators, and lent them his House for their Meetings. Perhaps he was employed to sound the inclinations of several Persons, according to the direction of Men more powerful than he. However this be, it is agreed, that in his House the Plot was formed, into which came as Heads, the [late] Dukes of Albemarle, Surrey and Exeter, the [late] Earls of Gloucester and Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlisle, and Sir Thomas Blunt. All these Lords had been in great favour with Richard II, and were the same Persons to whom the King had left their Honours and Estates, taken from them by the Parliament (6). Among these Conspirators, John Holland Duke of Exeter was his Brother-in-law, and Edward de Langley Duke of Albemarle his First-Cousin. Notwithstanding these Relations, and the favours they had all received from the King, they resolved to assassinate him and restore Richard to the Throne. The affection shown them by that unfortunate Prince, the desire of revenging their late disgrace, of which they looked upon the King as the principal Author, and perhaps the fear that the pardon granted them was not sincere, concurred to inspire them with this furious resolution. They had drawn into the Plot one Maudlin a Domestick of Richard's (7), who resembled his Master so perfectly, that many were deceived. The result of their debates was, that the Duke of Exeter and John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, should pretend to challenge one another at a Tournament, to be held at Oxford, and desire the King to honour it with his presence; and, whilst he should be intent upon the Sight, an opportunity should be taken to murder him. To the end each might know what part he was to act in this Tragedy, they carefully set down all the particulars in writing. Then they transcribed six Copies under their Hands and Seals, of which each of the principal Parties took one. Pursuant to this Plot, the Duke of Exeter waited upon the King at Windsor, and invited him, as was agreed. The King not mistrusting a Brother-in-law to whom he had just given such signal Marks of his favour, promised to be at Oxford on the day appointed. Thus the Conspirators, pleased with this first success of their enterprise, went and prepared to put it in Execution.

1400. The Conſpiracy is diſcovered.

Under colour of the pomp and magnificence uſual upon ſuch occaſions, the Lords Conſpirators came to Oxford, with a numerous Train of armed Domeſticks, and many other Attendants, who pretended to come only out of curioſity. The Duke of Albemarle was the only Perſon wanting at the Rendezvous. He had a mind firſt to viſit his Father the Duke of York, then at his Seat at Langley (1), not to communicate the Plot, but upon ſome other buſineſs. Whilſt they were at dinner, the Duke of York ſeeing a Paper in his Son's boſom, asked him what it was. The Son confounded at this unexpected queſtion, replied, but with a viſible concern, that the Paper contained nothing of moment. But, whether the old Duke had received ſome dark intimations of the Plot, or his Son's confuſion inſpired him with the curioſity, he ſnatched it out of his boſom. This Paper was one of the ſix Copies ſigned by the Conſpirators. His ſurprize was extreme, at ſeeing all the particulars of the Plot. He reproached his Son the more juſtly, as, beſides the blackneſs of the crime, he had not ſcrupled to expoſe his own Father's life, who was bound for his Allegiance. But his reproaches being uncapable of remedying the evil, he reſolved to prevent it, by acquainting the King with what was come to his knowledge. To that end, he ordered his Horſes to be ſaddled immediately, in order to go himſelf to Windſor, and carry the Paper to the King. The young Duke ſeeing himſelf infallibly ruined, if the King was informed of the Conſpiracy by any but himſelf, reſolved to be before-hand with his Father. As he was better able than the old Duke to take this journey, he rode another way, and came full ſpeed to Windſor. Upon his arrival he caſt himſelf at the King's Feet (2), and diſcovered the whole Plot. Henry was ſo far from imagining, that the Duke of Exeter and the reſt of the Conſpirators, had plotted againſt his life, that he believed at firſt, the Duke of Albemarle had invented this accuſation, on purpoſe to ruin them. He told him, if the thing was true, he would pardon him upon his repentance; but if it was a malicious accuſation, he ſhould find no favour. The Duke of York arriving ſoon after, put him out of all doubt, by delivering him the Paper taken from his Son. After ſo convincing a proof, the King no longer queſtioning the truth, broke off his journey to Oxford, where he was to be the next day. However, he reſolved to ſtay at Windſor, to ſee what courſe the Conſpirators would take, when they ſaw themſelves diſappointed.

The Conſpirators in perplexity.

Mean while, the Lords were extremely uneaſy at Oxford, becauſe the Duke of Albemarle was not yet arrived. They had already ſent to his Houſe to know the reaſon of his delay, and were told that he was ſet out for Oxford, but by the way of Langley, to viſit the Duke his Father. This viſit giving them ſome ſuſpicion, their trouble increaſed, upon hearing that the King deſigned not to come to Oxford, and had ſeen the Dukes of York and Albemarle. Then, no longer doubting that they were diſcovered, they reſolved to accompliſh by force, what they could not effect by other means. Accordingly they dreſſed up Maudlin in Royal Robes, and gave out he was Richard, who having eſcaped out of Priſon, was come to implore the aſſiſtance of his good Subjects (3).

They reſolve to take up Arms, and give out Richard was with them.

The People flock to the pretended King.

The readineſs wherewith People liſted under the banner of the pretended King, plainly ſhewed, that all had not approved the depoſing of Richard, though the Parliament acted in the name of the whole Nation. Wherefore, there is nothing more liable to miſtake, than judging of the ſentiments of the People, by thoſe of their Repreſentatives. The reaſon is, becauſe the Repreſentatives debating upon matters laid before them, without any inſtructions from thoſe they repreſent, their reſolves can be conſidered but as private opinions, though they are of force to bind the People. Upon this account it is, that the People ſometimes appeal to arms from the deciſions of Parliaments, when thought too prejudicial to the Nation. Of this we have many inſtances, but particularly in the Reign of Henry IV. Though Richard was depoſed by the Parliament, it appeared, upon ſeveral occaſions, that the People ſubmitted to the ſentence, purely by conſtraint; ſince, not only at the time we are ſpeaking of, but, upon other occaſions, they were always ready to run after any counterfeit Richard that was preſented them. 1400.

In a very ſhort time, the Lords Conſpirators ſaw themſelves at the head of ſo formidable an Army, that they thought themſelves able to ſeize the King at Windſor. It is ſaid, that in two or three days, their Army conſiſted of forty thouſand Men. With theſe numerous Troops they began their march to Windſor, which lies but thirty miles from Oxford, and arrived at break of day (4), in great expectation of ſurprizing the King. And indeed, Henry not imagining they could poſſibly be ſo ſoon in condition to execute ſuch an enterprize, ſtaid at Windſor till that very night, and was gone but a few hours before their arrival. His retreat blaſting their deſign, they were in great perplexity. Some were for marching directly to London, before the King had time to ſecure the City. Others affirmed, their buſineſs was to go to Pontfract, to free Richard and ſet him at their head. This diverſity of opinion made them loſe in debates, the time they ſhould have ſpent in action. So the King had leiſure to provide for his defence, and aſſemble an Army of twenty thouſand Men. As he did not queſtion but the Male-contents would take the road to London, he went and expected them on Hounſlow-heath, in hopes his Army would daily increaſe. However, he was reſolved, though much inferior, to hazard a battle. This reſolution inſpired his Troops with courage, and made them imagine, the Male-contents were not ſo formidable as reported. It was likewiſe the cauſe, that many, ſeeing the King march unconcerned towards his enemies, came and joined him, in order to ſhew their diligence; which doubtleſs they would not have done, had he ſhewn, on this occaſion, the leaſt ſigns of fear or diffidence. At ſuch junctures, the majority of the People, without conſidering right or juſtice, generally declare for the ſide that is moſt like to ſucceed. Walſing.

The King's Reſolution of Advantage to him.

Mean while, the Conſpirators ſeeing the King able to withſtand them, durſt not cope with him. Whether it proceeded from their little capacity, or from a fear of being deſerted by their Army, they only thought of avoiding a Battle. Inſtead of marching to London to meet the King, they took the road to Reading, and encamped near Colebrook, where the young Queen Iſabella reſided (5). Here they reſolved to put an end to Maudlin's acting the part he had hitherto played, thinking it more proper to ſpread a report, that Richard was in Yorkſhire, at the head of a hundred thouſand Men. Their deſign was not only to avoid the King, but, in all appearance, to approach Wales, from whence they expected aſſiſtance, as Richard was well-beloved in that Country. Be that as it will, encamping near Cirenceſter (6), the Generals took up their quarters in the Town, whilſt the Army lay without. The Duke of Surrey, and the Earl of Salisbury lodged at one Inn, and the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Gloceſter at another. Their little experience cauſing them to neglect to ſet Guards at the Gates, the Mayor of the Town, a Man of ſenſe and courage, took advantage of their negligence, to do the King a ſignal ſervice. He privately drew together in the Night, four hundred Townſmen, and ordering the Gates to be ſhut, divided his followers into two Companies, and attacked at once the two Inns where the four Generals were lodged. Though theſe Lords had only their Domeſticks with them, they defended themſelves the beſt part of the night. During the conflict, one of their People bethought himſelf of ſetting fire to a neighbouring Houſe, imagining the Townſmen would run to extinguiſh the flames, and thereby give the Lords opportunity to eſcape. But this Stratagem had a quite contrary effect. The Townſmen, ſtill more incenſed by this action, redoubled their efforts, and at length broke open the Inn, defended by the Duke of Surrey (7), and the Earl of Salisbury (8). Theſe two Lords being much wounded, were, by the Mayor's order, immediately beheaded. On the other hand, the Duke of Exeter (9), and the Earl of Gloceſter, perceiving they were no longer able to reſiſt with ſo few attendants, found means to eſcape over the Houſes, and get out of the Town by the help of ſome of the Inhabitants. They intended to march

The report the Soldiers had heard, and the fire they had ſeen in the Town, making them believe the King's Army was there, they had all taken to ſudden flight, ſeized with a panic, which made them ſee danger where there was really none. So the two Lords, perceiving it out of their power to execute their deſign, parted, the better to make their eſcape. But they had the misfortune to be taken (1), and ſhortly after loſt their Heads on the Scaffold. Maudlin was alſo apprehended (2) as he was flying into Scotland, and condemned to be hanged. The Abbot of Weſtminſter likewiſe withdrawing, was ſeized with ſo violent a fright, that he fell into a fit of the Apoplexy, and died. As for the Biſhop of Carliſle, he was taken alſo, and ſentenced to death. But though, out of regard to his Character, the King pardoned him, he was not in a capacity to enjoy the benefit, when the news was brought him. The terror of his puniſhment made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that it occaſioned his death, when mercy was influencing the King to ſpare his life.

The other two are likewiſe taken and executed.

The Biſhop of Carliſle dies with Fear. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 165.

In all likelihood, the ill ſucceſs of this Enterprize haſtened Richard's end. There is ſome diverſity among the Hiſtorians concerning the manner of his death, though all agree, it was unnatural. Some affirm, he was ſtarved to death. Others, pretending to be better informed, relate his death with theſe circumſtances. After the troubles were appeaſed, by the death of the principal Conſpirators, one Sir Pyers Exton (3) came to Pontfract, with eight attendants. On the day of his arrival, Richard perceived at Dinner, that the Victuals were not taſted as uſual. He asked the reaſon of the Taſter, and upon his telling him that Pyers had brought an order from the King, took up a carving Knife, and ſtruck him on the face. Pyers coming in, with his eight Attendants, at the noiſe, Richard found he was a loſt Man, and reſolving to ſell his life dearly, wrung a Pole-Ax out of one of their hands, and defended himſelf ſo bravely, that he ſlew four of them. But at length, ſtanding accidentally near Pyers, who was got upon a Chair, the Villain diſcharged ſuch a blow on his head, as laid him dead at his feet (4).

Tragical Death of Richard II. Walſing. Fabian.

Thus died this unfortunate Prince, thirty three years old, of which he had reigned twenty two (5). A melancholy reward for the many ſignal Services his Father had done England! He was carried to London in a Coffin, with his face uncovered, to be ſeen of all Perſons. His Funeral was ſolemnized at St. Paul's, the King himſelf being preſent. After that, he was carried to Langley Abby, and buried (6) without any ceremony. Henry V, ordered his Body to be removed to Weſtminſter Abby, and laid among his Anceſtors (7). Though it was reported all over the Kingdom, that he was murdered, no inquiry was made. This neglect confirmed the People in their belief, that the King was not innocent. And indeed, if Richard died of a natural death, it would have been neceſſary to undeceive the Publick. But if his life was taken away by violence, it was difficult to do it without the King's knowledge (8).

Walſing.

Though Richard was not beloved whilſt he ſat on the Throne, his misfortunes failed not to raiſe the compaſſion of the very People that were ſo ready to deſert him. It is peculiar to misfortunes, eſpecially to thoſe of Princes, generally to turn hatred into pity. Of this we ſhall ſee in the courſe even of the preſent Reign ſeveral inſtances.

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 223. p. 138, 144.

The Engliſh Authors pretend, that Charles VI made great preparations to reſtore Richard to the Throne. But the Hiſtory of France does not obſerve that there were any. It is true, there are in the Collection of the Publick Acts ſeveral of Henry's Orders relating to the preparations in France, to invade England; but that might be an effect of Henry's Policy, to ſhew thereby, the neceſſity of Richard's death. And indeed, the Truce of twenty eight years between the two Crowns, was confirmed in May this very year, and all the pretended Motions of France ended only in a Negotiation, to draw from England Queen Iſabella, with whom Richard had not conſummated his marriage. It was not without reaſon, that Henry endeavoured to preſerve the Truce with France. He had a quarrel with the King of Scotland, which would not ſuffer him to carry his forces out of the Kingdom. The occaſion of the rupture between theſe two Princes was this:

The Cauſe of the War with Scotland. Buchanan.

Robert Stuart King of Scotland, the third of that Name, was deſirous to marry Prince David his eldeſt Son, to a Daughter of George Dunbar, Earl of March. The Earl thinking himſelf honoured by this alliance, joyfully received the Propoſal, and even paid before-hand part of the Portion. However, ſhortly after, by Intrigues foreign to our purpoſe, Prince David married a Daughter of Archibald, Earl of Douglaſs. Dunbar was extremely mortified at this affront, to which the King added another cauſe of diſcontent, by refuſing, or delaying to repay the Money he had received. The deſire of being revenged, and making the King ſenſible that he deſerved a better treatment, inſpired the Earl with a reſolution to throw himſelf into the Arms of the King of England, and do his enemies all poſſible miſchief. To that end, he imparted his deſign to the Earl of Northumberland, Governor of the northern Counties, who, preſently after, ſent him a Safe-conduct from the King his Maſter. Upon receiving this aſſurance, he repaired to Henry, and had ſeveral conferences with him (9). The King of Scotland being ſenſible, that the Earl of March was contriving ſome Plot againſt him in England, ſent Ambaſſadors to Henry to demand the Fugitive, and upon his refuſal, proclaimed War againſt him.

Henry marches into Scotland. Walſing. Buchanan. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 146, 154, 155, ---157.

Henry not thinking fit to expect his enemy in England, prepared to carry the War into Scotland. As ſoon as his Enemy was ready to march, he came to Newcaſtle, and ſent Robert a Summons to appear in Perſon (10), and do Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland. In the Summons, he revived the pretenſions of Edward I. to the Sovereignty of that Kingdom, from the time of Locrinus Son of Brutus, firſt pretended King of the whole Iſland of Albion. Upon Robert's refuſal to do any ſuch Homage, Henry entered Scotland, and made ſome progreſs. Towards the end of September, he beſieged the Caſtle of Edinburgh, defended by Prince David and the Earl of Douglaſs his Brother-in-law. But the ſeaſon being too far advanced to continue the Siege, he ſuddenly raiſed it, and retired into his own Dominions. As ſoon as he was gone, the Scots, under the Conduct of Sir Patrick Hepburn and Sir Thomas Haliburton, made an inroad into England, and cruelly revenged the Ravages committed by the Engliſh in Scotland. But in their return, they were met by the Earl of Northumberland, who defeated and ſtript them of their booty. Hepburn, one of the Scotch Generals, was ſlain in the action (11). This victory procured between the two Nations a ſix weeks Truce, which was afterwards prolonged, by reaſon of the poſture of Henry's affairs. Hardly had he begun the War with Scotland, when he received certain advice, that the Welſh were about to revolt, and intended to raiſe commotions in their Country, which could not but be attended with fatal conſequences. This was the reaſon, that notwithſtanding his ſucceſs againſt the Scots, he would not improve his advantages, for fear of exaſperating them too much. Buchanan himſelf gives this Teſtimony, aſcribing to his Generoſity what was entirely owing to his Policy; for the motions of the Welſh had rendered a Peace with Scotland abſolutely neceſſary.

Perſon

1400. Perſon that inſpired them with this deſign. This Man, though a private Gentleman only, had all the Qualities proper for ſuch an undertaking; if Forces ſo little conſiderable as thoſe of the Welſh could have promiſed him a happy ſucceſs. Nevertheleſs, he ſo managed this project, that for ſeveral Years he freed his Countrymen from the ſervitude, wherein they thought themſelves kept by the Engliſh. A Law-Suit he had loſt at London with the Lord Grey of Ruthin, his Neighbour, was the firſt occaſion of the diſguſt he conceived againſt the whole Engliſh Nation (1). The Conſpiracy before ſpoken of, breaking out in England at this very time, Glendour, not doubting it would cauſe great diſturbances, thought it a favorable juncture, to deliver his Country from the Engliſh Dominion. He privately ſounded the Welſhmen, and finding them very inclinable to receive his impreſſions, he eaſily perſuaded them to reſolve to throw off the Engliſh Yoke. He would have immediately diſcovered his deſigns, if the ill ſucceſs of the Engliſh Conſpiracy had not reſtrained him. The moment he ſaw the King engaged in the War with Scotland, he prepared to execute his project; and ſo ordered it, that the Welſh unanimouſly renouncing their Allegiance to the Crown of England, acknowledged him for Sovereign. From thenceforward he always ſtiled himſelf Prince of Wales, as appears in ſeveral Acts.

Act Pub. VIII. p. 156, 367, 382.

His firſt exploit was againſt the Lord Grey his adverſary, whom he took Priſoner in a Battle, and then made him marry his Daughter, without giving him his Liberty, contrary to his word.

Glendour takes the Earl of March Priſoner. Walſing.

Emboldened with this firſt ſucceſs he made an incurſion into *Hereford*ſhire. Edward Mortimer Earl of March, who was retired to his Lordſhip of Wigmore, finding the King was employed in Scotland, thought to do him a ſignal Service, by drawing together the Gentry of the Country, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the Rebel. But he had the misfortune to be taken Priſoner in a Battle, and though he offered a large ranſom, could not obtain his liberty. Glendour imagined, a Priſoner of that conſequence might be of uſe hereafter, or at leaſt that the King would ſpare nothing for his deliverance; and therefore it would be more advantagious to treat with the King, than with the Priſoner himſelf. But he was miſtaken in his conjecture. Henry was too well pleaſed, to ſee the Earl of March a Priſoner, and unable to hurt him, to contribute towards his releaſe. Glendour, however, ſtill kept his Priſoner, in expectation that, by his means, he ſhould one day be able to give the King ſome diſturbance, as it actually happened. The Earl was not afterwards ſorry for being in the hands of the Welſh.

Henry is glad of the Earl's Misfortune.

Henry's jealouſy of every thing relating to his Crown, and his ſeverity to thoſe that would diſpute it with him, made the Captive Earl ſenſible, that his Life was ſafer in Priſon than at his own Houſe. Mean while, the King being buſied in a Scotch War, Glendour had ſufficient time to ravage the Country on the Weſt of the Severn, and carry away a great Booty.

The Emperor of Conſtantinople arrives in England. Walſing.

About the end of this Year, Manuel Palæologus, Emperor of Conſtantinople, arrived in England, to deſire aſſiſtance againſt Bajazet Emperor of the Turks. The King received, and preſented him honourably, but as for aſſiſtance, put him off till his affairs were better ſettled in his own Kingdom. The Emperor went from England into France, from whence he departed not till two Years after, upon News that Bajazet his Enemy was vanquiſhed and taken Priſoner by Tamerlane.

1401. Statutes in Church-Affairs. Cotton's Abridg.

On the 20th of January 1401, Henry aſſembled a Parliament, which paſſed ſeveral Acts, with relation to the Church. The firſt confirmed the Statutes made in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II, againſt ſuch as ſollicited for papal Proviſions (2), or carried to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, Cauſes belonging to the Cognizance of the Judges of the Realm. This was the old ſubject of Quarrel with the Court of Rome. Whatever rigour was uſed to ſtop the courſe of theſe abuſes, it was not poſſible, becauſe it was the intereſt of too many to countenance the pretended Prerogatives of the Pope. But however this Parliament, conſidering the Pope ſtill continued to engroſs the Collations of all the Church-Preferments of the Kingdom, and that the Eccleſiaſtical Courts were perpetually encroaching upon the Civil, reſolved at laſt to oppoſe it effectually. For that purpoſe was revived the old Statute of Proviſors in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II, commonly known by the name of Præmunire. As this Term often occurs in the Engliſh Hiſtory, it will not be improper to explain it. By Præmunire then is meant, either the Statute itſelf, or the Penalty. Former Parliaments, led by the ſame Motive as this, had ordained puniſhments againſt the Proviſors, that is, againſt ſuch as ſued for Bulls, called Proviſiones or Gratiæ Expectativæ, to the Court of Rome, for Benefices, that were, or ſhould be, vacant. The ſame Puniſhments were ordained againſt thoſe, that carried to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts what belonged to the Civil. When any Perſon was guilty of this ſort of crime, a Writ or Order was iſſued againſt him, beginning with theſe Words, Præmunire facias, whereby he was commanded to appear in the King's Court. Hence the Statute, as well as the Penalty, were called Præmunire (3). This Penalty conſiſted in forfeiture of Lands, and Goods, and impriſonment during the King's pleaſure. In proceſs of time, ſeveral other offences of a like nature, with thoſe that were the firſt cauſe of the Statute, were made liable to the ſame Penalty. So all the Statutes of Præmunire, are only enlargements of thoſe made in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II. In general, the Præmunire, chiefly concerns offences committed in matters Eccleſiaſtical, belonging to the Civil Juriſdiction.

Explication of that Term.

The Clergy were always ſo intent upon favouring the pretenſions of the Court of Rome, that the endeavours of the former Parliaments had been incapable to ſtop the courſe of this abuſe. The Statute I have juſt mentioned, was but little more effectual. The attempt, laſt year, to dethrone the King, giving him occaſion to fear the like Conſpiracies for the future, he had reſolved to ſhew great regard for the Clergy, in order to attach them to his intereſt. Accordingly, though he did not think proper to refuſe his aſſent to the new Statute, he connived however at the breach of it, as much, or more, than any of his Predeceſſors. But this was not the only thing he did to gain the affection of the Clergy. His condeſcenſion for them in another Article, of no leſs importance, drew on him the bleſſings of the Eccleſiaſticks, and cauſed him to be conſidered by the whole Body, as a Prince exceeding zealous for the Church.

Statute againſt Hereticks. Walſing.

Since Wickliff firſt publiſhed his opinions, about the end of the Reign of Edward III, this Doctrine was ſo ſpread, that the Clergy were in continual apprehenſions of its prevailing. I have already related, that, in the Reign of Richard II, the Biſhops obtained a general Licenſe to impriſon Hereticks, without being obliged to have a particular Order from the Court; but that the Houſe of Commons cauſed it to be revoked. From that time there was no alteration, except that the King more frequently granted ſuch Orders. However, as the Penalty of Impriſonment was not capable to check the pretended Evil, dreaded by the Biſhops, Henry, ever propoſing to gain the affection of the Eccleſiaſticks, earneſtly recommended to the Parliament the care of the Church's concerns. How reluctant ſoever the Houſe of Commons might be to proſecute the Lollards, the credit of the Court and cabals of the Clergy, obtained at length an Act for the burning of obſtinate Hereticks (4). This Statute was no ſooner paſſed, but the Eccleſiaſtical Court immediately condemned one William Sawtre (5) a Lollard, who being delivered over to the ſecular Arm, was burnt alive by vertue of the King's Writ (6) directed to the Mayor (7) of London. This Man was the firſt who ſuffered death in England, for the ſake of Religion. During this Seſſion ſeveral Acts were likewiſe paſſed (8) concerning the Diſputes between the Engliſh and the Court of Rome, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of elſewhere (9).

1401. Since the Truce with France was confirmed, Charles VI, or rather the Duke of Orleans his Brother, and the Dukes of Berri and Burgundy his Uncles, who governed in his name, often demanded the young Queen Iſabella Widow of Richard II. Henry deferred giving a poſitive Anſwer, not that the demand was unjuſt; but two reaſons made him deſirous of keeping that Princeſs. Firſt, as he could not help dreading a War with France, he wanted to make a firm and laſting Peace with Charles VI, to which he believed the Marriage of Iſabella with the Prince his Son would greatly contribute. To that end, before he returned a poſitive anſwer to the Court of France, he frequently propoſed that Marriage. But neither Charles's Brother nor Uncles would ever conſent to it, not being able to think of marrying the young Queen to a Prince, whoſe Father was generally reckoned the Murderer of her firſt Husband. They alledged, however, another reaſon for declining it, namely, That her Father not being in condition to manage his affairs, they durſt not treat of his Daughter's Marriage without his conſent. A ſecond reaſon why Henry deferred Iſabella's Reſtitution was, becauſe he knew the Money, Richard received with her, would be demanded. However, as he had no plauſible pretence to detain her, he conſented at laſt to reſtore her with part of her Jewels. He managed ſo artfully, that in the Conventions made at Lelingham, there was no mention of reſtoring her Treaſure. That was the Subject of another Negotiation, ſpoken of hereafter.

Whilſt this affair was tranſacting, Henry had in Germany another Negotiation on foot, about a Marriage between Blanch his eldeſt Daughter, and Lewis of Bavaria, Grandſon of Robert Earl Palatin of the Rhine, who was lately advanced to the Imperial Throne, vacant by the death of Henry of Brunſwick Succeſſor of Wenceſlaus. This affair was concluded in May, to the King's great ſatisfaction. The Princeſs's portion was forty thouſand Pounds Sterling (1). At the ſame time, a Treaty of perpetual Alliance was made between the Emperor and Henry.

The King's Expedition againſt the Welſh. Act. Pub. Ib. p. 225. Walſing.

Since the revolt of the Welſh, Henry had made no preparations to reduce them to obedience. Mean while Glendour, taking advantage of this negligence, continued to ravage the Counties bordering upon Wales. Far from dreading the King's juſt indignation, he ſtudied to provoke him by continual inſults. Henry's indolence appeared ſtrange to many People, becauſe they were ignorant of the reaſon. Before he took up Arms againſt the Welſh, he was deſirous of finiſhing his affairs with France, and even intended to make a ſtrict Alliance with that Crown. As he knew the Rebels could have no aſſiſtance but from thence, he believed, if he could deprive them of that protection, they would not be able to ſupport themſelves long. Mean time, the Negotiation with France proceeding more ſlowly than he wiſhed, and Glendour ſtill continuing to infeſt his borders, he could no longer delay taking up arms. Before he put himſelf at the head of his Army (2), he publiſhed a general Pardon for the Welſh, provided they ſubmitted within a certain time. But finding his clemency ineffectual, he marched to chaſtiſe them. Upon his approach, Glendour withdrew to the Mountains, where it was impoſſible to attack him. All the King could do, was to ravage the Country, and then return to London.

An Invention to kill the King diſcovered. Walſing.

The King's return to his Metropolis was immediately followed by the diſcovery of a Plot againſt his Life, by the means of an Iron Inſtrument, with three ſharp Spikes placed in his Bed. Had he chanced to lie down, he muſt inevitably have been run through the Body, but by good Fortune, he perceived it juſt as he was going into Bed. What inquiry ſoever was made, there was no poſſibility of diſcovering the Author of this traiterous attempt.

Death of the Duke of York. Succeeded by his Son. Walſing.

It was this and not the laſt year (3), as ſome affirm, that Edmund, Duke of York, the King's Uncle, died. He left two Sons, Edmund Duke of Albemarle, who took the Title of Duke of York, and Richard Earl of Cambridge. I ſhall have frequent occaſion hereafter, to ſpeak of the Poſterity of the younger, who, by his Marriage with a Siſter of the Earl of March, acquired to his Iſſue, Rights which cauſed ſuch terrible Commotions in the Kingdom.

1402. Tax raiſed for the Marriage of the King's Daughter. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 232, 237, 242.

In the beginning of the next year, the King by his ſole Authority, and without the intervention of the Parliament (4), laid a Tax for the Marriage of his Daughter. Though herein he had acted by virtue of an antient Privilege of the Kings on the like occaſions, the People however ſeemed diſſatisfied. There were not wanting in the Kingdom Perſons, who laid hold of every thing to find fault with his Conduct. About the middle of the Year he had reaſon to perceive, there was ſtill a dangerous Ferment among his Subjects, and if the Male-Contents remained quiet, it was only in expectation of a favorable opportunity to riſe. On a ſudden, an unexpected rumour was ſpread over England, that Richard was alive, and had levied an Army in Scotland, in order to expel the Uſurper. The People muſt needs have wiſhed the news true, ſince it every where met with ſuch credit. At the ſame time, on Church-Doors, and in other publick Places, Papers were poſted up, containing outragious invectives againſt the King. The Authors of theſe Papers aſſerted, among other things, that the crimes for which Richard was depoſed, were nothing in compariſon of the tyrannical proceedings of Henry, ſince his Acceſſion to the Throne. The King was ſo provoked at this audaciouſneſs, that he ſwore never to pardon the offenders. Sir Roger Clarendon, natural Son of Edward the renowned Prince of Wales, fell the firſt ſacrifice to his Vengeance, being condemned to the ingnominious Death of a Traitor. Eight Monks guilty of the ſame crime, were alſo hanged with him. Walter Baldock Prior of Laund (5), underwent the ſame fate, with a Franciſcan Doctor in Divinity, who was hanged in his Frier's Habit, to the great mortification of his Fraternity (6). Many more were apprehended, upon finding among the Papers of a certain Prieſt, a Liſt of the names of thoſe, that declared Richard was alive. But upon ſtrict examination, it appeared he had made that Liſt, on purpoſe to make the news the more probable, or upon groundleſs Conjectures. So, he ſuffered alone the puniſhment of his raſhneſs. The King's great ſeverity upon this occaſion, contributed very much to efface the good opinion conceived of his Clemency and Humanity.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, Henry was negotiating in foreign Courts, three Marriages at once. The firſt was between Philippa his ſecond Daughter, and Eric King of Denmark, who was yet a Minor, under the Guardianſhip of Queen Margaret his Mother. The ſecond was between the Prince of Wales, and a Siſter of Eric's. And the third was his own, with Joanna of Navarre, Widow of the Duke of Bretagne. Of theſe three Marriages, the firſt and laſt were concluded this ſame year, but the Prince of Wales's did not ſucceed.

The Court of France get in their Power the Perſon of the young Duke of Bretagne.

Henry, in reſolving to eſpouſe the Ducheſs Dowager of Bretagne, had probably an Eye, by virtue of this Marriage, to the Guardianſhip of the three Princes, which the late Duke of Bretagne had left under Age. At leaſt the Court of France, taking it for granted, appeared very much alarmed at this Alliance, which might be very prejudicial to them. This was the reaſon that the Duke of Burgundy, Guardian of the young Princes, took them from the Ducheſs their Mother, and carried them to Paris, where they were educated. By this means, the Court of France had the direction of the affairs of Bretagne, during the young Duke's Minority. If it be true, that Henry had an Eye to Bretagne, he not only was diſappointed, but drew upon himſelf freſh Enemies. During the whole time the new Duke was in France, the Bretons ſcarce ever ceaſed infeſting the Coaſts of England, though there was no War proclaimed between their Sovereign and Henry. The King's Marriage was not conſummated till the year following.

Upon his approach, Glendour retired to the Mountains of Snowdon, where he knew there was no poſſibility of attacking him. Mean time, the King was preparing to ravage the Country; but the Weather became on a ſudden ſo tempeſtuous, that he was forced to retire. The ſtorms were ſo uncommon for the Seaſon, that the Engliſh fancied Glendour had made a contract with the Devil, to prevent the deſtruction of his Country.

Another Invasion of the Scots. Buchanan.

These Troops were properly but the Vanguard of an Army, with which the Earl of Douglas was advancing to make a more considerable effort. Upon news of Hepburne's defeat, he hastened his march into England, to fight the Earl of Northumberland, who being too weak to venture a Battle, was forced to retire, and leave the borders exposed to his ravages. Mean while, he laboured without ceasing to augment his Army, and as soon as he was able to withstand him, marched in quest of him, attended by Henry Hotspur his Son, who was reckoned the bravest Man in England. The two Armies meeting at Halidown-Hill (1), a bloody battle ensued, wherein the English were entirely victorious. The Scotch General lost an eye, and fell into the hands of the Conquerors, with the Earl of Fife, Nephew of the King of Scotland, the Earls of Angus, Athol, Monteith, and a great number of other Officers of distinction. According to the English Historians, this battle was fought in July, about a month after the former. Buchanan places it among the occurrences of the year 1401, but in this he is certainly mistaken.

The French and English blame one another for breaking the Truce.

During the whole Summer, the Ambassadors of France and England continued at Lelingham, on account of the Truce which had been violated, particularly in Guienne. The French Historians cast the blame upon England, and the English upon France; but we are not obliged to believe either on their bare word. In cases of this nature, the Historians of both Nations generally contradict one another, with mutual reproaches of partiality. Their honour, it seems, is concerned, to maintain upon all occasions the Faith and Sincerity of their respective Sovereigns. Be this as it will, the circumstances of the two Kings had for some time past been such, that it could be to neither's advantage to renew the War. Henry believed the Welsh, and the Male-contents in England, could procure no assistance but from France alone, which he thought to prevent by means of the Truce, but was mistaken. On the other hand, King Charles's distemper, and the divisions in his Court and Council, promised the French no hopes of any great success of their Arms. So, the Truce was again confirmed, without examining too strictly, by which side it was first violated.

The French demand Isabella's Portion. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 233, 302.

This affair being settled, the French Ambassadors demanded the restitution of what King Richard had received with his Queen. Henry, who foresaw this Demand, had instructed his Ambassadors what answer to make. They pretended to be surprized at this proposal, and said, they had no orders about it. However, they added, as of themselves, that they did not question, that, for the preservation of a good understanding between the two Crowns, their master would agree to deduct that Sum out of the Million and half of Crowns, still due to England, for the ransom of King John. This pretension did not a little surprize the French Plenipotentiaries, who having no instructions upon that head, deferred their answer, till they knew their Master's pleasure.

The Parliament meets. Cotton's Abridg. Walsing.

The Parliament that met in October (2), granted the King a Subsidy, and then confirmed divers Statutes, made in the Reign of Edward III, in favour of the Clergy (3). The Session ended with a Petition to the King, recommending to him the concerns of the Scotch Earl of March, who had done the State considerable services, since his putting himself under the protection of England (4).

1403. The Queen arrives. Walsing.

The French make a descent in the Isle of Wight Monstrelet. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 342. Walsing.

Whilst the Court was wholly taken up with entertainments and diversions, the King received intelligence, that the French were going to make a descent in the Isle of Wight, under the conduct of Waleran, Earl of St. Pol, of the House of Luxemburg. This Earl having married a half Sister of Richard II, pretended to act in his own name, to revenge the death of the King his Brother-in-law. The Court of France connived at the undertaking, and even furnished the Earl with Troops, as if it were no prejudice to the Truce. Mean time, this Bravado was unsuccessful to the Earl of St. Pol. After plundering some Villages, he was dishonourably forced to re-imbark, though the Inhabitants of the Isle had received no assistance. Henry complained to the Court of France of this Invasion; but could get no other answer, Than that it was the King of France's intention to keep the Truce. Had he not been resolved to avoid a rupture, the Earl of St. Pol's attempt would have afforded him a very just reason to renew the War. But as he was sensible, the Kingdom abounded with Male-contents, he would not give occasion to France openly to support them. On the contrary, by preserving the Truce with that Crown, he meant to deprive them of the hopes of being assisted. So, taking no farther notice of the Insult, he was contented with obtaining of the Court of France a fresh confirmation of the Truce. 1403.

Henry takes no notice of it.

The Duke of Orleans challenges him. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 310.

They who governed for King Charles were not ignorant of Henry's resolution, which induced them to have the less regard for him. This very year the Duke of Orleans sent him a Challenge to fight, either in single Combat, or with a hundred Knights on each side. The reason of this Challenge is not mentioned by the English Historians, and the French alledge no other, than the Duke of Orleans's desire to revenge the death of Richard II. Very likely, it was only a sally of the young Duke's, to signalize himself, by sending a Challenge to a King of England; but he was not pleased with the answer. Henry intimated, that there was a great distance between a King, and any Subject whatever, and therefore he could not accept his Challenge; but they might happen to meet in a place, where being both attended with a more numerous Train than what he proposed, they might measure Swords with one another. This answer drew from the Duke of Orleans a very reproachful reply, wherein he called him Traitor, Usurper, Murderer of his King. Henry sent him a no less abusive answer, giving him the Lie in form, and charging him with using Sorcery, to throw his Father into his present distemper. Mean while, he sent to know of the French Ambassadors, who were still with his at Lelingham, whether this Challenge was approved by the King their Master; if so, he considered it as an open rupture. But though the Ambassadors were frequently called upon to return a positive answer, it was not possible to oblige them to speak plainly. They only affirmed, their Master had not broke the Truce, nor intended to break it for the future. In fine, as the English pressed them for a Declaration, from those that governed in Charles's name during his illness, they plainly told them, whether the King continued out of order, or recovered his health, no other answer was to be expected. Henry considering this silence as a disavowing, or rather thinking proper to dissemble, for reasons already mentioned, was contented with this slight satisfaction.

Henry complains of it, but receives no satisfaction.

Debate about Isabella's Portion. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 315 ---- 318.

During the Congress, the French Ambassadors moved again the restitution of Isabella's Portion. On the other hand, the English Plenipotentiaries demanded the residue of King John's ransom, and endeavoured to evade the demand of the French, by alledging, that their Master not receiving Isabella's Dowry, was not obliged to repay it. But they thereby furnished their Adversaries with as just a pretence, to say in their turn, that neither was their Master under any engagement to Henry, concerning King John's ransom. However, as Henry demanded the arrears of the ransom, only to be excused paying the Dowry, he had his ends, and the affair rested there.

Quarrel between the King and Earl of Northumberland. Walsing.

Whilst the Ambassadors of the two Crowns were employed in these mutual Cavils, matters of much greater moment to Henry passed in England. Nothing less than his Crown was at stake. From the beginning of his Reign, to the Victory over the Scots at Halidown-Hill, no Lord was in greater favour with the King, than the Earl of Northumberland. As it was properly by the speedy junction of that Earl with Henry, at his landing in England, that his affairs were so successful, the King had all along retained a very grateful Sense of it. The Government of the northern Counties, the Office of High-Constable, the Grant of the Isle of Man, and several other favours, were plain indications of his esteem for the Earl, who, on his part, had always appeared very zealous for his Service. The last year he had gained over the Scots two Victories, the latter of which had disabled them from giving his Master any fresh disturbance. This was a signal Service, but, besides the fore-mentioned Fa-

And yet an affair of Intereſt bred ſuch a quarrel, that theſe happy diſpoſitions were ſuddenly altered. The occaſion of their difference was this.

I before obſerved, that the Earl of Northumberland had, in the battle of Halidown, taken ſeveral Priſoners of great Quality. The King believing theſe Priſoners belonged to him, did not think fit to leave them in the Earl's diſpoſal. Perhaps his deſign was to raiſe a large ranſom, or elſe, by their means, to procure an advantagious Peace with Scotland. Be that as it will, immediately after the battle, he ſent an expreſs Order to the Earl, to releaſe none of his Priſoners. This Order was quickly followed by another, enjoining him to deliver them into his hands. The Earl, who expected the benefit of their ranſom, forthwith repaired to Court, and prayed the King to leave the Priſoners at his diſpoſal; but had the mortification to be denied. He exclaimed againſt the injuſtice that was done him, and ſpoke to the King a little too haughtily. The reproaches he let fall on this occaſion, ſo diſpleaſed Henry, that he no longer looked upon him with the ſame eye as formerly. This coolneſs was carried ſo far, that when the Earl would have ſpoke with the King, he was denied admittance. This alteration could not but exaſperate the Earl, who thought his Services deſerved a different treatment. As he was naturally very haughty, he could not bear this contempt, without ſeeking occaſion to be revenged. He had, as may be ſaid, placed the King on the Throne, and thought himſelf powerful enough to pull him down. This was the reſult of ſeveral conferences with Henry Hotſpur his Son, the Earl of Worceſter his Brother (2), and ſome other Lords. Their aim was, to ſet the Crown on the head of Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, (ſtill a Priſoner in Wales,) not out of affection for that Prince, but becauſe there was not a plauſible pretence to gain the People to their Intereſt. Purſuant to this reſolution, they diſpatched ſecret Agents to Glendour and Mortimer, to perſuade them to come into their Plot. Glendour promiſed to employ all his forces to accompliſh it. As for the Earl of March, he very readily lent his name for the execution of a Project tending to place him on the Throne. But that all three might find their advantage in it, it was agreed, that the Earl of March ſhould take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, the Earl of Northumberland hold all the Country lying North of the Trent, on condition of Homage to the Crown, and Glendour enjoy all the Counties Weſt of the Severn. The project being thus formed, the Earl of Northumberland feigned, for ſome time, to forget the occaſion of diſguſt given him by the King. He even came to Court, where he took occaſion to repreſent to the King, that the Earl of March having loſt his liberty in his ſervice, it was but reaſonable he ſhould pay his ranſom to Glendour. This Remonſtrance was taken very ill. Henry was too well pleaſed with the Earl's being in the hands of the Welſh, and unable, as he imagined, to hurt him, to contribute to his Deliverance. He replied therefore, with ſome ſigns of anger, that the Earl having marched againſt the Rebels, of his own accord, and with the ſole view of ſaving his Lands from plunder, it was his buſineſs to get out of captivity as well as he could: That, for his part, he did not think himſelf obliged to procure his liberty, much leſs to pay his ranſom. The Earl was not ſurprized at this expected refuſal. His intent was only to render remarkable the King's Cruelty to the Earl of March, and thereby inſinuate, he muſt needs be convinced of the juſtice of the Priſoner's Title to the Crown, ſince he dreaded to ſee him at liberty. This denial making no alteration in the Project of the Confederates, the Earl of Northumberland retired into the North, where he privately ſecured ſome Troops, who were to be in Arms upon the firſt notice. Then he ſettled a Correſpondence with ſome Scotch Lords, who engaged to aſſiſt him. He likewiſe releaſed ſeveral Scotch Priſoners, that were yet in his power, upon their promiſing to levy Troops for his ſervice. At the ſame time Glendour was making extraordinary preparations, which coming to the King's ears, obliged him to be upon his guard, though he knew not for what they were intended. 1403.

As ſoon as the Confederates were ready, the three Percies ſuddenly appeared in Arms in the North. Shortly after, the Earl of Northumberland falling ill, his Brother and Son marched with his Troops to join the Welſh, who were advanced as far as Shropſhire. When the two Armies were joined, the Male-contents publiſhed a Manifeſto, ſetting forth, That the King treated his Subjects with intolerable tyranny: That none but the Clergy had acceſs to him, and the greateſt Lords could not be admitted into his preſence, unleſs introduced by ſome Biſhop: That moreover, he converted to his own uſe, the Subſidies granted by the Parliament for the publick occaſions. Henry, who had received no intelligence of their deſigns, was extremely ſurpriſed at the news of this Rebellion. But as he had fortunately an Army quite ready, deſigned againſt the Welſh, he ſhewed no concern. However, as he was apprehenſive, the Rebels Manifeſto might poiſon the People, he believed he ought before all things to efface theſe impreſſions, by an anſwer publiſhed by way of Proclamation. He cleared himſelf from the two principal Articles of the Manifeſto, firſt by denying he had ever refuſed to admit into his preſence the very meaneſt of his Subjects, much leſs any of the Nobility; and called his whole Court to witneſs. As for the Subſidies granted by Parliament, he affirmed, moſt part of the Money was paid on account of the Scotch War, to the Earl of Northumberland himſelf, as he could prove by his own Receipts.

After publiſhing his anſwer, he marched (3) towards the Rebels (4), who were encamped at Shrewsbury. When the two Armies were in ſight, and ready to engage, he ſeemed to dread the iſſue. His uneaſineſs cauſed him to offer ſuch advantagious Terms to the Male-contents, that Henry Percy being moved by them, deſired the Earl of Worceſter his Uncle to wait on the King, and endeavour to procure an agreement. It is ſaid, that in the Conference with this Earl, the King made ſuch Conceſſions in favour of the Male-contents, that they would have had reaſon to be ſatisfied, had not the Earl of Worceſter falſly intimated there was nothing to be expected (5). However this be, the Negotiation proving ineffectual, the Battle began. The King had at firſt ſo great a diſadvantage, that he was like to be entirely defeated. He had even his Horſe killed under him, and the Prince of Wales his Son was wounded in the face. But he ſo ſeaſonably called in his body of reſerve, that by their help he recovered his ground, and inſpired his Troops with freſh courage. From that moment, the face of the Battle was entirely changed, to the diſadvantage of the Male-contents. The King's laſt charge putting their Army in diſorder, they were ſo briskly puſhed, that Henry obtained in the end a complete Victory (6). Young Percy was ſlain, and buried, after the battle, with the King's leave. But afterwards, altering his mind, the King ordered his Body to be taken up, quartered, and fixed on Poles in the High-ways. The Earl of Worceſter being taken Priſoner, was beheaded, and his Head ſet up over London Bridge (7).

Mean time the Earl of Northumberland being recovered, was advancing with a body of Troops to reinforce the Army of the Male-contents, and take upon him the command. But hearing by the way of his Son's and Brother's misfortune, he diſmiſſed his Troops, not daring to keep the Field with ſo few forces, before a victorious Army. Mean while, the King was marching towards the North, well knowing the center of Rebellion was there, by reaſon of the Earl of Northumberland's great intereſt in thoſe parts. When he came to York, he took all imaginable care to ſecure the fidelity of the northern Counties, as well by the Oath of the Inhabitants, as by other ways which he judged proper (8). When he thought he had taken juſt meaſures to prevent an inſurrection, he ſummoned the Earl of Northumberland to appear before him. So, without farther consideration, he repaired to York, and threw himself at the King's feet, who punctually kept his word with him. He even left him all his Estate, except the Isle of Man, which he had given him in the beginning of his Reign. This was a very slight punishment for so great a crime. But probably, Henry not forgetting the Services done him by the Earl, thought he still owed him this acknowledgment. Besides, the Criminal was already sufficiently punished, in the death of his Son and Brother.

He pardons the Earl of Northumberland. Walsing.

Whilst the King was employed in the North, the Court of France, having been informed of the Earl of Northumberland's Rebellion, was resolved to take advantage of these troubles. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Henry received advice of a descent, which the Duke of Orleans was to make in England, whilst John Duke of Burgundy, who lost his Father this year, was to besiege Calais. It is observable, that notwithstanding the Truce, confirmed almost every year by the two Crowns, France never failed to shew her readiness, to improve the advantages procured by the troubles in England during this Reign (1). They who were at the helm during King Charles's Illness, and particularly the Duke of Orleans, that Monarch's Brother, never thought themselves bound by any Treaties made with Henry. This might be very evidently proved. But as Henry always got clear of the troubles raised in his Kingdom, the Court of France could only discover very frequently their ill intentions, without reaping any advantage. In all appearance, Henry's late Victory over the Rebels, frustrated the projects formed against him by that Court. However, not to leave him in perfect Tranquillity, as they directed the affairs of Bretagne during the Duke's minority, they ingaged the Bretons to make a descent in the western Coasts of England, where they committed great ravages (2). This Invasion, for which the Bretons could not alledge the least reason, exceedingly troubled the King. Nevertheless, as he was willing to avoid an entire rupture with Bretagne, in hopes of gaining one day the young Duke to his interests, he thought it most adviseable to hide his resentment. This was the reason he was satisfied with some slight excuses made by the Regency of Bretagne, in disclaiming the Persons concerned in the Descent, as acting without the Government's Orders. But at the same time, he privately gave leave to the Inhabitants of Plymouth and other Places in those Parts, to fit out a Fleet under the command of William Wilford. This Admiral, though without the King's Commission, set sail for Bretagne, and revenged the damages sustained by his Countrymen (3).

The Parliament, called last year (4) and afterwards prorogued, met again on January (5) 1404. The King found means to obtain a Subsidy, which must have been very extraordinary, since it was not to be recorded (6). But in vain are precautions taken to bury in oblivion such sort of Precedents, which Princes upon occasion too frequently call to remembrance.

1404. A Subsidy granted the King. Walsing.

The Severities exercised upon the Authors and accomplices of the two late Rebellions, induced the Parliament to petition the King for a general Pardon. Henry very willingly complied with their request, but with such exceptions as rendered the Pardon of little effect, since he forgave only those whom he designed not to punish.

Act of Indemnity. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 338, 353.

Henry's Severity to those who were infatuated with the false Notion of Richard's being still alive, was not capable of undeceiving every Body. A rumour being once more spread that Richard was in Scotland, one Serle, who had been Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, went to see his old Master. He met with People, who shewed him a Man something like Richard, but not enough for a Domestick, who had long served him, to be deceived. Nevertheless Serle feigning to take him for Richard himself, wrote to several Persons in England, that he was actually with him. The Testimony of a Man who could not, as was thought, be mistaken, produced so great an effect, that many suffered themselves to be seduced with this imposture. The Countess of Oxford, Mother of the late Duke of Ireland, Richard's Favorite, believed, or pretended to believe, it, and took care to spread the report. She even sent to several Persons in Richard's name, little Silver Harts, such as that Prince used to give his Favorites. Mean while the King's diligence prevented the ill effects, this Imposture might have caused. He ordered the Countess to be taken into Custody (7), with her Secretary who was in the Secret. Some time after Serle was seized on the borders of the North (8), and hanged at Berwick. As he confessed the Cheat, and that he was concerned in the Duke of Gloucester's Murder, the report died away by degrees.

This year the Bretons made a descent near Portland (9), and plundered some Houses on the Coast. But advancing farther into the Country, they met a Body of Militia ready to receive them, who drove them back to their Ships, and took several Prisoners of distinction. Hitherto there was no Declaration of War between England and Bretagne: But the two Nations however continued to infest one another, though without the consent of the Sovereigns. France, which then managed the Bretons, was very glad to sow discord between them and the English, lest Henry should strengthen himself with the Alliance of Bretagne, when the Duke was of Age. For the same reason Henry connived at these insults, for fear of depriving himself of that advantage. Besides, he seemed resolved to avoid, as much as possible, ingaging in any War; being apprehensive, that the Male-contents would raise troubles in the Kingdom, in case he was obliged to send his Forces abroad.

It was probably with the same view, that he concluded with Scotland a Truce, from the 20th of July this year to the Easter next ensuing.

Truce with Scotland. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 363, 368. Ib. p. 374.

However, he could not think that all his precautions would for ever prevent the dreaded War. Besides, that he plainly saw France only sought an occasion of Rupture, he considered the affairs of Wales were in a very ill way. Glendour not only persisted in his Rebellion, but had even seized some Places on the West of the Severn. Moreover the Truce with Scotland being to expire in the Spring, there would be a necessity of sending an Army into the North. These considerations determined him to summon a Parliament, in order to obtain an Aid to enable him to carry on these Wars.

The Parliament met October the 6th (10). It is said, the King in the Writs of Summons commanded the Sheriffs [and Mayors] to return none but such as were unlearned, and that from hence, this Assembly was called the Illiterate or Lack-learning Parliament (11). It is a question however, whether the King's Command was so express as is affirmed (12). The breach Richard II. had made in the Nation's Liberties by the like Method, and the punishment which followed, were yet too fresh for Henry so publickly to imitate his Example, and expose himself to the same danger, in the present Juncture. It cannot be denied however, that the Court, on this occasion, had laboured to cause such Representatives to be chosen, as were not too much prepossessed in favour of the Clergy, for reasons we shall see presently. Be this as it will, the King representing to the Parliament thus composed, his great want of an extraordinary aid, the Commons went in a Body, and addressed him, remonstrating, "That without burdening his People he might "supply his occasions, by seizing the Revenues of the "Clergy." They set forth, "That the Clergy pos-"sessed a third part of the Lands of the Kingdom, and "not doing the King any personal Service, it was but "just, they should contribute out of their Revenues to-"wards the pressing necessities of the State. That it was "evident, the Riches of the Ecclesiasticks made them "negligent in their Duty, and the lessening of their ex-"cessive incomes, would be a double advantage to the "State and Church."

of raiſing the Money he wanted. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury being preſent, thought it his Duty to ſpeak on an occaſion, where the intereſt of the whole Clergy was concerned. He repreſented to the King, "That "though the Eccleſiaſticks ſerved him not in Perſon, it "could not be inferred, that they were unſerviceable, "ſince they ſent into the Field their Vaſſals and Tenants "whenever there was occaſion: That the ſtripping the "Clergy of their Eſtates, would put a ſtop to their "Prayers Night and Day for the welfare of the State, "and there was no expecting God's protection of the "Kingdom, if the Prayers of the Church were ſo little "valued." He added, with a menacing Tone, "That "if theſe conſiderations were not capable of ſuppreſſing "the Plots againſt the Clergy, it would be found dif-"ficult to deprive them of their Eſtates, without expoſing "the Kingdom to great danger; and ſo long as he "was Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he would oppoſe this "injuſtice to the utmoſt of his power." Then ſuddenly falling on his Knees to the King, he ſtrongly preſſed him in point of Conſcience, endeavouring to make him ſenſible, that of all the crimes a Prince could commit, none was ſo heinous as the Invaſion of the Clergy's Revenues. Whether Henry was moved with the Archbiſhop's Speech, or the ſtrong oppoſition he foreſaw from the Clergy, convinced him of the difficulty of accompliſhing his deſign, he ſuddenly reſolved to deſiſt. He anſwered the Archbiſhop, that though he blamed not his zeal, he could not help ſaying, his fears were groundleſs; for when he mounted the Throne, he made a firm reſolution to favour the Church with all his Power, and hoped by God's Grace to leave her in a better State than he found her. The Archbiſhop encouraged by this anſwer, turned to the Commons, and ſpoke to them in a manner not very proper to gain their Good-Will, telling them, their demand was built wholly on Irreligion and Avarice (1). The Commons made no reply to this offenſive Speech, but when they came back to their Houſe, reſolved to perſiſt in their demand, and brought in a Bill to ſeize the Clergy's Revenues. But there was no poſſibility of ſucceeding in their project. The Sollicitations of the Archbiſhop and the reſt of the Clergy, were ſo prevalent with the Lords, that they threw out the Bill. So the Commons were forced to find other means to ſupply the King's occaſions (2).

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 381. Towards the latter end of this year, Innocent VII. notified to the King, his promotion to the Papal Throne.

1405. It is not ſtrange, that to the great number of his enemies, both at Home and Abroad, Henry was unwilling to add likewiſe the Clergy; who, as the Archbiſhop had threatned, would have had it in their Power to create him great trouble. Though all was ſeemingly quiet in the Kingdom, he diſcovered about the beginning of the year 1405, that ſome ill deſign was contriving againſt him; but however, could not find out the Authors.

The Earl of March had very well concealed his diſguſt, when Henry was placed on the Throne; but his League afterwards with Glendour, and the Earl of Northumberland, was ſufficient to open the King's Eyes, though he had ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by this diſſimulation. He was too jealous of his Crown, to believe the Earl was unmindful of his juſt Rights. For this reaſon, he had always refuſed to promote the recovery of his Liberty. Upon the ſame account, he kept his Children in ſafe Cuſtody at Windſor, as Pledges of their Father's Allegiance. Nothwithſtanding all his care, means were found to convey away the Priſoners, and keep them concealed for ſome time. But the King cauſed ſuch diligent ſearch to be made, that they were at length found, and brought back to their confinement at Windſor. He would have ſeverely puniſhed this attempt, if he could have diſcovered the Authors, but all his endeavours were fruitleſs. There was only a poor Lock-Smith hanged for being concerned in it; but he would not diſcover by whom he was employed. The Duke of York being ſuſpected, was taken up, and ſent to the Caſtle of Pevenſey, where he remained a Priſoner above three Months. But at laſt he was releaſed, for want of ſufficient Evidence againſt him.

Prince Henry goes againſt the Welſh.

This attempt made the King apprehenſive, his Enemies would form ſome new Plot in favour of the Earl of March; and he imagined, before it broke out, they would ſecure theſe young Princes. As Glendour was always ready to countenance the Male-contents, Henry reſolved to free himſelf from theſe Fears, by exerting his utmoſt to deſtroy that Rebel. To that end, he gave the Command of an Army to Henry his eldeſt Son; who, in the beginning of the Campaign, came to an engagement with the Welſh, and put their Army to Flight. Two months after, this Victory was followed by another ſtill more important, wherein Glendour's Son was made Priſoner. Theſe two Defeats were not, however, capable of diſheartening the Welſh. On the contrary, they made freſh efforts in defence of their Liberty. The ſituation of their Country, the aſſurances given them by France of a powerful diverſion, and probably, Glendour's Knowledge of a Conſpiracy forming in England, put them in hopes of better ſucceſs for the future.

The Welſh perſiſt in their Revolt.

It was not without ground, that the Welſh relied upon the aſſiſtance of France. That Crown, or rather the Duke of Orleans, who then governed the Kingdom, made no account of the Truce, whenever he thought he could break it with advantage. Though it was confirmed in 1403, Mezerai owns, the Conſtable D' Albret, and the Earl of Armagnac, had taken from England above ſixty Places in Guienne. This very year, the Duke of Orleans openly beſieged Bourg and Blaye, though in vain, and the Duke of Burgundy was preparing to lay Siege to Calais. To facilitate this undertaking, the Earl of St. Pol attempted to ſeize the Caſtle of Merck; but the Garriſon of Calais, poſting to its relief forced him to retreat in diſorder, though he was now maſter of the Inner-Court.

France daily ſeeks occaſion to diſturb Henry.

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 394.

Theſe continual breaches of the Truce, taught Henry what he was to expect from France, in caſe his affairs were not proſperous in England. For this reaſon, he was deſirous to end the Welſh War, before he ſhewed his reſentment to the French, chuſing rather to let them act privately, than give occaſion for an open Rupture. With this view, he had ſent againſt the Welſh the Prince his Son, who was crowned with the fore-mentioned ſucceſs. Before he entered upon this Expedition, he aſſembled the Lords (3), to deſire an aid of Money, being aſhamed to ask the Parliament, who had lately granted him a conſiderable Subſidy. But the Lords flatly refuſed to comply with the King's requeſt, without the Authority of the Parliament. The Clergy, whom the King likewiſe ſounded, anſwered with the ſame reſolution, not being willing to eſtabliſh a Precedent of that nature, leſt it ſhould be drawn into Cuſtom. Henry extremely mortified with theſe Denials, diſmiſſed both the Nobles and Clergy, with ſigns of diſpleaſure; which ſhewed, he would not miſs an opportunity of making them feel the Effects of his Indignation. He furniſhed thereby certain Lords with an occaſion and pretence to haſten the Execution of a deſign, which, probably, had ſome time been formed.

The King is denied Money by the Nobles and Clergy. Walſing.

Richard Scrope, Archbiſhop of York, being diſſatisfied, and wanting to revenge Richard, by whom he was promoted to that Dignity, ingaged ſeveral Lords in a Confederacy to dethrone Henry. The Earl of Northumberland entered into the Plot, though the King had already forgiven him the like fault, and by his intereſt in the North, drew the People of thoſe Parts into the ſame Confederacy. Thomas Mowbray Earl-Marſhal, the Lords Bardolf, Haſtings, Falconbridge, and ſeveral other Lords and Gentlemen came into the Plot, and levied a great number of Troops, which they led to York, where the Rendezvous was. When theſe Forces, which made a conſiderable Army, were drawn together, the Leaders publiſhed a Manifeſto againſt the King, and cauſed it to be fixed upon the Doors of the Churches in York, for publick view. The ſubſtance of the Articles, contained in the Manifeſto, was as follows:

The Earl of Westmoreland seizes the heads of the Conspiracy by fraud. Walsing.

Some time before the King had Intelligence of this Rebellion, he ordered a Body of Troops to march into the North, under the Command of Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmoreland, to make head against the Scots, who seemed inclined to renew the War. The Earl was near York, when he heard the News of the Insurrection. The Superiority of the Rebels Troops, not permitting him to advance any farther, for fear of being ingaged in an unequal Fight, he thought it more adviseable to use Policy. To that end, he dispatched a trusty Messenger to the Archbishop of York, and the Earl-Marshal, to tell them from him, that, considering their great Prudence and Zeal for the publick Good, he did not question but weighty Reasons had induced them to take Arms, and desired them to acquaint him with the same. The Confederates thinking him already shaken, sent him word, they had no other Intention, than to procure the Good of the Kingdom, and intreated him to come and join with them in defence of the Publick. This answer made him judge, it would not be impossible to over-reach Persons, who thought him capable of so readily taking their Part. To keep them in this Belief, he told them by the same Messenger, he was not so blind but he could see the Injuries done to the Nation: However, he was afraid, they had been too hasty in their Proceedings: That, before all things, care should have been taken to secure the Concurrence of all the principal Lords, or at least the Majority: That as for himself, he could not communicate all his thoughts by a third Person; but, if they would agree to an Interview, would more freely open his mind. The Archbishop of York no longer doubting, that the Earl was privately of the same Sentiments with the Confederates, pressed the Earl-Marshal to go with him to the Interview, and, notwithstanding his unwillingness, prevailed with him at last. The Place assigned for the Conference being in an open Plain, and the Guards advancing at an equal distance on both sides, the three Lords began to confer together. The Earl of Westmoreland protested, he had no less at heart than themselves, the Welfare and Prosperity of the State, and approved of the Articles of the Manifesto, except a few things which he wished they would alter. Then he proposed certain means to execute their design, which appeared very judicious, and fully convinced them of his Sincerity. When he found he had gained their Confidence, he ordered some Wine to be brought, and they all three drank together. Mean while, he affected to shake them by the hand, and give them Marks of a hearty Correspondence. In short, to show an intire Confidence, he commanded his Guards to withdraw, who immediately obeyed. This Frankness obliged the Archbishop and Earl-Marshal, to send away theirs likewise, being unwilling to appear more distrustful than he. But hardly were their Guards out of sight, when the others returned upon the Gallop, and, before the Archbishop, and Mowbray, could be relieved, they were both taken and conducted to the Royal Army. The Seizure of their Leaders threw the Confederates into such a Consternation, that it was not possible for the Earl of Northumberland, who staid at York, to keep their Troops any longer together. So, every one shifting for himself, the Earl was also forced to retire to Berwick, of which he was Governor. Some time after, the King being come to Pontfract, the Earl of Westmoreland brought his two Prisoners to him, who were both condemned to lose their Heads. The Archbishop suffered Death with great constancy, and was honoured by the People for a Martyr, till the King, by his Authority, put a stop to their Superstition. From Pontfract the King went to York, and severely punished the Inhabitants (1). Then advancing towards the North, in order to besiege the Castle of Berwick, he took in his way the Lords Hastings and Falconbridge, who met with the same fate as the Archbishop and Earl-Marshal. Upon the King's Approach, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf, despairing of being able to defend themselves, and dreading to fall into the hands of a justly incensed Prince, withdrew into Scotland at the Lord Flemming's, by whom they were received. Mean while, Henry became master of Berwick, and several Castles belonging to the Earl of Northumberland, after which, he returned to London.

Percy and Bardolf retire to Scotland. Walsing.

Though most Historians ascribe the rise of this Conspiracy to the King's threatning the Clergy and Nobility, upon their refusal of the Aid he demanded, it appears however to have been formed before. For, whilst Henry was still in the North, the Marshal de Montmorency arrived in Wales, with a Fleet of a hundred and forty Sail, and twelve thousand Men. As soon as he was landed he joined Glendour, and they marched together, and took Carmarthen, Worcester, and several other Places of the neighbourhood, where they met with a great Booty (2). Mezerai, who places this Event in the last year, says, the Earl of Marche, of the House of Bourbon, caused the Undertaking to miscarry by his too long delay. This shows, the Court of France thought their Army would land in Wales, just at the time the Archbishop of York's Plot broke out. It may be, the Preparations were begun the last year, and that might occasion Mezerai's mistake. It is much more probable, he should be mistaken in the Date of this Event, than the English Historians, who refer to this year, the taking of their Towns, and the great Booty made by their Enemies on that occasion. Besides, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, an Order from the King, dated at Pontfract (3), mentioning the Descent of the French. It is true, in this Order, their Leader is called Hugevyle, and not Montmorency. But as there were not two Descents the same year, and in the same Country, it may be presumed, that Hugevyle made the Descent under the Marshal's direction.

The French land in Wales. Act. Pub. VIII p. 402 412. Walsing.

Act. Pub. VIII p. 406.

Henry had no sooner finished his Affairs in the North, but he marched towards Wales, to defend the Borders against the French. But he was so retarded by the Weather, that they had sufficient time to re-imbark, leaving Glendour to shift for himself. However, the King could do nothing against the Welsh, though deprived of the Assistance of their Friends, as well because the Season was too far advanced, as because in his march, he had lost great part of his Baggage.

The King marches against them. Walsing.

After so manifest a Breach of the Truce, the French, one would have thought, designed openly to renew the War. But that was not their Intention. As the Conspiracy in England had not succeeded as they wished, they did not think proper to carry the Rupture any farther. Mean while, to join Insult with Outrage, at the very time they had sent a powerful Aid to the Welsh Rebels, and their Forces had taken Towns, and ravaged Counties in England, they assured Henry, their Intent was always to keep the Truce, as if bare Words were more proper than directly contrary Facts, to show the Sincerity of their Intentions. This Behaviour was entirely grounded upon the vain Pretence of the Duke of Orleans's private quarrel with Henry, for the murder of Richard II, wherein he believed, or pretended to believe, he might use the Forces of France, which were at his disposal, without any Violation of the Truce between the two Crowns. So that all Henry's Complaints were fruitless, since he could only apply for Justice to the Duke of Orleans himself, the principal Author of all these Violations. The Court of France was so well acquainted with the Temper, Character, and Politicks of Henry, that they were not afraid to insult him upon all occasions, during almost the whole Course of his Reign. Henry V, his Son, was not so gentle, but knew how to revenge the Affronts his Father had received (4).

1406. The Parliament meets. All being quiet in England after the retreat of the French, the King called a Parliament, which met March 1. 1406 (3). As his deſign was to demand Money, he readily gave his aſſent to an Act to ſecure the freedom of Elections (4). This Act ſhows, that in the Elections for the late Parliament, the King had done ſomething tending to abridge the liberty of voting. As ſoon as this Act was paſſed, Henry demanded an aid of Money, but was plainly told, there was no viſible occaſion for it. He was extremely offended at this denial, but however, durſt not openly ſhow his reſentment, for fear of exaſperating them. Mean while, he deviſed an expedient which procured him what he wanted. This was, to keep the Parliament aſſembled, till they ſhould, of their own accord, be brought to grant his demand. So, without any freſh application, he continued the Seſſion till the end of Auguſt. This was very inconvenient to the Members, who had buſineſs at home, and withal, very expenſive to the People, who were to bear their charges. At length, the Commons, impatient of returning to their homes, voted him a Subſidy (5), not without loud murmurs, at the conſtraint laid upon them.

He keeps the Houſes aſſembled till they grant it. Walſing.

During this Seſſion, the Parliament paſſed an Act, limiting the ſucceſſion of the Crown to the King's Male-Iſſue, excluſive of the Female. As this Act was repealed this ſame year, and, probably, razed out of the Parliament-Rolls, one can only gueſs, upon what foundation it was built. Now what might, very likely, ſerve the King for pretence to demand ſo extraordinary an Act, was this.

An Act excluding the Women from the Crown.

During the whole courſe of the Dominion of the Saxon Kings, or at leaſt ſince the union of the ſeven Kingdoms, we do not find a ſingle inſtance of the Deſcendants of the Daughters, being called to the Succeſſion of the Crown. From the Norman Conqueſt, to the time I am ſpeaking of, we meet in the Engliſh Hiſtory, with two Precedents in favour of the Women. The firſt is, that of King Stephen, Son of a Daughter of William the Conqueror, to which may be added, at the ſame time, that of Matilda, Daughter of Henry I, who diſputed the Crown with Stephen. The ſecond is, that of Henry II, Son of Matilda, who was acknowledged for King without oppoſition. Theſe two precedents, ſeemed to eſtabliſh the right of the Females beyond all diſpute. And yet they were not unqueſtionable. It might be alledged, that Stephen aſcended the Throne purely by the Cabals of ſome of the Nobility, and that Henry II, received his Crown only by virtue of a Treaty, extorted from his Predeceſſor by force of Arms. It might moreover be objected, that, as there was no expreſs Law, two examples ſince the beginning of the Monarchy, could not have the force of a Law, chiefly by reaſon of the circumſtances they were attended with. Thus the Right of the Daughters and their Iſſue, might at leaſt be liable to diſpute.

Reflection on that Act.

When Henry IV mounted the Throne, he pretended to be the next Heir of Richard II, ſhowing thereby, he made no account of the Earl of March's Right, deſcended only from a Daughter And indeed, ſuppoſing the Invalidity of the Women's right, it could not be denied, that he was nearer than the Earl of March, who was ſet up againſt him. But this pretended invalidity was a point that was not decided. Mean while, the People were generally of opinion, that the Daughters had a right to the Succeſſion, ſince, without its being neceſſary to alledge examples or precedents in their favour, it was ſufficient there was no Law to exclude them. Upon this foundation the late Rebellion was raiſed, as appeared by the Manifeſto of the Rebels. It is therefore very likely, that, to remove this pretence from the Male-contents, Henry would have decided the point by an Act, which, in excluding the Daughters and their Iſſue, ſeemed to inſinuate, that the reigning King aſcended the Throne purſuant to the Cuſtom and Laws of the Realm. But this Act, which perhaps was extorted the ſame way as the Subſidy, laſted but till the end of the year. The next Parliament, which met in December (6), made ſuch ſtrong Remonſtrances to the King, that he conſented to the Repeal. This Parliament, not ſatisfied with leaving the Right of the Daughters in its former doubtful State, paſſed a new Act, whereby the Females, and their Poſterity were eſtabliſhed in their natural Rights. The Succeſſion was ſettled upon the King's eldeſt Son, and his Heirs, without exception, then upon his Brothers, and their Iſſue, without excluding the Women. This Act was ſigned by the King, the Houſe of Lords, and the Speaker, in the name of all the Commons, the 22d of December 1406, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The Act is repealed.

1406. Another for the Women. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 462. ---- 464.

The precaution taken by the King to ſecure his Right, by the firſt of theſe Acts, was extremely prejudicial to his poſterity. He thereby gave occaſion for the ſecond, which ſtrengthened the Title of the Earl of March, and conſequently of the Houſe of York, which became Heir to that Prince.

Negotiation for delivering the Earl of Northumberland to the King. Walſing.

Whilſt the Parliament, which paſſed the firſt of theſe Acts, continued the Seſſion, till the King was pleaſed to diſmiſs them, Henry carried on in Scotland a ſecret Negotiation, to get into his hands, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf, who had taken refuge there. He could not be eaſy on account of the former, whoſe valour, abilities, and revengeful temper, were no leſs known to him, than his great intereſt in the North. As it was to be feared, that being ſo near thoſe parts, he would contrive ſome dangerous Plot, Henry believed he ought to ſpare no pains to make himſelf eaſy, by ſecuring his Perſon. To that end, he ſent an offer to certain Scotch Lords, whoſe Relations and Friends were Priſoners in England, to releaſe them without ranſom, provided they would deliver up the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf. This offer was gladly received. But as there was no concealing this deſign from the Lord Flemming, who had entertained theſe two Lords at his Houſe, he acquainted them with it, and they retired into Wales, under the protection of Glendour. Some time after, the Scotch Lords, vexed at their diſappointment, killed the Lord Flemming, who was the cauſe that their Friends ſtill remained in captivity. Afterwards, his Son, revenging his death upon ſome of the murderers, this quarrel, joined to ſeveral other occaſions of diſcord, which reigned among the great Men, under the Government of a very weak Prince, raiſed many Commotions in Scotland.

The Earl retires into Wales.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchan. Walſing.

Robert III, of the Houſe of Stuart, who ſat then on the Throne of Scotland, was a Prince more free from vices, than endowed with good qualities. His eaſy nature, or incapacity, had given opportunity to Robert his Brother, Duke of Albany, to ſeize, by degrees, the Government of the Kingdom, whilſt he left the King his Brother little more than the external badges of Royalty. His ambition not being ſatisfied with a borrowed authority, he formed a deſign to ſeize the Crown, or at leaſt took meaſures to ſecure it to himſelf after Robert's deceaſe. To compaſs his ends, it was neceſſary to prevent the obſtacles, he would infallibly meet with in the execution of his deſigns, from the Princes David and James his Nephews, the King's Sons. An opportunity very quickly offered to make away with the eldeſt. The young Prince committing ſome outrage, for which he was complained of to the King, the Duke of Albany procured an order from his Brother, to keep David confined, till the heat of his paſſion was ſomewhat abated. He executed this order with ſuch rigour, that cloſely confining the Prince, he cauſed him to be ſtarved to death. How careful ſoever he might be to conceal this barbarous action, Robert was informed of it, but being too weak, and his Brother too potent, durſt not attempt to be revenged. The only remedy he could apply to his grief, was to put James his ſecond, now become his eldeſt Son, out of the reach of the ſnares of his treacherous Brother. For that purpoſe, he reſolved to educate him at the Court of France, in order to ſend him out of Scotland, where he was in ſuch imminent danger, and accordingly put him on board a Veſſel to go by Sea. The young Prince ſailing near the Coaſt of Norfolk, and finding himſelf Sea-ſick, went on ſhore for refreſhment. In vain did the Scotch Prince deliver him a Letter from the King his Father, recommending his Son to him, in caſe any accident ſhould oblige him to land in his Dominions. Henry only anſwered with a poor jeſt, telling him, there was no occaſion to go to Paris to learn French, he ſhould be taught it at London. The King of Scotland died three days after receiving this bad News, and the Duke of Albany took upon him the Regency, during the Impriſonment of the young Prince, to whom the Crown was devolved.

Death of King Robert.

The French try in vain to aid the Welſh. Walſing.

This year the French came upon the Coaſt of Wales with thirty eight Ships, in order to aſſiſt Glendour. But a violent Storm, deſtroying moſt of their Fleet, hindered the execution of their deſign.

1407. Symptoms of a new Conſpiracy. Walſing.

Very likely, the Court of France had received ſome Intelligence of a Conſpiracy forming in England againſt the King, and in order to countenance it, would have had an Army ready in Wales. But the diſperſion of the Fleet probably blaſted their ill-concerted project. There were ſome indications of it in the beginning of the year 1407, by certain Perſons daring to poſt up in ſeveral places in London, that Richard was living, and preparing to enter the Kingdom with a powerful Army. What inquiries ſoever the King made, the Authors could never be diſcovered. Only a poor Wretch, employed in poſting up the Papers, was hanged, without being able or willing to tell who ſet him to work.

Plague at London. Walſing.

This year a terrible Plague raged at London, which ſwept away above thirty thouſand Inhabitants. The King not daring to ſtay at London whilſt the Plague made ſuch Ravages, retired to the Caſtle of Leeds in the County of Kent. After ſpending there part of the Summer, he had a mind to remove to another of his Seats in Norfolk (1), and reſolving to go by Sea, went on board a Veſſel, which was followed by four more with his Baggage and Attendants. Whilſt he was ſailing in ſight of Land, without any precaution, and believing there was no danger, he ſaw himſelf on a ſudden attacked by ſome French Pyrates (2), who took four of his Ships; that, where he was himſelf, very narrowly eſcaping. It was not doubted that ſome Treachery lurked under this accident, but it was impoſſible to be proved.

Death of Robert Knolles. Walſing.

The famous Robert Knolles, who had abundantly ſignalized himſelf in the Wars with France in the Reign of Edward III, died this year in a very advanced age. Though of mean Birth, he had raiſed himſelf by his merit to the higheſt Poſts, and gained a reputation equal to that of the moſt illuſtrious Warriours. In the beginning of this Reign, he was Seneſchal of Guienne, but afterwards being weary of a Life of too much Hurry and Action, retired to his Eſtate in Kent. There he ended his days, after acquiring a ſtill more ſolid Glory by many acts of Piety, Charity, Munificence, ſome of which ſubſiſt to this day (3).

Deſigns of the French upon Guienne and Calais. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 412, 456, 466.

Henry being ſenſible how ill-affected his Subjects were to him, ſtood ſo in awe of them, that ever ſince his Acceſſion to the Crown, he had not dared to ſend any Troops into Guienne for fear of weakening himſelf at home. Mean while the French taking advantage of his negligence, became maſters from time to time of ſeveral Places in that Province, by bribing the Governours. They herein followed the maxim introduced during the War between Edward III and Philip de Valois, that Buying and Selling was no breach of a Truce. This year the Duke of Orleans endeavoured, notwithſtanding the Truce, to take Bourg and Blaye, but could not ſucceed. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy had again formed the deſign of beſieging Calais, but for want of due meaſures, durſt not purſue it. He complained, the Duke of Orleans had privately obſtructed it. This occaſion of complaint, with ſeveral others, breeding in him a mortal hatred to that Prince, he cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated this year in November. He was ſo hardy as to avow his being Author of the Murder, and ſo powerful as to procure a pardon, though the deceaſed was the King's own Brother.

Truce with Bretagne. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 469 490.

Though War was not proclaimed between England and Bretagne, the continual outrages on both Sides, could not fail at length to produce an open Rupture. The Duke of Bretagne was Son of a Father who had an Engliſh Heart. But the young Duke had imbibed at the Court of France other Inclinations and Maxims. However, the death of the Duke of Orleans, and the troubles in France, convincing the Bretons, they might be abandoned, in caſe of a Rupture with England, they thought proper to accept of a Truce offered by Henry. The Truce was only to be for a Year, the Bretons imagining, they ſhould ſee by that time how matters would go in France, where diſorder began to reign (4). 1407.

1408. A freſh attempt of the Earl of Northumberland againſt the King. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 520. Walſing.

Henry was not ignorant of the Bretons deſign, but thought it his intereſt to diſſemble. Ever ſince his coming to the Crown, he had conſtantly followed this Rule, that it was better to connive at ſome things in his Neighbours, than be expoſed to the inſults of his Subjects. He could not help reflecting on the irregular means he had uſed to aſcend the Throne. This conſideration keeping him in continual dread, he choſe rather to hazard his reputation a little, than furniſh his Domeſtick Enemies, by ingaging in Foreign Wars, with an opportunity to execute their ill deſigns. It was not without reaſon that he lived in perpetual apprehenſions. He had ſtill in the Earl of Northumberland an Enemy, who, humbled as he was, continued to be very formidable. Since that Earl and the Lord Bardolf were retired into Wales, they had never ceaſed contriving means with Glendour to dethrone the King. The Welſh who were in open War with Henry, concealed not their preparations. They ſtrengthened their Army with great numbers of French and Flemiſh Adventurers, drawn thither by the proſpect of the booty promiſed them in England. On the other hand, the Earl of Northumberland privately ſecured the aſſiſtance of the People of the North, with whom he had all along great intereſt, in ſpite of his paſt diſgraces. When matters were ripe, the Earl and Bardolf returned to Scotland, from whence they entered England by the northern Counties, at the head of ſome Scotch Troops, levied by the Connivance of the Duke of Albany, Regent of the Kingdom. As ſoon as they appeared in the North, thoſe that were gained beforehand, ſpeedily joined them, and their Army became, in few days, very conſiderable.

He begins with Glendour. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 588.

He appears in Arms in the North.

He makes a Progreſs.

As the King did not expect this inſurrection, the Earl had time to re-take the Caſtles he had loſt in the firſt Rebellion. This ſucceſs encouraged him to enter Yorkſhire. He hoped, when once he was maſter of that County, nothing would hinder him from joining the Welſh, who only waited his Orders to put themſelves in motion. Upon his entering Yorkſhire, he publiſhed a Manifeſto, containing the Motives of his taking up Arms. This Manifeſto was much the ſame with thoſe publiſhed in the former Rebellions. Mean while, as the King loſt a great deal of time in preparations, Sir Thomas Rokeby, Sheriff of York, thought it his duty to levy ſome Troops in a readineſs againſt the King's coming, and at the ſame time to obſtruct the progreſs of the Rebels. The Earl of Northumberland judging it of the laſt importance, to diſperſe the Sheriff's Forces before they increaſed, marched towards him, in expectation that his approach would put him to flight. But he found he had to deal with an Enemy that was not ſo eaſily frightened. Rokeby, though far inferiour to the Earl, ſtood his ground, and fought with that Bravery and Good-Fortune, that the Rebels were entirely routed (5). The Earl of Northumberland was ſlain on the ſpot, and the Lord Bardolf taken Priſoner, but ſo mortally wounded, that he died in few days. Their heads being ſent to the King, were ordered to be ſet on a Pole on London Bridge. Thus died the Earl of Northumberland, who, from being the King's great Friend, became his bittereſt Enemy. It was he that contributed moſt to place Henry on the Throne, by his readineſs to join him at Ravenſpur; an Example followed by all the reſt of the Kingdom. But afterwards he made ſeveral attempts to wreſt the Crown from him. So, it might be a Queſtion, whether he had done more for, than againſt, him, if in an affair of this nature a ſingle Rebellion did not outweigh numberleſs Services.

A brief account of the Schiſm. Platina. Walſing.

The Schiſm, which commenced in 1378, by the double Election of Urban VI, and Clement VII, ſtill continued, to the great ſcandal of Chriſtendom. Urban dying in 1390, the Cardinals of his Party choſe in his room Boniface IX, who at firſt ſeemed very much inclined to put an end to the Schiſm. Whereupon the Court of France, laboured heartily to inſpire Clement with the ſame reſolution. But as he proved inflexible, the Univerſity of Paris was ordered to meet, where it was decided, that, to put an end to the Schiſm, one of theſe three ways was abſolutely neceſſary. The firſt was, That the two Popes ſhould reſign. The ſecond, That they ſhould agree upon Umpires to decide their difference. The third, That the determination ſhould be referred to a General Council. This reſolution being communicated to Clement, troubled him ſo, that he died quickly after in 1394. When the King of France had notice of his death, he wrote to the Cardinals, deſiring them not to proceed to a new Election. But as they ſuſpected the contents of his Letter, they choſe, before they opened it, the Cardinal of Luna, an Arragonian, who took the Name of Benedict XIII. Before the Election, they all took a ſolemn Oath, that whoever was choſen, ſhould renounce the Papacy, in caſe it was deemed neceſſary for the good of Chriſtendom. But Benedict being elected, diſpenſed with the Oath he had taken, when Cardinal. On the other hand, Boniface IX dying 1404, his Cardinals choſe Innocent VII, and he likewiſe dying the next year, they elected Angelo Corario a Venetian, who aſſumed the name of Gregory XII.

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 604.

It would be tedious to relate all the Evaſions uſed by Benedict XIII, and Gregory XII, to decline the reſignation ſworn by each. They were both willing to be thought well-affected, and yet continually ſtarted freſh Obſtacles to the agreement deſired by all Chriſtendom. In ſhort, the Chriſtian Princes, tired with the delays of the two Popes, found means to gain the Cardinals of both ſides, who, in their own name, ſummoned a General Council at Piſa, for the 25th of March 1409.

1409. Council of Piſa. Ib. p. 567. Walſing. Alexander V, elected.

The Council being aſſembled, the two Popes were cited, and as they did not think fit to appear, were declared perjured Hereticks, and deprived of their Dignity. At the ſame time, the Cardinals were impowered to elect a new Pope. They choſe Peter de Candia, who ſtiled himſelf Alexander V. Before the meeting of the Council, Henry writ to Gregory, to admoniſh him to comply with the method of Reſignation. But his Letter being fruitleſs, when he heard of Alexander's Election, he iſſued a Proclamation, enjoining all his Subjects to acknowledge the new Pope. It was believed, the ſcandalous Schiſm, which had now laſted thirty years, was at length cloſed, but by Benedict's obſtinacy, it was ſome years farther prolonged.

The Progreſs of the Lollards alarms the Clergy.

How ſcandalous ſoever this Schiſm might be, it did not create in the Clergy of England ſo great uneaſineſs, as Wickliff's Doctrine. Though, during this Reign, the Lollards were uſed with great ſeverity, their Number continually increaſed. There were even at Oxford, Doctors, that publickly defended the novel Opinions, as well in their Diſputations, as Writings. The Biſhops being extremely alarmed at it, obtained of the King an Order to the Univerſity to meet in Convocation, and examine the Books of Wickliff. As the Majority were ſtill attached to the old Doctrine, his Books were condemned, and the Univerſity publiſhed a Decree, forbidding all her Members, upon pain of Degradation, to preach, or teach, the Doctrine therein contained.

Wickliff's Books condemned at Oxford. Act. Pub. VIII.

Truce with Bretagne.

This year the Truce with Bretagne, was prolonged to the 1ſt of July 1411.

Henry could not be ſecure of any Tranquillity, ſo long as France was undiſturbed. From thence proceeded the riſe of all the motions, as well of his own Subjects, as of the Welſh and Scots. The War, which was kindled in that Kingdom between the Houſes of Orleans and Burgundy, was very beneficial to England. In the firſt Place, Caſtile and Scotland were more ready to conclude a Truce with Henry. In the next place, the Welſh, receiving no further aſſiſtance from thence, found at length, their pretended Prince was very far from being able to perform what he had promiſed, and began by degrees to deſert him. Laſtly, Henry reaped moreover this private Advantage, that he became more abſolute at home, ſince he had nothing to fear from his Enemies abroad. Though he had cauſed Richard to be depoſed, for uſurping an arbitrary Power contrary to the Laws, yet he himſelf plainly ſhowed by certain proceedings, he would have been glad to govern with an abſolute authority. This chiefly appeared in the Elections of Members of Parliament. By the directions of the Court, certain Artifices were practiſed, to render the Freedom of voting of no uſe, ſince the Sheriffs took the liberty to return ſuch Repreſentatives as had not a Majority of Votes. This is a thing of ſo fatal a conſequence, that it may be affirmed, the liberty of the Engliſh will no longer ſubſiſt, than whilſt the Privilege of freely electing their Repreſentatives in Parliament ſtands inviolated. If once the Sovereign comes to chuſe what Repreſentatives he pleaſes, the bounds of the Royal Authority will be in the end ſo enlarged, that nothing but the mere Shadow of Liberty will remain. Of this, we have ſeen a remarkable inſtance in the Reign of Richard II. But it may farther be added, that all the Kings of England, who have enjoyed a more abſolute power than the reſt, acquired it by this way, I mean, by procuring their Creatures to be elected. When a Parliament conſiſts of ſuch Members, it is no longer the King that is charged with Incroachments upon the People's Liberty, but it is the Nation itſelf, that voluntarily runs into Slavery. And if, afterwards, they reſolve to throw off their chains, they can only ſucceed by violent means; and this, by the way, is the Spring of moſt of the Civil Wars, ſo often kindled in England. The Parliament which met in January (3) 1410, conſidering the conſequences of the King's proceedings to over-rule the Elections, believed the redreſs of that abuſe, was the moſt preſſing affair. Accordingly, in the beginning of the Seſſion, they preſented a Bill to the King, by which, the Sheriffs, who ſhould be guilty of making falſe returns, were to be fined a hundred Pounds Sterling, for every offence. The King would have been glad to evade this Act, but as he could not do it, without laying himſelf too open, and beſides intended to demand a Subſidy, he gave it the Royal Aſſent.

Act againſt falſe Returns. See Statut.

The King demands a Subſidy.

Upon paſſing this Act, the King demanded an Aid of Money of the Commons, who took occaſion from thence to renew their former Inſtances, with regard to the Clergy. Wickliff's Doctrine had gained ſo much ground, that the Majority of the Houſe of Commons leaned that way. Thus biaſſed, the Commons preſented to the King two Petitions, one againſt the Clergy, the other in behalf of the Lollards. In the firſt, they ſet forth, "That the Clergy made an ill uſe of their Riches, and "conſumed their Incomes, in a very different manner "from the Donors intent: That their Revenues were "exceſſive, and conſequently it was neceſſary to leſſen "them: That ſo many Eſtates might eaſily be ſeized, "as would ſerve to provide for a hundred and fifty "Earls (4), at the rate of three thouſand Marks a year "each; fifteen hundred Barons, at a hundred Marks "each; ſix thouſand two hundred Knights, at forty "Marks; and a hundred Hoſpitals, at a hundred Marks: "That by this means the Kingdom's ſafety would be "better provided for, the Poor better maintained, and "the Clergy more attached to their Duty."

Petition of the Commons againſt the Clergy. Walſing.

In the ſecond Petition the Commons prayed, that the Statute paſſed againſt the Lollards in the ſecond (5) year of this Reign, might either be repealed, or at leaſt qualified with ſome Reſtrictions.

Another in favour of the Lollards. Walſing.

If the Parliament, that firſt moved the leſſening of the Clergy's Revenues, was ſtiled the Unlearned, it may well be ſuppoſed, this met with no better Treatment. The Name of Lollard and Heretical was plentifully beſtowed, and the Clergy conſidered the Petition, as tending to undermine all Religion. This was induſtriouſly inſinuated to the King, with all the aggravations, which Parties concerned are capable of diſplaying on ſuch an occaſion. It 1410. is hard to know, whether the King himſelf was of this Mind; but however, he declared, he had the Intereſt of the Church no leſs at heart, than the Clergy themſelves. After the Death of the Earl of Northumberland, there was never a Lord in the Kingdom, that could give him any Uneaſineſs; and though the People were diſſatisfied, Henry was very ſenſible, that of themſelves, they would never be induced to rebel, unleſs incouraged thereto. So, it was his Intereſt to pleaſe the Clergy, who alone were able to ſtir up the People, if they had ſo plauſible a Pretence as the loſs of their Revenues. For this reaſon, he anſwered the Commons very ſharply, that he neither could, nor would conſent to their Petitions, and expreſly forbad them to meddle any more with the Church's Concerns. As for the Lollards, he replied, that far from permitting the Statute againſt them to be repealed, he wiſhed it more rigorous, for the utter Extirpation of Hereſy out of the Land.

The King rejects the two Petitions. Walſing.

Another Petition againſt the Clergy rejected. Walſing.

The Commons miſſing their Aim, were contented with moving, that at leaſt Clerks convicted ſhould not be delivered to the Biſhops Priſons (1), alledging for reaſon, that daily Experience ſhewed, Clerks by that means always eſcaped the Puniſhment they deſerved. What the Commons demanded was no leſs reaſonable now, than in the Reign of Henry II, when that Prince, and all the Peers of the Realm maintained that Point ſo ſtoutly againſt Becket, and Pope Alexander III. But Henry fearing to be expoſed to the like Troubles as Henry II was liable to, refuſed alſo to give his Aſſent to this Bill. On the contrary, he affected to ſhew an extraordinary Zeal for the Intereſts of the Church, and to take ſuch Steps as he thought moſt agreeable to the Clergy. Though it cannot be doubted, that Wickliff's Doctrine was the real Cauſe of the Motions made by the Houſe of Commons, the King was pleaſed to let them ſee, how far he was from giving them any Countenance, by ſigning a Warrant for burning one Thomas Badby. The Prince of Wales had a mind to be preſent at the Execution, and, as the poor Wretch gave ſenſible Signs of the Torture he endured, ordered the Fire to be removed, and promiſed him a Penſion for Life, provided he would recant. But Badby recovering his Spirits, refuſed to comply with the Offer, and ſuffered Death with heroick Courage.

The King orders a Lollard to be burnt. Walſing. p. 378. Act. Pub. VIII. p. 627.

The Commons are offended, and refuſe the King's Demand. Walſing.

The Commons conſidered this Execution as an Inſult, and great Aggravation of the Refuſal they had lately endured. Accordingly, when the King demanded a Power to levy every Year a certain Subſidy (2), though the Parliament ſhould not ſit, the Demand was boldly rejected. The Commons would have even refuſed a Supply for his neceſſary Occaſions, if, to force them to it, the ſame method, that had formerly ſucceeded, had not been employed: That is, he prolonged the Seſſions till he obtained his deſire (3). It plainly appeared, that the Earl of Northumberland was dead; that the Troubles in Wales were almoſt at an end; and that France was no longer formidable; otherwiſe he would never have ventured to treat the Commons ſo haughtily.

He obtains a Subſidy by a kind of Force.

The Duke of Burgundy forms a Deſign to beſiege Calais. Walſing.

Notwithſtanding the ill Poſture of Affairs in France, the Duke of Burgundy reſumed his Deſign of beſieging Calais, but with his former Succeſs. All his Preparations at St. Omer for the carrying on the Siege, being burnt to Aſhes, either by Accident, or by means of an Incendiary, ſent on purpoſe by the Governor of Calais, this Project, like the foregoing, vaniſhed into Air. The French Hiſtorians make no mention of this Attempt. However it ſeems, by the King's Precaution, in ſending the Prince of Wales to Calais at that very time, he had received ſome private Intelligence thereof. Be this as it will, the Truce with France, for Guienne and Picardy, was again prolonged for ſome Months.

Theſe Negotiations require no farther Explication, ſince we have already ſeen the Occaſion of them. But the Negotiation this Year with the Duke of Burgundy, merits a more particular notice. To that end, it will be neceſſary to explain, as briefly as poſſible, the preſent Situation of Affairs in France, on which depends a good Part of the Occurrences of this, and the two following Reigns. 1411.

Affairs of France. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

We have ſeen how John Duke of Burgundy aſſaſſinated the Duke of Orleans, Brother of King Charles VI; and avowing the Fact, had Credit enough to procure a Pardon. He, afterwards, went into his Dominions in Flanders, with deſign to reſtore to the Biſhoprick of Liege, his Ducheſs's Brother, expelled by his People. Whilſt he was preparing for this War, the Ducheſs of Orleans, in Company with her three Sons, of whom Charles the eldeſt was but fifteen Years old, came, and caſting herſelf at the Feet of the King her Brother-in-law, demanded Juſtice for the Death of her Husband. Though the Duke of Burgundy had obtained a Pardon, his Adverſaries taking advantage of his Abſence, had Intereſt enough to have it revoked, and to cauſe him to be pronounced Enemy of the State. He was then marching to the Relief of Maeſtricht, where the Men of Liege held their Biſhop beſieged. At his Approach, they raiſed the Siege; but, being afterwards informed, the Duke had only ſixteen thouſand Men, reſolved to attack him. Though their Army was three times as ſtrong as the Duke's, they were routed with the loſs of thirty thouſand Men. The Duke's Victory ſo alarmed his Enemies in France, that not thinking themſelves ſafe at Paris, where the Duke had many Adherents, they retired to Tours, and took the King along with them. The victorious Duke, preferring his Affairs in France, to the War againſt the Men of Liege, who were ſufficiently humbled, put himſelf immediately at the head of four thouſand Horſe, and came to Paris, where he was received in Triumph. At his Arrival he ſo managed, that the Pariſians ſent Deputies to the King, praying him to return to their City. Charles, who was then in one of his Intervals, thought it not adviſeable in the preſent Juncture, to protect the Enemies of the Duke of Burgundy. He repaired to Paris as deſired, and immediately appointed conſiderable Perſons to mediate an Agreement between the Duke of Burgundy and the Sons of the Duke of Orleans, which was accompliſhed, though with great difficulty. The Ducheſs of Orleans died with Grief, to ſee her Husband's Murderer triumphant; and the young Duke of Orleans, then but in his ſixteenth Year, found himſelf obliged to be reconciled to his mortal Enemy. From thenceforward, the Duke of Burgundy ſeized the Government, the King, who frequently relapſed, being too weak to hold the Reins himſelf.

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 698, 699. Walſing.

Mean while, Henry, who had always an eye to a Peace with France, formed a Deſign to marry the Prince of Wales, with one of the Daughters of the Duke of Burgundy, whom he ſaw ſo firmly eſtabliſhed. But whilſt he was carefully thinking how to accompliſh his Project, ſuch Alterations happened in France, as made him ſenſible, this Alliance was not ſo certain a means, as he had imagined, to attain his Ends. The Dukes of Berri, Orleans, Alenſon, Bretagne, and the Earls of Clermont and Armagnac, meeting at Gien in Auguſt 1410, entered into a League againſt the Duke of Burgundy, and ſhortly after approached Paris. The Duke, having the King in his Power, oppoſed them with equal Forces; which convinced them, that the Execution of their Deſigns depended on a Battle, the Succeſs whereof could not but be doubtful. In all appearance, France itſelf would be ruined by a Battle, which would have been deſtructive to the Kingdom, on which ſide ſoever Victory inclined, had not means been found to make an Agreement between theſe Princes. It was agreed, that the Duke of Burgundy ſhould depart from Paris, the confederate Princes ſhould not enter there, and none of the Heads of the two Parties ever come to Court, unleſs ſent for by Letters under the Great-Seal.

The Duke of Burgundy punctually obſerving this Agreement, retired into the Low-Countries; but the Duke of Orleans, and the reſt of his Party, were not ſo ſcrupulous. After disbanding their Troops, they levied others, and approached Paris, in expectation of inriching themſelves with the Plunder of the Metropolis, which remained firm to the Burgundian Party. The Duke finding himſelf thus deceived, made an Alliance with the King of England, who believing it his Intereſt to ſupport him, ſent him a conſiderable Body of Troops (5). With this Aſſiſtance, the Duke marching into France, and paſſing through the Enemies Quarters, who were blocking up Paris, entered the City, amidſt the Acclamations of the Parliament in England. Act of Indemnity.

Whilſt France was in Trouble and Confuſion, the Parliament of England meeting about the end of this Year (1), petitioned the King for a general Pardon for his Subjects. Henry readily complied with their Requeſt, excepting only Glendour and his Adherents (2). This ſhews Glendour was ſtill living, though moſt Hiſtorians ſay, he died in 1409. It is true, after the Earl of Northumberland's Death, his Affairs were gone to decay. The Welſh, ſeeing he was unable to perform his Promiſes, had deſerted him by degrees. He was even apprehenſive, they would make ſome attempt upon his Life, or deliver him up to the King. His fears inducing him to conceal himſelf, he paſſed the reſidue of his Days in ſome unknown Place. So, it is no wonder the time of his Death is unknown. However, that he lived till the Year 1417, is certain.

1412. Continuation of the Troubles in France.

The Affairs of France were embroiled more and more, by the mutual Hatred of the two Factions, who made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the Good of the Publick to their Animoſity. Hitherto Henry had juſtly dreaded ſome Miſchief from that quarter. If the Diſſenſions of the Princes of the Blood had not hindered thoſe that were at the Helm, during the King's Illneſs, from effectually ſupporting the Male-contents in England, he would very probably have been greatly diſtreſſed. But when he ſaw the Animoſity of the two Factions carried to the higheſt degree, his Fears entirely vaniſhed. He even began to think of means, to reap ſome Benefit from the Troubles in France, as the French had frequently attempted to take advantage of the Inſurrections in England. Herein, the Obſervation of the Truce was no more regarded on one ſide than the other.

Henry thinks of taking advantage of them.

Henry ſoon found as favourable an Opportunity, offered by the French themſelves, as he could deſire. The Dukes of Berry, Orleans, Bourbon, Alenſon, the Earl of Armagnac and the Lord d'Albret, Heads of one of the Factions, ſeeing themſelves unable to withſtand the Duke of Burgundy, who had the King and all the Royal Family in his Power, came to a Reſolution, to ſtrengthen themſelves with the Aſſiſtance of the King of England. But as they were not ignorant, that the Duke of Burgundy had prevented them, by making an Alliance with Henry, they thought it neceſſary to break that Union, by offering ſuch Terms, as were capable of taking off Henry from his Ingagements with their Enemy. To that end they met at Bourges, where they agreed upon the Conditions to be offered him, and then ſent Deputies to treat with him.

The Faction of Orleans ſue to him for Aid. Ib. p. 716, 718, 726. Walſing.

Hitherto, the Duke of Burgundy had evaded Henry's Propoſal, of marrying the Prince of Wales with one of his Daughters. Probably, he had entertained other Views. But, upon Information of what was contriving in England, he thought proper to preſs, in his turn, the concluſion of the Marriage. Henry pretended to hear with Pleaſure the Propoſition, but it was only to procure better Terms from the Orleans Faction, with whom he deſigned to make an Alliance. And indeed, the Deputies of the Princes hearing of this Negotiation, inſiſted no farther upon any Article, but concluded the Treaty, juſt as Henry deſired, on the 18th of May 1412.

Treaty between Henry and the Orleans Faction. p. 738. Walſing.

By this Treaty the Confederate Princes were bound,

I. To give up to the King of England about fifteen hundred Towns, Caſtles, and Bayliwicks, which they held in Guienne, or in Poictou.

II. To conquer for him what remained of theſe two Provinces in the hands of the French, and reſtore to him Guienne, with all its Dependencies, in the ſame State and Extent, as enjoyed by his Predeceſſors.

III. The King allowed, that the Duke of Berry ſhould hold Poictou for Life, on condition he did him Homage, and delivered up Poictiers, Niort, and Luſignan: As for the reſt of the fortified Towns in that Province, he ſhould place ſuch Governors in them, as would bind themſelves by Oath to reſign them after his Death to the King of England. The Duke of Orleans was to have the Duchy of Angoulême, upon the ſame Terms, and the Earl of Armagnac certain Caſtlewards in Guienne.

IV. The King was bound on his part, to lend the Princes an Aid of a thouſand Men at Arms, and three thouſand Archers, who were to go to Blois, where they ſhould be received by the Princes, and paid before-hand according to the ſtipulated pay. 1412.

The Treaty being ratified, Henry gave the Command of this Aid to Thomas his ſecond Son, created, a few days after, Duke of Clarence. He ſent with him in this Expedition the Duke of York, and Thomas Beaufort High-Admiral of England. Theſe Troops departed in July, and it appears by ſeveral Pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the King was preparing to go in Perſon to Guienne, to take Poſſeſſion of what had been promiſed him.

But whilſt theſe Forces had been buſily raiſing in England, the face of Affairs was altered in France. The Duke of Burgundy improving his Advantages over his Enemies, cloſely beſieged them in Bourges, and had brought the King with him. Though the Beſieged made a vigorous Defence, in hopes of the Supplies that were coming from England, they would have found it perhaps very difficult to hold out, if the Duke of Burgundy had not thought proper to offer them Peace. He was afraid of the Arrival of the Engliſh Troops, and the Confederates had reaſon to apprehend, they would not come timely enough. Theſe different Fears rendering both Sides more tractable, the Peace offered by the Duke of Burgundy was accepted without heſitation, and at the ſame time proclaimed.

He arrives, and finds a Peace concluded.

Mean time, the Duke of Clarence landing in Normandy, advanced towards Blois with all poſſible diligence, without committing Hoſtilities by the way. But when he was informed, that the Confederates had accepted a Peace (3), he conſidered France as an Enemy's Country, and made great Ravages in his march. It was the Duke of Orleans's buſineſs, head of the Faction, who had drawn him into France, to content him. But as he had no Money to pay what was already due to the Engliſh (4), he was forced to give him the Earl of Angoulême his Brother in Hoſtage. On the other hand, the Duke of Clarence finding himſelf in the Heart of an Enemy's Country, with a few Troops, and not without apprehenſion, that the two Parties would join againſt him, did not think fit to ſtand upon Terms. He only ſtipulated for leave to lead his Troops into Guienne, where they ſerved to recover ſome Places, by the help of the Earl of Armagnac, and the Lord d'Albret, who were not pleaſed with the Peace.

Walſing.

He retires into Guienne. Walſing.

This Affair being ended, Henry enjoyed a profound Tranquillity. He had nothing more to fear from France, which, by inteſtine Diviſions, was become unable to hurt him. The Welſh ſought only to make their Peace, and the Regent of Scotland, content to ſee the King his Nephew in the hands of the Engliſh, minded only his private Concerns. In fine, the Male-contents in England, being no longer ſupported by foreign Princes, remained quiet. Henry made uſe of this Calm to efface the ill Impreſſions, his Severity and Proceedings with reſpect to the Parliament, had made in the Minds of his Subjects. He affected Popularity, and endeavoured by all ſorts of means to ſhew, he thought of nothing leſs than ſtretching the Prerogative Royal. His Endeavours were crowned with ſuch Succeſs, that, notwithſtanding his Severity to his Enemies, and Refuſals to the Houſe of Commons, he was deemed a generous, mild, and moderate Prince. What was before conſidered, as an effect of his cruel and revengeful Temper, was now readily aſcribed to pure Neceſſity, and the Circumſtances of his Affairs. It was, doubtleſs, the latter Behaviour of this Prince, which led Hiſtorians to give him ſuch Commendations, as his former Actions no way deſerve. This Example ſhews, how eaſy it is for a Sovereign to efface the diſadvantagious Impreſſions entertained of him by his Subjects, provided he is ſo wiſe and fortunate, as to perſuade the World, he ſincerely intends to reform his Conduct.

Henry enjoys a profound Peace.

Whilſt Henry was endeavouring to recover his Reputation, which had ſuffered a little ſince his Acceſſion to the Throne, the Prince of Wales was entirely deſtroying his own, by his daily Exceſſes. Though he had naturally a great and generous Heart, he ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by Perſons, who, to ſerve their own Ends, flattered his vicious Paſſions, and diverted him from the Paths of Virtue. His Court was the receptacle of Libertines, Debauchees, Buffoons, Paraſites, and the like. Nothing was talked of, but the riotous and extravagant Pranks of the Prince, or his Companions. Such a Conduct in a Prince, who was one day to ſit on the Throne, was very amazing to the conſiderate, who could not help dreading the Conſequences. However, amidſt theſe Apprehenſions,

THE MONUMENT OF KING HENRY IV IN THE CATHEDRAL OF CANTERBURY

1412. T. Eliot. Stow. a Ray of Hope was ſeen to ſhine, in a very unexpected mark of Moderation given by the Prince. One of his Favorites (1) being arraigned for Felony before the Chief Juſtice (2), he reſolved to be preſent at the Trial, with deſign to over-awe the Judge. But his Preſence not preventing the Criminal's Condemnation, he was ſo tranſported with Paſſion, that he ſtruck the Judge on the Face. The Chief Juſtice thus affronted, conſidering the Conſequences of ſuch an Action, without regarding the Quality of the Offender, commanded him to be arreſted on the ſpot, and committed to Priſon (3). Then was ſeen what would never have been expected, the Prince, quiet as a Lamb, ſubmitting without murmuring, to the Judge's Orders, and ſuffering himſelf to be led to Priſon without Reſiſtance, like a private Perſon.

He gives a Judge a Blow in the Face. Hall.

The King grows ſuſpicious of the Prince. T. Ortaborne. The Judge's Courage, and the Prince's Moderation, were equally pleaſing to the King. Nevertheleſs, Henry, who was exceſſively jealous of his Crown, could not help giving Ear to ſome People's Inſinuations, that his Son had ill Deſigns againſt him. This Belief troubling him extremely, he would, perhaps, have proceeded to Extremities, in order to prevent the imagined danger, had not the Prince taken timely care to remove his Suſpicions. As ſoon as he was informed of the King his Father's Thoughts of him, he deſired a private Audience, and obtaining it, caſt himſelf at his Feet, and ſaid, "Sir, I am told you "have entertained a Suſpicion of me, injurious to my "Honour, and to the Reverence and Veneration I have "for your Perſon. It is true, I freely confeſs, I have "been guilty of ſome intemperate Sallies, which deſerve "your Indignation. But I never had the leaſt thought "of any Attempt upon your Perſon or Government. "They that dare charge me with ſo monſtrous a Crime, "ſeek only to diſturb your Quiet and mine. To clear "my ſelf of this Imputation, I have taken the Liberty "to come and throw my ſelf at yout Feet, humbly in-"treating you, to cauſe all my Actions to be as rigorouſly "examined, as thoſe of your meaneſt Subjects. I am "ready to undergo this ſtrict Scrutiny, knowing you will "be fully convinced of my Innocence." The King ſeeing with what Frankneſs the Prince offered to vindicate himſelf, grew perfectly eaſy, and reſtored him to Favour.

1413. The King is ſeized with a dangerous Diſtemper. Walſing. In the beginning of the Year 1413, Henry was ſeized with a Diſtemper, which, in three Months, laid him in his Grave. Mezerai ſays, it was the Leproſy. Others affirm, it was a ſort of Apoplexy, which had frequent Returns, and threw him into Fits that took away his Senſes. However this be, his Diſtemper, which ſeized him at ſeveral times, laſted near three Months, and then brought him to his end (4). A certain Perſon having formerly told him, he ſhould die at Jeruſalem, he remembred the Prediction, and verily believed, God would make him his Inſtrument to reſcue that City out of the hands of the Infidels. Thus perſuaded, he fancied his Death was not ſo near, and thought it his Duty to dedicate the Remainder of his Days to that glorious Expedition. Accordingly he took the Croſs, and calling a great Council, communicated his Deſign, and ordered all thing to be ſpeedily prepared for his Voyage. But preſently after, the Returns of his Diſtemper being more frequent than uſual, he found, inſtead of undertaking ſuch an Expedition, he ought to employ all his thoughts in Preparations for Death. His continual Fear of loſing his Crown, by reaſon of the many Attempts to wreſt it from him, increaſed with his Years. Every time he went to Bed, he ordered it to be laid on his Pillow, leſt it ſhould be ſeized before he was dead. One day being fallen into ſo ſtrong a Fit, that he was thought to reſign his laſt Breath, the Prince of Wales took up the Crown and carried it away. Soon after, the King recovering his Senſes, and miſſing the Crown, asked what was become of it. Being told the Prince had taken it, he ſent for him, and asked him, whether he would rob him of his Royalty even before his Death. The Prince replied, He never had any ſuch Thoughts, but believing him dead, he had taken the Crown as his lawful Heir, and the only Perſon that had a Right to pretend to it. Nevertheleſs, he thanked God he ſaw him again recovered, and heartily wiſhed he might long live to wear it himſelf. At the ſame time he went for the Crown, and laid it in its Place. 1413.

He always kept his Crown on his Pillow. Hollingſh. Hall.

The King's laſt Fit. Henry's laſt Fit ſeized him in St. Edward's Chapel, as he was worſhipping at that Saint's Shrine. He was carried to the Abbot of Weſtminſter's Lodgings, which were nearer than his own. Some time after, recovering his Speech, and finding himſelf in a ſtrange Place, he asked where he was: He was told, at the Abbot of Weſtminſter's, in a Chamber called Jeruſalem. Theſe Words putting him in mind of the fore-mentioned Prediction, he thought only of dying. Before he expired, he ſent for the Prince his eldeſt Son, and gave him many excellent Inſtructions, among which he could not forbear ſhewing ſome doubts concerning his Right to the Crown. He told him alſo, he was afraid his Brother, the Duke of Clarence, would diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of the Throne. It is not known, whether theſe Fears were occaſioned by his ſecond Son's reſtleſs Temper, or by ſome Engagement with him, when he conceived a Suſpicion of his eldeſt. Be this as it will, the Prince anſwered, that being his lawful Heir, he would endeavour to keep the Crown by the ſame Methods he had himſelf preſerved it during his Life. As for the Duke of Clarence, if he behaved as he ought, he ſhould always find him a kind Brother; but if he pretended to do otherwiſe, he knew how to make him return to his Duty. The King ſaid nothing more, except that he recommended him to the Protection of Heaven. A few Moments after, he reſigned his laſt Breath, on the 20th of March 1413, in the forty-ſixth Year of his Age, having reigned thirteen Years, five Months, and one and twenty Days (5).

Character of Henry IV. Moſt of the Hiſtorians have endeavoured to give, in my opinion, a very unſuitable Idea of this Prince. They ſpeak with Praiſe of his Mildneſs, Clemency, Generoſity, Valour, and many other Virtues, which appear more in their Writings than in his Actions. If he had ſome Reputation, whilſt a private Perſon, he does not ſeem to have increaſed or maintained it, after his Acceſſion to the Throne. His diſtinguiſhing Character was an extreme Jealouſy of a Crown, acquired by Ways not univerſally approved, and preſerved by ſhedding a Torrent of noble Blood. The Death of Richard II will be an indelible Stain to his Memory, tho' his Uſurpation of the Throne could be juſtified. In ſhort, he performed nothing remarkable to afford matter for Panegyrick. His Expeditions into Scotland and Wales have nothing to diſtinguiſh him with Honour. If he happily freed himſelf from all the Conſpiracies againſt him, he was chiefly indebted to the Mayor of Cirenceſter, the Sheriff of Yorkſhire, and the Earl of Weſtmoreland. The Battle of Shrewsbury, wherein he vanquiſhed young Percy, is the only notable Action in his whole Reign. His continual Fear of Inſurrections, cauſed him to neglect ſeveral Opportunities of humbling France, and recovering the Provinces loſt by his Predeceſſors. He even ſuffered many Inſults from the French, Scots, Welſh and Bretons, without ſhewing much Reſentment. In fine, he employed all his thoughts in preſerving his Crown, and avoiding all Occaſions by which it might be endangered. This prudent Policy ought to be the chief, if not the ſole ſubject of his Encomium, as it was the ſole Motive of his Actions, wherein nothing appears to render him eminent. Though he had cauſed Richard II to be depoſed, for uſurping an abſolute Power, he did not ſeem, by his Conduct, to have ſo great an Averſion for that Crime, as he pretended when it was his Intereſt to expoſe it. It is true, towards the end of his Life, he ſeemed to have formed a Deſign, to follow Maxims more conformable to the Nation's Liberties. But God was not pleaſed to allow him time to ſhew the Effects of this Reſolution (6).

When I conſider the exceſſive Commendations beſtowed on this Prince, I cannot help ſuſpecting, that the Glory of being the firſt Burner of Hereticks, and of protecting the Clergy againſt the Attempts of the Houſe of Commons, were the main Springs of all theſe Encomiums. It is well known, the Eccleſiaſticks are as zealous in praiſing their Benefactors, as in blackening their Oppoſers.

14. HENRY V. Sirnam'd of MONMOUTH.

HENRY V. 1413. March 20. HENRY IV not having the Happineſs to be beloved by the Engliſh, his Death was not much regarded. The Clergy alone lamented his Loſs, becauſe in his Reign they had met with great Favour and Protection. But the reſt of the People eaſily forgot a Prince, who, after his Acceſſion to the Crown, had performed nothing memorable, and ſhed more of his Subjects Blood than of the Enemies of the State. The very Peace enjoyed by the Engliſh during his whole Reign, was not grateful to them. War would have been thought more beneficial, ſince a fairer Opportunity to recover what was loſt in France had never offered. So, in expectation that the Prince his Son would revive the Glory of the Engliſh Name, which ſeemed buried in Oblivion, ſince the Reign of Edward III, they joyfully beheld him ſucceeding a Father, from whom nothing very advantagious to the Kingdom could be expected, though his Reign had been longer. In the preſent Juncture, England wanted an active and warlike King, who knew how to take advantage of the Commotions in France. On the other hand, War was become neceſſary, to diſpel the ill Humours ſpread over the Kingdom in the late Reign.

Education of Henry V. Henry of Monmouth, ſo called from the Place of his Birth (4) was exactly of the Temper deſired by the Engliſh. He was naturally of an elevated and enterpriſing Genius. For this reaſon the King his Father had always kept him at a diſtance from Affairs; this elevated Spirit being too apt to breed Suſpicion in ſo miſtruſtful a Prince. He had been a Student in Queen's-College in Oxford, under the Tuition of the Biſhop of Wincheſter his Uncle (5), Chancellor of that Univerſity. Here, in his tender Years, the Principles of Honour and Virtue were ſo carefully imprinted in his Mind, that they could never after be effaced. In his very Childhood, he ſhewed a ſtrong Inclination for War, which increaſing with his Years, the King his Father thought proper to indulge it. At eighteen Years of Age, he commanded an Army againſt the Welſh, and defeated them in two Battles. But his Victories did him an unſpeakable Prejudice. The King his Father, exceſſively jealous of his Authority, and dreading the Conſequences of ſo noble a beginning, conſidered his Son's Reputation, as likely one day to prove deſtructive of his Quiet. Diſturbed at this Thought, he removed him from all Warlike, as he had done from all Civil Offices, for fear it ſhould be out of his Power to check his Flight, when once he ſhould take Wing. Reduced to a State of Idleneſs, the Prince naturally active, ſought Employment. Unhappily, by the Inſtigation of ſome about him, and perhaps by the Direction of the King his Father, he ran into diſhonourable Courſes, and abandoned himſelf to Exceſſes, unbecoming his Birth, and injurious to his Reputation (6). Notwithſtanding all this, his good Diſpoſition failed not to ſhew itſelf upon certain Occaſions. His Moderation, in ſuffering himſelf to be led to Priſon, by order of the Judge he had affronted, was a clear Evidence, that the Seeds of Virtue were not entirely deſtroyed in his mind by Senſuality. Accordingly, the King his Father, who was not ignorant of his Talents, was afraid of him, though a young Prince, drowned as it were in Pleaſures, did not ſeem likely to give him Diſturbance. The Engliſh themſelves were not prejudiced againſt him. Indeed his wild Sallies might give occaſion to fear, they ſhould one day be unhappy under his Government. But, upon certain occaſions, they obſerved in him Tokens of Generoſity, Virtue, and greatneſs of Soul, which inſpired them with hopes of a happy Change in his Perſon.

Accordingly he began the Building of New-College in Oxford, and laid the firſt Stone himſelf, March 1, 1379. It was finiſhed in ſeven Years. In 1387, on the 26th of March, he likewiſe laid in Perſon the firſt Stone of his College at Wincheſter, which he deſigned as a Nurſery for that at Oxford. Upon this Foundation he ſettled an Eſtate for a Warden, ten Fellows, two Schoolmaſters, and ſeventy Scholars. And in 1398, Richard II made him a Grant of a Hogſhead of Wine every Year; beſides a Penſion of twenty Pounds a Year out of the Exchequer; both which were continued by Henry IV. 1413. Henry V proclaimed King. Hall.

Immediately after the Death of the King his Father, the Prince was proclaimed, by the name of Henry the Fifth. Inſtead of diſputing the Crown, thoſe who had been moſt averſe to the Advancement of the Houſe of Lancaſter, were the firſt to pay him their duty. The Earl of March himſelf, relying on his Generoſity, came and voluntarily put himſelf into his hands, to give him a convincing Proof of his ſincere Intention to leave him in peaceable poſſeſſion of the Throne. In fine, ſuch Confidence did the Engliſh place in him, that, contrary to Cuſtom, they offered to take the Oath of Allegiance, even before he was crowned. But he declined, in a modeſt and obliging manner, the receiving that Teſtimony of their Eſteem. He told them, it was not reaſonable, they ſhould ſwear to be faithful to him, before he himſelf had taken a ſolemn Oath to govern them with Equity and according to Law. This Moderation, which charmed all the World, totally effaced the diſadvantagious Impreſſions given by his former Conduct, to thoſe by whom he was not well known.

Stow. T. Livius.

He is crowned. Act. Pub. IX. p. 3. Walſing.

The Ceremony of his Coronation being performed on the 9th of April (1), he granted that very day a general Pardon for all Crimes, except Murders and Rapes. His firſt Proceedings plainly ſhewed the Uprightneſs of his Intentions, and his Reſolution worthily to fill the Throne to which he was raiſed. Before he applied himſelf to the Affairs of the State, he called before him the Companions of his former Riots, and, exhorting them to leave off their lewd Life, diſmiſſed them with liberal Preſents; but withal, ſtrictly charged them, upon pain of incurring his Diſpleaſure, not to preſume to come near the Court. The Aſtoniſhment of theſe Men, who expected quite other things, was as great as the Admiration of the Witneſſes to a Reformation, which afforded ſo pleaſing a Proſpect.

He chuſes a Council. T. Livius. Hall.

After this firſt proof of his Wiſdom, the King continued, without ceaſing, to give many others, which could admit of no doubt. In the firſt place, he choſe for his Council, Perſons of the greateſt Gravity, Abilities, and Repute among his Subjects. Then he removed ſome of the Judges, and advanced ſuch in their room, as to the Knowledge of the Law, joined a perfect Integrity. He did the ſame with regard to inferior Magiſtrates, and took particular Care to fill the vacant Benefices, with Perſons of ſound Principles and known Merit.

He gives Proofs of his Piety.

Nothing remained to confirm the good Opinion already conceived of him, but to diſplay his martial Virtues, and give proofs of his Piety. As to the firſt, he ſhewed, during the whole Courſe of his Reign, that he was ſecond to none of his Predeceſſors, as the Reader will have reaſon to be convinced hereafter. As for his Piety, he ſoon became famous by two ſignal Inſtances. Indeed the firſt might be very ambiguous; but it was conſidered then, as the moſt certain Sign, and beſt proof of the ſincere Intentions of a Prince, to promote the Glory of God: I mean his condeſcenſion for the Clergy, in promiſing to perſecute the Wickliffites or Lollards. The other mark of his Piety, was his Care to repair, as far as lay in his Power, the Injury done to Richard II. He ordered the Body of that Prince to be removed from the Abbey of Langley (2), where it was indecently buried, to Weſtminſter Abbey, and laid by Ann of Luxemburgh his Queen. After performing this Duty, he founded three Religious Houſes near Shene (3), where Richard's Soul was to be prayed for Night and Day.

His kind Parliament. Walſing. Cotton's Abridg.

The Parliament that was called ſome time before (4), met on the 15th of May, well inclined to the new King. Several Statutes were enacted, tending to the Preſervation of the publick Peace, and of the People's Rights and Privileges (5). Henry freely gave his Aſſent to all theſe Statutes, and particularly to an Act to prevent Frauds, in the Elections of Members of Parliament. The Conduct of Richard II, and ſome Attempts of the late King, rendered this Act abſolutely neceſſary (6).

The Clergy debate how to root out Hereſy. Act. Pub. IX. p. 61 ——66. Walſing. Bale.

Whilſt the Parliament was employed in the publick Affairs, the Convocation of the Clergy was ſitting, under the Direction of Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. This Prelate, being extremely incenſed againſt the Lollards, had obtained of the late King an Order, to ſend Commiſſioners to Oxford, to take Informations concerning the Doctrine of the Wickliffites. The Buſineſs of theſe Commiſſioners was to diſcover the chief Abettors of this Hereſy, and how it came to be ſpread in the Kingdom, and particularly in the Dioceſes of London, Hereford, and Rocheſter. At their return, they preſented their Informations to the Archbiſhop, who laid them before the Convocation. After ſeveral Debates, it was reſolved, there was no poſſibility of extirpating the Lollard Hereſy, unleſs care was taken to inflict exemplary Puniſhments on the principal Favourers thereof: That among theſe, Sir John Oldcaſtle Baron of Cobham, was to be deemed the moſt conſiderable and dangerous: That therefore, as a Terror to the whole Sect, their principal Protector ſhould be firſt attacked, and a Proceſs formed againſt him for Hereſy. But as Oldcaſtle was the King's Domeſtick, and in his Favour, it was thought, that Method might give Offence, unleſs the King was acquainted with it beforehand, and his leave deſired to proſecute the Heretick. The Archbiſhop undertaking this Affair, waited on the King with complaints againſt Oldcaſtle. He tried to perſuade him, that Fire and Faggot were the only means of extirpating Hereſy, and that it was abſolutely neceſſary for the Intereſt of Religion, to proceed againſt Oldcaſtle, according to the utmoſt rigour of the Law. The King having calmly heard him, replied, he could never approve of Force in reclaiming Hereticks, and the rather as Experience had but too frequently ſhewn, that rigorous Methods were as effectual againſt Truth, as againſt Error: That he would talk himſelf with Oldcaſtle, and try to reſtore him to the right way, and if he could not ſucceed, would then give leave for a Proceſs againſt him. Mean while, to give the Clergy ſome Satisfaction, he iſſued a Proclamation, forbidding the Lollards to hold any Meetings, and charging his Subjects not to be preſent at their Preachings (7). A few days after, he was pleaſed to talk with Oldcaſtle, and finding him immoveable, no longer oppoſed the Clergy's Requeſt.

The Archbiſhop having obtained the King's leave, ſent a Summons to Oldcaſtle, who refuſing to own the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops, ſlighted the Citation. He would not even ſuffer it to be ſerved upon him; ſo it was fixed upon the great Gates of the Cathedral in Rocheſter. Henry provoked at ſo haughty a Proceeding, ordered him to be apprehended and committed to the Tower. On the 28th of September, the Priſoner was brought before the Archbiſhop, aſſiſted by two other Biſhops and ſeveral Eccleſiaſticks. As they could get no Anſwers from him, but what were directly repugnant to the eſtabliſhed Opinions of thoſe Days, they pronounced him Heretick, and delivered him over to the ſecular Power. His Death would have immediately followed his Condemnation, if by the help of his Friends, or Careleſſneſs of his Guards, he had not found means to eſcape out of Priſon. He went and concealed himſelf in Wales, where his Perſecutors left him not undiſturbed, as will hereafter be ſeen. Theſe are all the remarkable particulars, with regard to Domeſtick Affairs, that happened from the 20th of March 1413, to the end of December, the ſame Year.

I am now going to enter upon the Relation of the War, renewed by Henry V, againſt France: A War which had laſted ever ſince the Breach of the Treaty of Bretigny, though often interrupted by Truces in the late Reigns. In order to give a juſt Idea of this Prince's Motives to carry his Arms into France, it will be neceſſary to repreſent the then State of that Kingdom: Otherwiſe, it would be very difficult to underſtand the Sequel.

Affairs of France.

Charles VI, afflicted with a Diſtemper, which rendered him, moſt part of his time, uncapable of governing, had three Sons, Lewis, John, and Charles. The eldeſt, who bore the Title of Dauphin and Duke of Guienne, was a Prince of an indifferent Character. At ſixteen Years of Age, he had taken to a debauched Life; and moreover, was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with Principles, that led him to arbitrary Power, and carried him into many Exceſſes. His Favorites indulged him in this Courſe of Life, and could not bear that he ſhould be told of a Reformation, by which they would have been ſo great Loſers. On the contrary, to prevent the Execution of a certain Project, formed for the better governing the Kingdom, and approved by an Aſſembly of the chief Men, they inſpired their young Maſter with a Deſire to hold the Reins of the Government himſelf, during his Father's Diſtemper. They intimated to him, that the Duke of Burgundy had ſeized it without any Right, and that none could claim 1413. it to the prejudice of the King's eldeſt Son, ſince he exceeded the Age fixed by the Ordinance of Charles V, for the King's Majority. Upon this foundation, they adviſed him to endeavour to ſupplant the Duke of Burgundy, by ſeizing the Baſtile, in order to hinder the Pariſians from aſſiſting him. This Project was executed ſhortly after, by means of the Governor of that Fortreſs, whom the Dauphin had gained to his Intereſt. But he had not long Reaſon to rejoice at the Succeſs of his Enterprize. Upon the firſt Rumour of it in Paris, the Citizens, privately encouraged by the Duke of Burgundy, took Arms, to the number of ten or twelve thouſand Men. One part inveſted the Baſtile, the other, under the Conduct of a Surgeon, one John de Troye, came before the Dauphin's Palace, who, not expecting this Inſurrection, found no other Remedy but to appear at the Window, to try to appeaſe them; but nothing was able to ſtop them. After breaking open the Doors of the Palace, they ruſhed into the Apartments, and carried away above twenty Perſons, whom they accuſed of corrupting the Prince, and threw them into Priſon. On the other hand, the Governor of the Baſtile, being ſeized with Fear, delivered up the Fortreſs to the Duke of Burgundy, who, in ſpite of the Dauphin's Efforts, continued maſter of the Government. It was during theſe Troubles, which happened in March 1413, that Henry IV died in England, and Henry V, his Son, aſcended the Throne.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 51, &c.

Whilſt the new King was employed in ſettling his Affairs at home, the Troubles were renewed in France. At the end of April, the Seditious took it in their heads to wear white Hoods, as a Badge of Diſtinction. John de Troye, at the head of an armed Mob, brought one to the Dauphin, who durſt not refuſe it. The King himſelf happening to be in the Street, as he was going to the Church of Notre-Dame, was obliged by the Seditious to take a White-Hood. But their Inſolence did not ſtop here. Two days after, their Leader came to the Palace of St. Pol, where the King lodged: There, in preſence of the whole Court, he undertook to juſtify the Impriſonment of the Dauphin's Officers; and added, there were ſtill at Court many more, that equally deſerved to be puniſhed. At the ſame time, without regarding the Intreaties of the Dauphin, or the King himſelf, he ſeized a great Number of Lords and Ladies, and carried them to Priſon. Lewis of Bavaria himſelf, the Queen's Brother, was not ſpared. The King not being able to withſtand the Torrent, was forced to conſent, that ſome of the Priſoners ſhould be proſecuted, and to go to Paris in a White-Hood, to inroll certain Edicts, demanded by the Seditious.

The Dauphin finding himſelf thus checked by the Factious, or rather by the Duke of Burgundy his Father-in-law, their private Director, could not bear to remain in a ſituation ſo contrary to his Temper, without endeavouring to free himſelf. The Heads of the Orleans Faction, who had been forced to ſign a Treaty, which removed them from Paris and the Court, were the only Perſons from whom he could expect any Aid. He contrived therefore a ſecret Negotiation with them, and, the better to hide his Deſign, went and conferred with them in Perſon, under colour of procuring an Agreement between the two Parties, concerning ſome Breaches of the Peace of Bourges. After making a Combination, he ſo managed, that a Peace was confirmed; and by the new Treaty, ſigned at Pontoiſe, the Orleans Party were allowed to come and pay their Reſpects to the King at Paris.

The Duke of Burgundy applies again to Henry. June. Act. Pub. IX. p. 27.

Mean while, the Duke of Burgundy judging, by the Dauphin's former Attempt, what he was to expect from him, had reſolved to ſecure Aſſiſtance, in caſe of Need. To that end, in June he had ſent, as Earl of Flanders, an Embaſſy to England, whereof Ralph, Provoſt of St. Donas of Bruges was chief, under pretence of renewing the Treaty of Commerce between the Engliſh and Flemings; but in reality, to propoſe an Alliance with Henry (1). This appears by the King's Commiſſion, at the ſame time to the Biſhop of St. David's, and the Earl of Warwick, to conclude a perſonal Alliance between him and the Duke of Burgundy. It is hardly to be doubted, that the Duke had then formed a Deſign to make a League with the King of England. We ſhall, hereafter, ſee much plainer Proofs of this matter. This Deſign was not however ſo ſpeedily executed. Probably, the Duke had no other Intent, than to ſecure the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, in caſe he ſhould be preſſed as he was in the Reign of Henry IV. Otherwiſe, he did not think it neceſſary to haſten the concluſion of this Affair. 1413.

July. Ib. p. 34.

Whatever his Deſign was, Henry thought he ſhould not neglect ſo favorable an Opportunity, to foment Troubles in France, of which he might make an Advantage. For that purpoſe, he ſent, ſhortly after, Ambaſſadors (2) to Paris. Their publick Inſtructions were, to preſs the Court of France to obſerve, better than hitherto, the twenty-eight Years Truce. Secondly, to confirm the ſame, or make a new, Truce. Laſtly, they had Power to adjuſt all the Differences between England and France. Very likely, one of the King's Motives, in ſending this Embaſſy, was to be perfectly informed of the Poſture of Affairs in that Kingdom. But his chief Aim was to conclude with the Duke of Burgundy the Alliance propoſed by that Prince. This evidently appears by a fourth Commiſſion, empowering them to ſign an Alliance between him and the Duke, and between their reſpective Dominions. It cannot therefore be doubted, that the Provoſt of St. Donas laid the Foundation of this Negotiation in his firſt Journey to London. This was tranſacted in July 1413.

p. 34.

The next Month produced a great Change in the Affairs of France, much to Henry's Advantage. The Orleans Party, at the head of which were the Duke of Orleans the King's Nephew, the Duke of Berry his Uncle, the Duke of Bourbon, the Duke of Alenſon, the Earls of Eu and Vendôme, were approached Paris, purſuant to the Liberty given them. At the ſame time, the Dauphin, by his Intrigues, had gained great Numbers of the Citizens, who promiſed to aſſiſt him. Whereupon he ordered his Friends to take Arms, and marched about the Streets of Paris, at the head of thirty thouſand Men. The Conſternation of the oppoſite Party was ſo great, that they quitted the Louvre, the Town-Houſe, and the Baſtile, of which they were in poſſeſſion, without offering to make the leaſt Reſiſtance. The Duke of Burgundy perceiving it was not in his Power to reſiſt the Torrent, and dreading, moreover, the Arrival of the Orleans Party, who were not far off, choſe to retire into Flanders.

A new Revolution in the Court of France. Ib. p. 53, 54.

The Duke of Burgundy retires.

No ſooner was he gone, but the Orleans Faction became uppermoſt at Court, without the Dauphin's reaping any Advantage. The King, being then in one of his Intervals, aſſumed the Government, and entertained ſo ſtrong an Affection for the Duke of Orleans his Nephew, that he ſuffered himſelf to be wholly guided by his Counſels. The young Duke improving this Advantage, cauſed divers Edicts to be publiſhed againſt the Duke of Burgundy, and the Authors of the former Sedition to be proſecuted, ſeveral of whom were put to Death.

Edicts againſt him.

Shortly after, the Ambaſſadors of France and England, meeting at Lelingham in Picardy, to negotiate a Peace, agreed (3), that the Truce ſhould be inviolably kept till the 1ſt of June next enſuing (4). During the Negotiation, the Engliſh Ambaſſadors intimated, that the King their Maſter expected, France ſhould reſtore whatever was taken from England, ſince the Treaty of Bretigny. This was in effect the Cauſe of the War, which had ſubſiſted, ever ſince the Violation of that Treaty, and this Demand contained nothing extraordinary. However, the Court of France having flattered themſelves, that after the Death of Edward III, the Kings of England would think no more of proſecuting their Pretenſions, were extremely alarmed at this Declaration. The Poſture of their Affairs made them juſtly apprehenſive of the renewal of the War. So, without loſs of time, were diſpatched to London, the Archbiſhop of Bourges, the Conſtable d'Albret, and Col, one of the King's Secretaries, under pretence of endeavouring to make Peace, but in reality to diſcover Henry's Intentions. Theſe Ambaſſadors arrived at London in October, and could only obtain a Prolongation of the Truce, for what time they pleaſed (5).

The Duke of Burgundy offers his Aſſiſtance to the Dauphin, who accepts of it.

Mean while, the Dauphin receiving no Benefit from the late Revolution at Court, could not behold, without extreme concern, the Duke of Orleans at the head of Affairs, whilſt himſelf was without Credit, and like a Priſoner in the Louvre, where he was narrowly watched. This Conſtraint being inſupportable to a Prince of his Character, he readily liſtened to the Duke of Burgundy's Offer of Aſſiſtance, to place him in the Poſt to which he was entitled by his Birth. They entered therefore into a ſort of League to expel the Duke of Orleans from Court.

He approaches Paris.

The Duke of Burgundy having thus ſecured the Dauphin, approached Paris at the head of an Army, pretending his deſign was to free the Dauphin his Son-in-law from Captivity. He imagined, Paris would declare in his favour, but ſo good order was taken, that nothing ſtirred.

An Edict againſt him.

During theſe Tranſactions, the King, who for ſome time had been in one of his uſual Fits, recovering his Senſes, publiſhed againſt the Duke of Burgundy a thundering Edict, ſtiling him Traitor and Enemy of the State.

He retires.

This Edict, joined to the ſmall hopes that Paris would declare for him, cauſed the Duke to return into Flanders. Let us leave for a moment the Affairs of France, to which we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to return, ſince they are the chief Subject of this Reign, in order to ſee what paſſed in England in the beginning of the Year 1414 (1).

1414. Mention was made in the late Reign of the two Attempts of the Commons, to ſtrip the Clergy of a good part of their Revenues, though without Succeſs. The Clergy could not doubt that theſe Attempts were the fruit of the Doctrine of the Lollards. Probably, this was one of the principal Cauſes of their hatred to theſe pretended Hereticks. For the ſame reaſon, in the late Convocation, they had reſolved to uſe the moſt violent Means, to extirpate a Hereſy, to them ſo deteſtable. Oldcaſtle, a Man of a good Family, and extraordinary Merit (2), was deſtined to be the firſt Victim for a Terror to the whole Sect. But by good fortune he had eſcaped out of the hands of his Enemies. It was with great concern, that the Archbiſhop heard the King ſay, he did not approve of rigorous Methods. He even plainly enough ſhewed it to be his real Opinion, ſince, after Oldcaſtle's eſcape, he took no care to have him purſued and apprehended. It was evident, ſo long as the King was in theſe moderate Sentiments, the Clergy would hardly be able to have their deſire upon the Hereticks. So, it was their Intereſt, that the King ſhould have others, more agreeable to the barbarous Zeal, wherewith Eccleſiaſticks are generally animated. Nothing was more conducive to that end, than to make him believe, the Lollards had a deſign upon his Perſon, and were forming Conſpiracies to over-turn the State. Accordingly, to this the Clergy applied themſelves without loſs of time. The late Proclamation againſt their aſſembling, quickly furniſhed them with a fair opportunity. The Lollards continued their Meetings, notwithſtanding the Proclamation, though with all poſſible Secrecy. As they durſt not aſſemble in Houſes, for fear of being diſcovered, they commonly choſe ſome unfrequented Place in the Country, to worſhip God after their manner. Some of them reſolving to aſſemble, without one of the Gates of London, in a Place called St. Giles's Fields, which was then covered with Buſhes, were, as it often happens on ſuch occaſions, betrayed by falſe Brethren. This diſcovery afforded their Enemies the opportunity they were eagerly ſeeking. The

The King is told twenty thouſand of them were met together.

King was then at Eltham, about ſeven Miles from London, where he deſigned to keep his Chriſtmaſs. He little expected a Conſpiracy againſt his Perſon, when ſuddenly, towards Night, he was told, that Oldcaſtle was in St. Giles's, with twenty thouſand Lollards. It was further ſaid, that their deſign was to kill the King, the Princes his Brothers, and all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal who were not their Friends. Certainly it was very unlikely, that twenty thouſand Men ſhould be able to aſſemble at the very Gates of London, without being obſerved. It was ſtill more improbable, that Oldcaſtle, an experienced Warrior, ſhould chuſe St. Giles's Fields, overgrown as they were with Buſhes and Shrubs, for the Rendezvous of his Troops. Nevertheleſs, the News was confirmed by 1414. ſo many Circumſtances, that the King could not help crediting the Report. He immediately drew together as many armed Men as was poſſible, and ordered the Gates of London to be ſhut, leſt the Populace ſhould go and aſſiſt the Rebels (3). As he was naturally very bold, he reſolved to attack them before they had taken all their Meaſures. He arrived upon the Place about mid-night, and finding about fourſcore, or a hundred Perſons, fell upon them. There were about twenty killed, and ſixty taken. Unhappily, they had brought Arms with them for their Defence, in caſe they were attacked by their Perſecutors. It was this, probably, that helped to convince the King of their ill Deſign. This alone, however, would not have been capable of perſuading him, they had really conſpired againſt him, if among thoſe that were taken, there had not been ſome that, gained by Promiſes, or awed by Threats, confeſſed whatever their Enemies deſired. They ſaid, their Intent was to kill the King, and the Princes his Brothers, with moſt of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal; in the Expectation that the Confuſion, which after ſuch a Maſſacre would enſue in the Kingdom, would prove favorable to their Religion. Some depoſed, that, after the murder of the King and Princes, they intended to make Oldcaſtle Regent of the Kingdom, and that the Conſpiracy was formed by the direction of that Lord. In truth, it is hardly conceivable, how a Prince ſo judicious as Henry, could ſuffer himſelf to be impoſed upon by ſo groſs a Fiction. Indeed, had he found twenty thouſand Men in Arms in St. Giles's, as he was made to believe, it would have been very ſuſpicious. But that fourſcore or a hundred Men, among whom there was not a ſingle Perſon of Rank, ſhould have formed ſuch a Project, is extremely improbable. Beſides, he himſelf knew Sir John Oldcaſtle to be a Man of Senſe, and yet nothing was more wild than the Project fathered upon him; a Project which it was ſuppoſed, he was to execute with a handful of Men, without being preſent himſelf, and without its being known where he was, or that there was any other Leader in his room. But however, the King thought him guilty, and, in that belief, ſet a thouſand Marks upon his Head, with a Promiſe of perpetual Exemption from Taxes, to any Town that ſhould ſecure him (4). It is very likely however, that in time the King perceived the falſhood of this Imputation; and what makes me think ſo, is this: In the firſt place, how ſtrict Inquiry ſoever was made over all the Kingdom, to diſcover the Accomplices of this pretended Conſpiracy, not a ſingle Perſon could be found, beſides thoſe taken at St. Giles's. And yet it is manifeſt, that, to execute ſuch a Deſign to any purpoſe, fourſcore or a hundred Perſons of no great Diſtinction, were not ſufficient. In the next Place, even of thoſe that were taken at St. Giles's, but very few were immediately executed (5), whilſt the Prejudice againſt them was yet in its full ſtrength. The King pardoned all the reſt. Thirdly, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, not only a general Pardon for all the Lollards, but likewiſe ſeveral private Pardons granted to ſome that were condemned, though they had conſtantly denied the Fact. It would not be very ſtrange, that the King ſhould have pardoned Criminals that confeſſed themſelves guilty; but it is unuſual with Sovereigns to forgive ſuch a Crime, in obſtinate Offenders, who render themſelves unworthy of a Pardon, by denying what their Sentence ſuppoſes them convicted of. I add further, that Clemency was not Henry's favorite Virtue, on the contrary, he leaned very much to the ſide of Severity, as will appear by ſeveral Inſtances in his Reign. Is it likely therefore, that he ſhould pardon Perſons convicted of intending to murder him, with all the Royal Family, and great Men of the Kingdom, at the very time they obſtinately perſiſted in denying the Fact, for which they were condemned, had he really believed them guilty? Laſtly, the Principles of the Lollards were very far from allowing ſuch Barbarities. It is therefore more than probable, that this Accuſation was forged, to render the Lollards odious to the King, in order to obtain his Licenſe for their Perſecution, and that the King himſelf was convinced of its falſhood, after his firſt Prejudice was removed. It muſt however be confeſſed, that in all theſe Pardons, he always ſuppoſed the Crime to be proved. But in order to a Pardon, it was neceſſary to take the Crime for granted.

Henry demands the establishment of the Treaty of Bretigny. Act. Pub. IX. p. 102, 103, 149.

I left the Archbishop of Bourges and the Constable d'Albret at London, where they quickly discovered the King's Intentions. The Commissioners who treated with them, demanded in Henry's name, whatever had been taken from England since the Treaty of Bretigny. The French replied, They had no Instructions upon that head. They proposed however, as of themselves, a proper means, in their Opinion, to procure a Peace between the two Kings. This was a Marriage between the King of England, and Catherine the youngest of Charles IV's Daughters. This Princess had four Sisters, of whom one was a Nun, and the other three married. So it was she alone that could be offered to Henry. This Proposal was not wholly rejected. Though Henry should insist upon the Restitution he demanded, as being the speediest and most effectual way to a lasting Peace, what the French Ambassadors offered, not being inconsistent with the Restitution, he thought he might accept it, without any Prejudice to himself. But as the Ambassadors had not sufficient Powers to treat upon this Affair, it was only agreed, that the Truce should be prolonged to the second of February 1415.

Presently after the departure of the French Ambassadors, Henry sent five into France (2), to continue the Negotiation begun at London, concerning the Restitution and Marriage (3). The Ambassadors were impowered to promise, in the King's name, that he would not ingage in any other Marriage-Treaty till the 15th of May. Nay, they might prolong that Term, if it was thought proper.

The Court of France not thinking the Powers of these Ambassadors sufficient, Charles wrote to Henry, that if he would send Ambassadors with fuller Powers, he would readily hear them. Upon this Letter, Henry dispatched five more, all eminent for their Birth and High-Posts; namely, the Bishop of Norwich, the Earls of Dorset, Warwick, Salisbury, and the Lord Grey (4).

Elmham. Walsing.

These Ambassadors entered immediately into Conference with King Charles's Commissioners, the chief of whom was the Duke of Berry his Uncle. They demanded at first the whole Kingdom of France for their Master, by virtue of his Right, as Heir of Edward III. But after a short Pause, they added, that being very sensible their Demand might cause some Disgust, they would make another, with a Protestation however that it should not be prejudicial to the Rights of their Sovereign. Then they limited their Demands to the following Articles:

I. Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, in full Sovereignty.

II. The Right of Sovereignty over the Earldom of Flanders, and Duchy of Bretagne.

III. Whatever France held in Guienne.

IV. All in general that was given up to Edward III, by the Treaty of Bretigny.

V. The whole Country possessed by France between the Somme and Gravelin.

VI. Lastly, That all those Countries should be resigned to the King of England in full Sovereignty, to hold them as Neighbour, and not as Vassal of the Crown of France.

Before an Answer was returned to these Demands, the Duke of Berry earnestly pressed the Ambassadors to begin with the Negotiation of the Marriage, affirming it to be the proper means to settle a solid and lasting Peace between the two Kingdoms. He even offered a very considerable Dowry for the Princess Catherine, but the English would consider the Marriage only as a Consequence, and not as the Foundation of the Peace. For this reason, they insisted upon settling first the Terms of the Peace, before any mention of the Marriage. In fine, after many Disputes on both sides, the English Ambassadors confined themselves to the three following Articles, to which they required a positive Answer, before any other Affairs should be taken in hand.

I. They demanded whatever was given up to England by the great Peace, that is, by the Treaty of Bretigny. 1414.

II. One half of Provence, with the Earldoms of Beaufort and Nogent.

III. The six hundred thousand Crowns, which remained unpaid of King John's Ransom.

As for the Marriage, they said plainly, the King their Master would never espouse the Princess Catherine, unless he was secure of a firm and lasting Peace with King Charles. That besides, as the Offers hitherto made, were very inconsiderable, they had no Power to treat upon that Affair. That therefore it would not only be fruitless to talk of the Marriage, but moreover they durst not meddle with that Article, before the rest were settled. They added however, that in hopes more reasonable Offers would be made, they were willing to speak their Thoughts; that no less could be offered with the Princess, than two Millions of Gold-Crowns.

Some days after, the Duke of Berry delivered them a Writing, containing the Offers of France, in order to a Peace, with the Answers to their Demands; namely,

I. That the King of France offered Agenois, Basadois, Auch in part, Perigord, Escarre, Oleron, Bigorre, Saintonge beyond the Charente, Quercy, (Montauban excepted, with all the Country between the Tarn and the Aveiron,) Angoumois and Rovergne.

II. That the King could not dispose of Provence, since he was not the Possessor, nor had contributed to the putting it in the hands of the present Possessors.

III. That, since for the sake of Peace, he was willing to resign so many fine and rich Provinces, which he lawfully possessed, the King of England ought to desist from any farther Demands.

IV. As for the Marriage, though the Dowry of a Daughter of France was fixed to much less, than was already offered, he would for the sake of Peace, give six hundred thousand Crowns.

These Demands and Answers were the subject of several Conferences, which lasted many days, but of which it would be tedious to relate the particulars. It will suffice to observe that the Ambassadors of England reduced at length all their Demands to the Treaty of Bretigny, and a million of Crowns for the Princess's Portion (5). But as the French still thought this Sum exorbitant, the English intimated, it might be lessened, on the condition, that if two Sons should come of this Marriage, the youngest should have Montreuil and Ponthieu in full Sovereignty. But the French returned no Answer to this, and the Conferences ended March 13th, 1414.

The Duke of Burgundy is driven to great straits. Meeting. Charles wars against him;

Whilst this Affair was negotiating at Paris, the Duke of Burgundy's Enemies continued to stir up King Charles against him, so that considering him as an Enemy to his Person and Government, he resolved to make War upon him. To that end, being determined to command his Army in Person, he went and took the Oriflamme at St. Dennis (6), after which he became master of Soissons and Compiegne, seized by the Duke. Burgundy was then unable to withstand him, because the Flemings refused to serve him against France, which gave the Duke of Bourbon Opportunity of taking Bapaume also. It was not intended to stop there, but happily for him, the King was seized with a fresh Fit of Lunacy. This Accident gave the Duke time to put a strong Garrison into Arras.

King Charles being unable to act, the Dauphin his Son took possession of the Regency, as having an indisputable Right. The Place had been so well provided, that it was not easy to take it. The Difficulties of the Siege, the Sollicitations of the Countess of Hainault the Duke of Burgundy's Sister, and perhaps the Dauphin's private Interests, caused a Peace to be granted to the Duke about the end of September, though upon hard Terms. By the Peace the King granted the Duke a Pardon, but excepted five hundred of his Adherents. It was also a-

During the Preparations in France for the War I am going to ſpeak of, the Duke of Burgundy being greatly embaraſſed, by reaſon of the Obſtinacy of the Flemings, ſent into England the Provoſt of St. Donas to renew the Treaty begun with Henry. This Envoy had Power not only to conclude an Alliance between the King and Duke, but alſo to treat about the King's Marriage with the Princeſs Catherine. In all appearance, the Duke deſired the King's Aſſiſtance to put him in poſſeſſion of the Government of France, and then undertook to accompliſh the projected Marriage to his Benefactor's Satisfaction. This diſcovers what were then that Prince's Deſigns. So that Mezerai juſtly ſaid, the Arms of the Engliſh were drawn into France by the Betrayers of their Country. The Peace of Arras put a ſtop for ſome time to this Negotiation.

Henry tries to take Advantage of the Troubles in France.

Mean while, Henry ſtill continued his Reſolution to improve the Advantages, promiſed by the Situation of the Affairs of France. He perceived he ſhould, at moſt, have to deal but with half the Forces of the Kingdom, and the other half would even make a diverſion in his favour. Beſides, he ſaw a near Proſpect of concluding very ſhortly with the Duke of Burgundy an advantagious Alliance. And therefore, without further delay, he had called a Parliament at Leiceſter for the 30th of April, to have their Approbation of his Deſign, and obtain the neceſſary Aids to accompliſh ſo great an Undertaking. Statutes againſt the Lollards. Raſtal. Stat.

The Parliament being met, the Clergy, ever incenſed againſt the Lollards, moved by their Emiſſaries to revive, and even increaſe, the Statutes againſt Hereticks. But for once their Animoſity had like to have inſnared them. The Project formed by the Commons in the late Reign againſt the Eccleſiaſticks, had twice miſcarried by the exceſſive Deſire of Wickliff's Followers to promote that Affair. The Clergy taking advantage of this Animoſity, intimated to the late King, that ſuch a Motion could not but proceed from Hereticks, with whom the Houſe of Commons abounded, and that it was with the downfal of the Clergy, that the deſtruction of the Catholick Religion was to begin. For this reaſon, Henry IV ſtrongly oppoſed it, and with that haughtineſs as gave great Offence to the Commons. Wherefore, though the Members that were no Friends to Wickliff's Doctrine, joined in the Project, yet they could not hinder the too great Zeal of the Lollards from invincibly obſtructing the Execution. But notwithſtanding its former ill Succeſs, the Projectors had not entirely given it over. They had only reſolved, to take another courſe, to avoid the Inconvenience, which had twice rendered it unſucceſsful. To that end, when a Motion was made in the Houſe of Commons, for new Statutes againſt the Lollards, thoſe who before oppoſed it, readily gave their Conſent (1). The Clergy appeared exceedingly well pleaſed. The Pulpits every where reſounded the Praiſes of the preſent Parliament. It was not a lack-learning Parliament, like that of 1404, but it was the wiſeſt, and moſt zealous for Religion, that was ever aſſembled, ſince the beginning of the Monarchy. The truth is, nothing could be more conformable to the Clergy's Deſires, than the Act paſſed on this occaſion. It was enacted, that all the Magiſtrates of the Kingdom, from the Lord Chancellor, down to the meaneſt Officer, ſhould take an Oath to employ their Power to extirpate Hereticks, and aſſiſt the Biſhops, in the execution of ſo good a Deſign (2). This Act was no ſooner paſſed, but a violent Perſecution was raiſed againſt the Lollards. Several were burnt alive. Some left the Kingdom, and others abjured their Religion, to eſcape the Torments prepared for them.

The Commons petition the King to ſeize the Church-Lands.

But ſhortly after, the Scene was changed, with reſpect to the Clergy. They did not dream that the very Perſons, who lately appeared ſo zealous for Religion, ſhould think of deſtroying it: For that was the Idea they gave, of the Project of depriving the Eccleſiaſticks of the Riches they enjoyed. And yet, the ſame Commons, who in ſo authentick a Way had juſt ſecured themſelves from all Suſpicion of Hereſy, willing to comply with the King's demand of a Subſidy, preſented to him an Addreſs, praying him to ſeize the Clergy's Revenues. This Addreſs was founded upon the ſame Conſiderations, as that preſented to the late King for the ſame purpoſe. It was maintained, that the Revenues of the Church would be much better employed in providing for ſuch a Number of Nobles, Colleges, and Hoſpitals (3). This was a ſtunning Blow to the Clergy, and the more, becauſe after the late Act now in actual Execution, there was not the leaſt colour to repreſent the Commons as Heretical or Favourers of Hereſy. 1414.

The King ſeems to approve of the Petition.

The King himſelf, who was going to begin a great War, believed, or feigned to believe, there was a neceſſity to do what the Commons deſired. As his Revenues would of courſe be greatly increaſed, that Conſideration did not a little induce him to hearken to ſo advantagious a Motion.

The Clergy ſeek to divert the Blow.

The Clergy perceiving their Ruin inevitable, unleſs ſome Remedy was found againſt the gathering Storm, met to conſult about means to avert, or at leaſt to weaken it as much as poſſible. After divers Debates upon ſo important a matter, they came to theſe two Reſolutions. The firſt was, to reſign part of their Riches to the King, in order to ſave the reſt. The ſecond, to divert the King's thoughts from domeſtick Affairs, by engaging him in a foreign War, which might wholly engroſs him. The frequent Embaſſies from Paris to London, and from London to Paris, making them conclude, the King was meditating ſome Enterprize againſt France, they reſolved to excite him to the utmoſt of their Power to carry War into that Kingdom. Purſuant to theſe Projects, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who undertook to be Spokeſman, told him, "That the Motion of the Houſe of Commons, which "ſeemed advantagious to the Crown, was not ſo in rea-"lity: That, in caſe their Project was executed, the "Church's Revenues would be put to Uſes, unprofitable "to the King in particular, and which in time might "be extremely prejudicial to the Sovereign: That by "augmenting the Number and Riches of the Nobility, "as was intended, at the ſame time would be increaſed a "Power which, ever ſince the Foundation of the Mo-"narchy, had all along oppoſed the Sovereigns, and "even brought ſome to deſtruction: That the founding "of Hoſpitals would ſerve only to encourage People in "Idleneſs, when they ſhould ſee ſo many Houſes ready "to receive them, without being obliged to work: But "that the Clergy, more ſincerely well-affected to the King "than the Commons, were very willing to give him, "upon this occaſion, a ſenſible Proof of their Zeal and "Attachment for his Perſon, by delivering up the Alien "Priories, which being in number one hundred and ten, "were poſſeſſed of Lands that would conſiderably increaſe "the Revenue of the Crown: That the Eſtates of theſe "Houſes would be all his own, whereas, if the Project "of the Commons took effect, he would reap no advan-"tage." Whether the King ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by theſe Arguments, or thought it always adviſeable to take what the Clergy voluntarily offered, he accepted of the Propoſal. Whereupon the Lands of theſe Priories were given him by Act of Parliament, without the Clergy's oppoſing it (4).

They come to two Reſolutions.

They offer the King the Lands of the Alien Priories. Hall.

He accepts of the Offer. Act. Pub. IX. p. 283.

Mean while, the Clergy being apprehenſive, that ſooner or later, the King would have what the Commons offered him, ſeriouſly thought of executing the other part of their Project. For that purpoſe, the Archbiſhop took upon him to endeavour to perſuade the King to make War upon France. The King's Character, his late Motions with regard to the Affairs of France, and the univerſal Deſire of the whole Kingdom, put him in hopes, that his Deſign would be crowned with Succeſs. Having therefore prepared a proper Speech, he took occaſion to ſpeak it in Parliament, before the King himſelf.

He began with inſinuating Encomiums of the King's Virtues, ſaying, he was worthy to wear not the Crown of England only, but that of the whole World. Then addreſſing himſelf to the King, he repreſented to him, "That it was not for his Glory, to leave the King of "France in the peaceable Enjoyment of Normandy, An-

(4) Though this Act is not in the Statute Book, it is mentioned among the Patent Rolls, That the Commons conſidered that the Head-Abbeys beyond Sea, poſſeſſing the Lands and Revenues of theſe Alien Priories, great Sums of Money were carried out of the Nation; and they foreſaw, that when the War was begun with France, all the Subjects of England holding Lands in that Kingdom would be diſpoſſeſſed, they therefore made this Act to diſſeize theſe foreign Monaſteries of the Priories alien, and veſt them in the King. One of Panfield in Eſſex, and another of Wells in Norfolk, belonging to St. Stephen's in Normandy, were given to John Wodehouſe, Eſq; to hold by the Preſent of a Roſe to the King, on Midſummer Day. *Rot. 1414. "Join, Touraine, Maine, and part of Guienne; all these Provinces having been wrested from the Kings of England by pure Violence, and on frivolous Pretences. That it was not only to these Countries that he had an indisputable Right, but he might also very justly lay Claim to the whole Kingdom of France, as Heir and Successor of Edward III. Then he largely urged the Reasons which have been related in the Reign of Edward. He talked of the Salic Law as a Chimera, which was built upon no good foundation, and which, being repugnant to the Law of Nature, could not be admitted, though it was as real as imaginary. He asserted, that Pepin the Short, who dispossessed the Family of Meroveus, claimed the Crown, as Heir to Blithilda, Daughter of Clothaire I, and that Hugh Capet, founded his Title upon his being descended from a Daughter of Lewis le Debonnaire. He added, that these Claims, which would have been ridiculous, if the Salic Law had been in force ever since Pharamond, were clear Evidences of its being then unknown. That besides, such a Law would Num. xxvii. be contrary to the Law of God himself, who disposed in a very different manner of the Inheritance of Zelophehad, in favour of his Daughters. That the famous French Civilians had confessed, that the Salic Law was a contradiction, both to the Law of God and Nature (1). In fine, that the glorious Success with which God had crowned the Arms of Edward III, plainly shewed, that God approved not this pretended Law. That if afterwards he permitted that Monarch, and the Prince of Wales his Son, to end their days before they could repair their Losses in France, nothing can be inferred from thence against the Justice of their Rights. That by his Judgments, he was pleased to punish the Sins of the English Nation, but never intended to deprive the Heirs and Successors of Edward, of their just Rights to the Crown of France. That the Interruption of the Prosecution of these Rights, occasioned by the Slothfulness of Richard II, and the Troubles of the late Reign, could not be considered as an entire desisting. That England enjoying at present a happy Tranquillity, under the Government of a Prince endowed with so many excellent Qualities, the relinquishing of these just Pretensions, would be renouncing all the Rules of Prudence and Politicks. That moreover, the Posture of Affairs in France presented an opportunity, which would in vain be sought hereafter. Finally, he exhorted the King to exercise the Talents Heaven had blessed him with, and not remain in an ignoble repose, but prepare, without dreading the difficulties, for so just and glorious a Conquest, which would render him the most powerful Prince in Europe. He closed his Speech with saying, that if the King would be pleased to take in hand so noble an Enterprize, the Clergy would give him a larger Subsidy than was ever granted to any of his Ancestors, and he did not question but the Laity would be of the same mind."

Most Historians pretend, this Speech made such a sudden and wonderful Impression, that Henry immediately resolved to prosecute his Title to the Crown of France. But the forementioned Negotiations upon this subject, plainly shew, this Resolution was already taken, and that the Business at present was, only to obtain the Parliament's Approbation. To this the Archbishop's Speech perhaps greatly conduced. At least, it is certain, the Commons, before they broke up, approved the design, and granted the King a Subsidy of three hundred thousand Marks (2) to begin the Execution thereof. Nay, it is likely, the Archbishop, on this occasion, acted in concert with the King, either to sound the Inclination of the Commons, or to excite them to a War. Be this as it will, this Resolution perfectly corresponding with the Clergy's Project, it is no wonder, the Archbishop so strongly urged the Necessity of a War. And indeed, this Affair was no sooner resolved in Parliament, but the Bill intended against the Clergy fell of its self, People's Minds being otherwise employed (3).

All the rest of this Year was spent in continual Embassies to London or Paris. The French would fain have had Henry's Marriage with the Princess Catherine, to be an equivalent for the greatest part of the Demands of England. This was the Project they had formed, imagining, Henry might be decoyed by the hopes of the Marriage. Henry, on his part, did not reject the Proposal, provided the Marriage was considered only as a Consequence of the Peace, or at least, such Conditions were annexed to it, as should procure him the Restitution of the Provinces lost since the Treaty of Bretigny. He feigned to suffer himself to be amused to a certain degree. He sent Power upon Power to his Ambassadors, to prolong the time of his Engagement. But when the Match was proposed, the same Ambassadors refused to treat, till the Terms of the Peace were agreed upon. This was the subject of all the Negotiations. Mean while, it is certain, both Sides had no other view than to gain time. Henry was too wise, not to perceive that France would never comply with his Demands, before she had received some considerable loss. On the other hand, as there had not been a good while, any great Alteration in England, besides the Accession of a new King to the Crown, the Court of France could not believe, the English were able to support the threatened War. So their sole View was to amuse Henry, till time should cause some Revolution in the Affairs of either Kingdom. Henry proceeded gradually, without being diverted, as there was nothing in his Kingdom capable of giving him any Disturbance. France, on the contrary, was full of Dissensions. Those at the helm, were more careful to support themselves against the opposite Party, than to prevent the King of England's Designs. Nay, it was almost impossible for them to take just measures at such a Juncture. The Dauphin, who had the management of Affairs, was a Prince more hot than able. But though his Capacity had been greater, what could he have done, ingaged as he was between two Factions, which divided the Kingdom, and whereof neither was really attached to his Interest? Besides, neither the Dauphin, nor the Orleans Faction, could imagine, that, after an Intermission for two whole Reigns, the King of England would seriously think of asserting his Right to the Crown of France. We find in the English History, that after Henry had sent the first time to demand the Crown of France, the Dauphin, in derision of his Youth, sent him for a Present a Tun of Tennis-Balls, intimating no doubt, that he thought him fitter for Play, than for War (4); but he was soon of another Opinion. Such was the Disposition of the Court of France, whilst Henry was wholly employed in Preparations to accomplish his designs.

The Dauphin's scornful Present to Henry. Caxton.

The Resolution taken by the Parliament of Leicester, opened the Eyes of those who governed France. They were sensible at length, that Henry was in earnest, and perceived, not without Confusion, that he had made use, to over-reach them, of the same means practised by themselves to amuse him. The Negotiations concerning the Marriage, and the frequent Prolongation of his voluntary Engagement, were only a decoy, to hinder France from preparing for her Defence. This plainly enough appeared in the Parliament's Resolution. Then it was that Charles's, or the Dauphin's Council, thought it time to think seriously of giving Henry some Satisfaction. To that end, Secretary Col was dispatched with fresh Offers, but which were very short of his Pretensions. Before the Parliament of Leicester, Henry had, as one may say, demanded the whole Kingdom of France, but slightly, and to serve as Foundation for his other Demands. But when he found himself supported by his Parliament, he talked at a much higher rate, and seemed unwilling to be satisfied with what he had demanded at first. However, to amuse France, he still pretended to desire the Affair might be determined by a Negotiation. To that end, he readily consented, the Marriage should be treated of, and the Term of his Engagement prolonged to the 15th of August, impowering his Ambassadors, to extend it as much farther as they should judge proper. But all this made him not delay or interrupt his Preparations for War.

Mean while, the Negotiation with the Duke of Burgundy still continued, whilst that Prince was most pressed by his Enemies. In the Month of June, Henry sent to him Philip Morgan, a Person of great Abilities, whom he always imployed in the most important Negotiations. Morgan's publick Instructions were only to renew the Truce with the Flemings. But the Choice of this Ambassador, and the Mission of Copin de la Vieuville into England, from the Duke (5), with the Circumstances of the time, are plain Evidences, those goings and comings,

The gaining of that Prince to his Intereſt was very material to Henry. A fairer Opportunity could not offer, ſince it was at a time when the Court of France ſhewed no regard for him. But he demurred, it ſeems, upon making ſo extraordinary a Step, and was unwilling to have recourſe to Henry, without an abſolute Neceſſity. In all theſe Negotiations were ſpent the Year 1414.

1415. Act. Pub. IX. p. 183, 187, 196, 197, 205. 219, 220. In the beginning of the next Year, Henry conſented to a Prolongation of the Truce, to the firſt of May. Mean while, the Court of France, alarmed at the great Preparations in England, ſent again the Archbiſhop of Bourges, with eleven more Ambaſſadors. Probably the Archbiſhop made ſome new Offer to Henry, but which was not conſiderable enough to content him. All he could obtain was, a farther prolongation of the Truce, to the 8th of June.

The Truce prolonged again, p. 225.

Whilſt theſe Ambaſſadors were at London, the King aſſembled (1) the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, at leaſt as many as were within diſtance. When they were met, he acquainted them, by the Biſhop of Winchester his Uncle, and Lord Chancellor, with his Reſolution, of going in Perſon, and carrying War into France, in order to recover the Inheritance of his Anceſtors. This Declaration ſeemed needleſs, ſince the great Men had been ſufficiently informed of his deſign. But probably, his Intent was, to oblige the French Ambaſſadors to diſcover at once what they had to propoſe, he imagining they ſtill kept back part of their Inſtructions. The preſent Poſture of Affairs in France made him hope, they would offer to put Things upon the foot of the Treaty of Bretigny. If ſo, he would doubtleſs have been ſatisfied with ſo conſiderable an Advantage, tho' he had, for ſome time, laid claim to the whole Kingdom of France. The Archbiſhop of Bourges, no longer queſtioning the King's deſigns, told him, he wanted to go to France for freſh Inſtructions; upon which Henry conſented the Truce ſhould be again prolonged to the 15th of July. The ſame Prelate being returned to England, a few days before the Expiration of the Truce, added ſomething more to the former Offers; but it was to no purpoſe. Nothing was capable of ſatisfying Henry, but the Treaty of Bretigny. The Archbiſhop demanded his Anſwer in writing, and the King ordered it to be given him immediately. Some add, that the Archbiſhop ſeeing all Ceremony was at an end, upbraided the King, that, not content with a Crown unjuſtly wreſted from Richard II, by his Father, he would invade that of France to; but he ſhould find it more difficult than he imagined.

Every thing being ready for the Departure, Henry ordered all his Troops to repair immediately to Southampton, where they were to embark, and went thither himſelf to give orders, as the Troops and Tranſports arrived. Whilſt he was thus employed, he gave freſh Powers to Philip Morgan, to conclude a Treaty of Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy. This ſhews, that the Duke, who was ſtill at the Court of France, held private Intelligence with Henry, and had, probably, conduced very much to ingage him in this Undertaking. Their Treaty however was not concluded till two Years after.

Henry embarks his Troops, and continues his Negotiation with the Duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub. IX. p. 304. Walſing.

Henry was preparing to depart about the end of July, or beginning of Auguſt (2). Moſt part of his Troops were now embarked, when he had notice of a Conſpiracy againſt his Perſon, formed by thoſe, whom he thought to have had leaſt Reaſon to ſuſpect. If we believe the Engliſh Hiſtorians, the Court of France dreading the Succeſs of the War, had employed a vaſt Sum of Money to bribe Men to kill the King. They mount this Sum to a Million of Livres, which is no wonder, conſidering the Quality of the Perſons concerned in the Plot; namely, Richard Earl of Cambridge, Brother of the Duke of York, Henry Scrope Lord Treaſurer, who commonly lay in the ſame Room with the King, and Thomas Grey a Knight of Northumberland, and Privy-Counſellor (3). It is not very certain however, that they had a deſign upon the King's Life; at leaſt the Earl of Cambridge's Confeſſion, extant in the Collection of the publick Acts, contains nothing like it. It only appears, that they had conſpired to ſet the Earl of March at their head, and conduct him where they hoped to raiſe an Army, by making uſe of the Name of Richard II, as if he were ſtill alive. That, if they could not deceive the People by a Means ſo frequently practiſed, their Intent was to publiſh a Manifeſto in the name of the Earl of March, inviting the People to reſtore that Prince to his Rights, uſurped by the Houſe of Lancaſter. As they could not make uſe of the Earl of March's Name, without having him in their Power, or at leaſt in their Party, they could not help informing him of the Plot. The Earl was greatly embarraſſed, when the Secret was told him. A Crown, which he believed to be his lawful Right, was worth the Pains of running ſome risk to obtain it. But on the other hand, he was ſatisfied, the Conſpirators acted not from a Motive of Juſtice or Affection for his Perſon. Beſides, the Uncertainty of the Iſſue could not but diſcourage him. Mean while, he was preſſed very earneſtly to enter into the Conſpiracy. In ſhort, not being able to reſolve immediately, he deſired time to conſider of ſo important an Affair; and it was with great Difficulty, that he obtained the reſt of that Day. During this Interval, he made ſuch Reflections, as induced him to acquaint the King with the whole. Henry, ſurprized at the News, immediately ordered the Conſpirators to be ſeized, who, confeſſing their Guilt, were condemned and executed. The Earl of Cambridge and Sir Thomas Grey were beheaded; but the Lord Scrope ſuffered the uſual Puniſhment of Traitors. This was as it were the firſt Spark of that Flame, which conſumed, in proceſs of time, the two Houſes of Lancaſter and York. As the Earl of Cambridge had married a Siſter of the Earl of March, very likely, he had engaged in the Plot, with a view to procure the Crown for Richard his Son, preſumptive Heir of that Earl, who had no Children.

This Affair detaining Henry at Southampton longer than he imagined, he could not ſail till the 18th, or 19th, of Auguſt. His Fleet conſiſted of fifteen hundred Tranſport-Ships, on which were embarked ſix thouſand Men at Arms, and twenty thouſand Archers (4) making in all, an Army of about fifty thouſand Men. He was attended by the Earls of Dorſet, Kent, Cornwal, Salisbury, Huntingdon, with many other Nobles. On the 21ſt of Auguſt, he landed his Troops (5) at Havre de Grace in Normandy, and without loſs of time, marched to Harfleur, about nine Miles diſtant. That Place was ſtrong and well-ſtored. A little before, four hundred Men at Arms were ſent thither, beſides a great number of neighbouring Nobles, who voluntarily came there. The Garriſon made a vigorous Defence, but however, in a ſhort time were forced to capitulate, and promiſe to ſurrender the Place, unleſs relieved within three days. The Term being expired, and no Relief come, Henry took poſſeſſion of the Town (6), and expelling the Inhabitants, planted an Engliſh Colony in their room, as Edward III had formerly done at Calais (7).

This Place being of the utmoſt Importance, Henry would not depart, till it was entirely repaired, and put in a good ſtate of Defence. In the mean while, he ſent a written Challenge to the Dauphin, offering to decide all their Differences by a ſingle Combat between their two Perſons. Theſe differences, according to the King's Notion, concerned no leſs than the whole Kingdom of France. If he directed himſelf to the Dauphin, it was becauſe of his Father's Diſtemper, which rendered him uncapable of accepting ſuch a Challenge. But as it was not in the Dauphin's Power, to hazard, in a ſingle Combat, the Crown of France, which did not belong to him. Henry offered, in caſe he was Conqueror, to let King Charles enjoy it during his Life. Moreover, he proteſted, this Propoſal came wholly from himſelf, without any Suggeſtion from his Council, or Family; and therefore, he pretended, it could not be prejudicial to his Rights, or thoſe of his Succeſſors. Ill State of the Engliſh Army. Waſſing. T. Livius. Elmham.

The Conqueſt of Harfleur might have rendered Henry ſatisfied with the Succeſs of his firſt Campaign, begun a little too late, if, on the other hand, the ill State of his Army had not exceedingly troubled him. The Flux, which was got amongſt his Troops, had made, and ſtill did make, ſuch Ravage, that not above the fourth Part of his Army were able to bear Arms. This Diſtemper had not ſeized the common Soldiers only, but even the moſt conſiderable Perſons were not free from it. The Biſhop of Norwich, and the Earl of Suffolk (1), were already dead of it. The Duke of Clarence the King's Brother, the Earl of Arundel (2), and ſeveral other Officers of Diſtinction, were ſo dangerouſly ill, that they were obliged to return to England, in hopes of a Cure.

The French draw together an Army. T. Livius.

At the ſame time, Henry learned from all Parts, that the French were aſſembling their Forces with great diligence, to give him Battle. Till the taking of Harfleur, the King of France ſeems not to have believed, the King of England ſeriouſly intended to wage War, ſince they had made no Preparations for their Defence. But after the loſs of ſo important a Place, King Charles's Council eaſily perceived, it was neceſſary to aſſemble all the Forces of the Kingdom, to ſtop the Progreſs of an Enemy, who began to be very formidable. The great Armament France was preparing, the ill State of the Engliſh Army, and the Approach of Winter, obliged Henry to think of retreating. He might, it ſeems, have re-imbarked at Harfleur; but, whether he thought it would look too much like a Flight, or foreſaw not all the Obſtacles he afterwards encountered, or for ſome other unknown Reaſon, he reſolved to retire by Land to Calais.

Difficulties of the March. Walſing. T. Livius. Hall.

The March he undertook was difficult, at a Seaſon when the Rains began to ſpoil the Roads. But it became much more ſo by unexpected Accidents. The French having foreſeen, or heard of his Deſign, ſpeedily broke down the Bridges, and Cauſeways in his Rout, and deſtroyed, or removed into the fortified Towns, the Proviſions and Forage that he might have found in the Country. On the other hand, the Conſtable d'Albret, with a Body of Troops drawn together, whilſt the reſt were preparing, continually harraſſed the Engliſh, and conſtrained them to march very cloſe, and to be always upon their Guard. All theſe Difficulties hindered their advancing ſo ſpeedily as was neceſſary, to free themſelves from their ill Situation.

He is not able to paſs the Somme. T. Livius.

Amidſt all theſe obſtacles to his March, Henry proceeded along the Somme, in expectation of paſſing that River at the Ford of Blanchetaque, as Edward III had done the day before the Battle of Creſſy. But when he came there, he found that Paſs rendered impracticable by ſharp Stakes fixed in the River, and defended moreover by a Body of Troops (3), poſted on the oppoſite Bank. He was extremely concerned to find his Project could not be executed. It was neceſſary however, either to paſs the Somme, or reſolve to return to Harfleur, through the ſame Difficulties he had already been expoſed to, and even without knowing, when he came there, how to ſubſiſt his Army. In this Extremity, he determined to march higher up the River, even to its Source, though it was much out of his way. As he advanced, he every where found the Bridges broken down, and the Fords guarded by Troops, intrenched on the other Side.

He reſolves to go to the Fountain-Head. Elmham.

The Army ſuffers much in the March. T. Livius.

As in ſo ill a Situation, there was no other Remedy but Patience, Henry took all poſſible Care to inſtil it into his Troops, by taking his ſhare of the Wants and Hardſhips they laboured under. It is eaſy to perceive, theſe Hardſhips were not proper to ſtop the Courſe of their Diſtemper, and that on the contrary, great numbers fell ſick in their March. At laſt, to compleat his Misfortune, Henry heard, that the King of France was come to Roan, and had ſent to the Conſtable fourteen thouſand Men at Arms, with all the Princes and great Lords of the Kingdom, except the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy. The Dauphin was deſirous of commanding the Army, but the King would not give him leave. The Conſtable, who had alſo drawn together many other Troops, receiving ſo ſtrong a Reinforcement, called a Council of War, where it was unanimouſly reſolved to give the Engliſh Battle. But as the French Generals thought themſelves ſure of Victory, conſidering the Superiority of their Forces, they judged it proper, inſtead of continuing to guard the Somme, to let the Engliſh Army paſs, and to poſt themſelves on the Road to Calais. This Reſolution being taken, they went and expected their Enemies in the Earldom of St. Pol, in order to draw them over the Somme, into a Place where they ſhould not be able to turn back.

They go and expect the Engliſh in the Road to Calais.

It is certain, that by paſſing the River, Henry ran into manifeſt Danger, ſince there was no Mean between conquering and periſhing. It is true, he might have returned to Harfleur, but I cannot tell whether that was leſs hazardous, conſidering the Difficulties he muſt have encountered, and which he had not, without infinite Trouble, ſurmounted. Wherefore it is a queſtion, in my opinion, hard to be decided, whether a Battle was more dangerous than a Retreat. Be this as it will, it is to be preſumed, he choſe what to him ſeemed leaſt diſadvantagious, in continuing his March along the Somme (4), with a Reſolution to face the danger that waited on the other Side. As the Paſſages were no longer defended, he found one between St. Quintin and Peronne, where he cauſed his Army to paſs (5). But though this Obſtacle, which had hitherto ſeemed the greateſt, was removed, the Engliſh Army found themſelves in no better Condition. That of their Enemies, ſix times more numerous, expected them upon their Paſſage; whom there was a neceſſity of vanquiſhing, in order to open a way to Calais. The French Hiſtorians affirm, that Henry ſeeing himſelf in this ſad ſituation, offered to reſtore Harfleur, and repair all the Damages he had cauſed in France ſince his Landing, if he might be ſuffered to proceed unmoleſted; but that his offer was rejected. On the contrary, the Conſtable and Princes that were in the French Army, ſent three Heralds to offer him Battle, leaving him to chuſe the Time and Place. Henry replied, "As he had long "been upon his March to Calais, they might have "fought him when they pleaſed, and if they intended "it, there was no occaſion to appoint the Time, or "Place; for he was reſolved to purſue his March, "and they ſhould always find him ready to receive "them."

His Anſwer, Elmham.

The French Army being poſted on his Rout, it was not poſſible to paſs without fighting. He reſolved therefore to prepare for a Battle. On the 22d of October, the French Generals ſent him word by a Herald, that on Friday following (6), they would give him Battle. Henry, who had already taken his Reſolution, accepted the Challenge, and preſented the Herald with a Robe worth two hundred Crowns (7). During the three days before the Battle, Henry never ceaſed to inſpire his Troops with Courage, by the promiſe of Rewards and Honours, and by all other means moſt conducive to that end. He repreſented to them the Glory of their Anceſtors, who obtained the famous Victories of Creſſy and Poictiers, and demonſtrated to them the Neceſſity of conquering, in order to free themſelves from their preſent, and avoid ſtill greater, Miſeries. His Exhortations wrought ſo wonderful an Effect, that the Officers and Soldiers, far from dreading the great Number of their Enemies, were extremely eager to engage. The day before the Battle, Henry having ſent David Gam, a Welſh Captain, to view the ſtrength of the Enemy, this brave Officer gallantly reported, there are enough to be killed, enough to be taken Priſoners, and enough to run away. This Aſſurance pleaſed the King, as being a Sign, that his Troops were firmly reſolved to do their Duty. Mean while, the French preſuming on their Numbers, and confident of Victory, were making rejoicings in their Camp. Mezerai owns, that they were four times Superior to the Engliſh (8). Monſtrelet ſays, ſix times (9). This Diverſity may partly proceed from Mezerai's reckoning all the Soldiers, ſick and well, of the Engliſh Army, and from Monſtrelet's meaning only ſuch as were able to fight. The Engliſh Hiſtorians make the Difference between the two Armies much greater, affirming, the French amounted to one hundred and fifty thouſand, and the Engliſh but to nine thouſand. Be this as it will, it is certain the Superiority of the French was very great. But what Inequality ſoever there was between the two Armies, as to Number, there was another, which was no leſs conſiderable, with regard to the different State they were in. The Engliſh, ſick, for the moſt part, of a Flux, with which they had been troubled, ever ſince their Departure from Harfleur, were moreover harraſſed with a tedious march of a Month, in very bad Weather, and through an Enemy's Country. They had all along been in want of Proviſions, and would doubtleſs have been all ſtarved, if the exact Diſcipline the King cauſed to be obſerved, had not engaged the Country-People to ſupply them with Victuals, for the ſake of ſelling them at an extravagant Rate. The French, on the contrary, were freſh and healthy, abounding with Proviſions, and labouring under no Inconveniency. If we may believe the Engliſh Hiſtorians, ſo confident of Succeſs were the French Leaders, that they ſent to the King to know what he would give for his Ranſom. Henry deſpiſing this Bravado, replied, acc ording to the ſame Authors, that a few Hours would ſhew whoſe care it would be to provide a Ranſom.

The two Armies are drawn up in order of Battle.

Blunder of the Conſtable. J. le Fevre. Walſing. Elmham.

On the 25th of October, the day appointed for the Battle, the two Armies were drawn up as ſoon as it was Light. The Conſtable D' Albret committed on this occaſion an unpardonable Fault, in chuſing for the Field of Battle a narrow Ground, flanked on one ſide by a Rivulet, and on the other by a large Wood. He thereby loſt all the Advantage, which the Superiority of Number, and eſpecially in Horſe, could give him: It is moſt certain, this General ought to have poſted himſelf in a large and open Place, where he might have had it in his power to ſurround the Engliſh, who were but a handful of Men, in compariſon of his Army. But by drawing up on ſo narrow a Ground, he was forced to make a Front no larger than that of the Enemies, and thereby deprived himſelf of a very manifeſt Advantage. Neither can it be ſaid, that the Choice of the Field of Battle was not entirely in his Breaſt. As the Engliſh were marching for Calais, it was his Buſineſs to expect them on a ſpacious Plain, capable of containing his whole Army, and where they might have all fought at once. His Blindneſs therefore is aſtoniſhing, and can be aſcribed only to his Preſumption. He ſeems to have intended to ſtop up that narrow Paſſage, that the Engliſh might not proceed, without conſidering ſuch a Precaution can be only advantagious to the Weakeſt. I have dwelt a little upon this Error, as it was, probably, the principal Cauſe of the unfortunate Succeſs of the French in this Action. The Conſtable, blinded by the Number of his Troops, drew them up, as I ſaid, on this narrow Ground, but ſo cloſe, that it was eaſy to foreſee, Confuſion would enſue during the Battle. He divided his Army into three Bodies, the firſt of which he commanded himſelf, with the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Eu, Vendôme, Richemont, the famous Marſhal Boucicaut Grand Maſter of the Croſs-Bow-Men, the Lord Dampier Admiral of France, the Dauphin of Auvergne, and ſeveral other Officers of the greateſt Diſtinction. All theſe Princes and Lords thought themſelves happy in being in the firſt Line, perſuaded as they were, that the other two would have nothing to do. The Duke of Alenſon commanded the ſecond Body, with the Duke of Bar, the Earls of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, Rouſſi, and Grand-Pré. At the head of the third Line, were the Earls of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenbergh, and the Lord de Lauroi.

Precaution taken by the King before the Battle. Des Urſins. Walſing.

Whilſt the French were drawing up, Henry detached a Body of four hundred Lances, to go and poſt themſelves out of Sight of the Enemy, behind the Wood, on the left of the Field of Battle. He lodged, moreover, two hundred Archers in a low Meadow, fenced with Buſhes on the right. In drawing up his Army, he could make but two Lines, by reaſon of the ſmall Number of his Troops. Edward Duke of York commanded the firſt, aſſiſted by the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope (1). The King put himſelf at the head of the Second (2), with a Gold Crown (3) on his Helmet for a Creſt, and near him was the Standard of England (4). In this Poſture he expected the French would advance to attack him (5). Mean time, riding along the Front of his Battalions, he exhorted the Troops not to fear a multitude of raw and undiſciplined Soldiers. He repreſented to them, that Victories depended not on Numbers but on bravery, and above all, on the Aſſiſtance of God, in whom he admoniſhed them to place their whole Truſt. In fine, perceiving the French did not move, he ſent for ſome of his principal Officers, and ſaid to them with a chearful Countenance, "Since our Enemies have "intercepted our way, let us proceed, and break through "them in the Name of the Holy Trinity." Upon theſe words he gave the Signal of Battle (6). Immediately the Soldiers of the foremoſt Ranks, removing the Stakes, which had been ſet on the Front, to reſiſt the Fury of the Cavalry (7), the whole Army, with a mighty Shout, moved forward. After advancing a little, they made a halt, expecting their Enemies, but finding they did not ſtir, continued their March in good Order. When they came within Bow-Shot, the foremoſt Ranks fixed the Stakes, interweaving, and bending them a little towards their Enemy. At the ſame time, a Body of choſen Archers advancing ſome Paces, began, very near, to let fly upon the Enemy a ſhower of Arrows a Yard long, which being ſhot by Men of dexterity and ſtrength, did the greater execution among the French, as they ſtood extremely cloſe, and had ſcarce room to move. The French Cavalry advancing at length to repulſe the Archers, theſe laſt nimbly retreated behind the Stakes with a wonderful Diſcipline, in which the King had exerciſed them himſelf for ſome days. Mean while, the two hundred Bow-men, concealed in the Meadow, riſing up on a ſudden, plied the Horſe with their Arrows, who were put in the greater Diſorder, as the Horſes ſunk up to their Knees in the Ground ſoftned with the Rains. The Engliſh ſeeing this Confuſion, threw away their Bows, and fell upon their Enemies Sword in hand. The Engliſh, it is ſaid, were, for the moſt part, forced to fight naked from the Waſte downwards, by reaſon of their Diſtemper. However, as the firſt Line of the French conſiſted of all the beſt Troops in their Army, this Charge, though very vigorous, was repulſed with ſome Loſs on the ſide of the Engliſh. But, that was not capable of diſheartening Men, determined to conquer or die. After breathing a while, they charged again with ſuch Reſolution, that it was not poſſible for their Enemies to ſtand the Shock. This ſecond Attack was the more difficult to be repulſed, as at the ſame time the French felt themſelves ſet upon in the Flank by the Engliſh Horſe, ambuſhed behind the Wood. Then it was, that the utmoſt Diſorder enſued among the Troops, ſo vigorouſly preſſed by their Enemies, who ſlew without mercy whoever came in their way. The firſt Line of the French at length taking to Flight, (after ſeeing the Conſtable killed, with a great number of other Officers, and moſt of the Princes and Generals made Priſoners,) the Engliſh found themſelves ſtopped by the ſecond Line, which came to repair the Diſorder.

Their Diſorder increaſing, by reaſon of their great Numbers, and want of room, they began at length to fight only in retreat, in ſuch a manner, as ſhewed they would quickly take to Flight.

Monſtrelet. Paradin.

The Duke of Alenſon, enraged to ſee the Battle loſt by the Defeat of the ſecond Line, and deſpairing that the third would be able to reſtore the Fight, generouſly reſolved to die honourably, rather than turn his Back, and ſurvive his Country's Diſgrace. So, regardleſs of a Life he was determined to loſe, with a ſmall Number of brave and reſolute Perſons, he furiouſly made way with his Sword through the Engliſh Troops, and every where ſought the King of England, in expectation of revenging, by one ſingle Blow, the Loſs, France had that day ſuſtained. It was not difficult to find Henry, who thought of nothing leſs than concealing himſelf. The Moment the Duke ſaw him, he ran at him, and crying out that

In an Inſtant, the Duke was ſurrounded by a Crowd of Enemies, who put an end to his Life, notwithſtanding the King's Endeavours to ſave him. The Death of the Duke of Alenſon, entirely diſcouraging his Troops, they openly took to Flight.

The third Line of the French retreats without fighting. Monſtrelet.

The third Line of the French, being ſtill freſh and in good order, might have renewed the Battle. But their Hearts failing at the Sight of the preſent and paſt Slaughter (2), it was not in the Power of the Leaders to make them advance. So, finding themſelves reduced to a Neceſſity of retreating without fighting, they left the flying Troops of the ſecond Line, expoſed to the Fury of their Enemies, who cloſely purſued them. Then it was that the Engliſh, having nothing to do, but to kill, and take Priſoners, exerciſed Pity or Cruelty, according as every one was naturally inclined. As it was impoſſible for the French in their preſent diſorder, to rally, and as their Numbers were an Obſtacle to their Flight, they voluntarily offered themſelves to Death or Captivity, as their victorious Enemies pleaſed. Mean while, the Troops, that retired without fighting, ſtill appeared at ſome diſtance, and ſeemed reſolved to ſtand againſt Enemies harraſſed with ſo long a Battle. But the King perceiving they were ſtill more numerous than his Army, commanded them by a Herald to leave the Field, or he would give them no Quarter. This Menace ſucceeded according to expectation. Whether theſe Troops were not fully reſolved of their Courſe, or were apprehenſive of falling into the hands of an implacable Enemy, in caſe they ſhould prove unſucceſsful, they retired, and left Henry maſter of the Field of Battle.

Finding himſelf thus ſecure of the Victory, Henry thought, he had nothing more to do, when ſuddenly word was brought him, that the Enemies were in his Rear, and had already plundered his Camp. Surprized at this unexpected Accident, he haſtily ran to the Top of a Hillock, between the Army and the Camp, to review theſe new Enemies. He really ſaw great diſorder among his Baggage, and ſaw the Troops left to guard the Camp diſperſed about the Field, and endeavouring to ſave themſelves by Flight. Imagining, by this Sight, that the Enemies had rallied to renew the Fight, he proclaimed, that the Priſoners ſhould be ſlain, except the moſt eminent. This Order being immediately executed, he ſpeedily rallied his Troops, and marched directly to the Enemies, who took care not to expect him. They were only a Company of Run-aways, headed by Robert de Bournonville (3), who retiring betimes out of the Battle, and knowing the Engliſh Camp was but weakly guarded, pillaged it, whilſt the two Armies were engaged. The Duke of Burgundy afterwards would have ſeverely puniſhed the Captain of theſe Plunderers, who was his Subject, for being the occaſion of ſo great a Diſaſter, but the Earl of Charolois his Son found means to ſave his Life. It is ſaid, the Earl was preſented with a Sword, ſet with Diamonds, found among the King's Baggage. It is pity ſo glorious a Victory was ſullied by this raſh Maſſacre. It may however be excuſed, by the impoſſibility of the Engliſh being able to guard their Priſoners (4), and by the King's juſt Fears, that theſe ſame Priſoners would turn againſt him, during the Fight, which he ſaw himſelf upon the point of renewing.

The Troublet are renewed in France.

The Wound France had received, was not ſo great, on account of the Advantages reaped by the King of England from his Victory, which gained him not a ſingle Foot of Land, as for being the Occaſion of the Civil War's rekindling with more Fury than ever. The Duke of Burgundy reſolving to improve the preſent Juncture, claimed the Adminiſtration of Affairs, from which he had been long excluded, and particularly, by the Peace of Arras. He alledged, that when the Kingdom was threatned with utter Ruin, a Prince of the Blood, firſt Peer, and doubly Peer of the Realm, was indiſpenſably bound to aid the King with his Counſels, and could not be debarred the Court, without Injuſtice and Danger. But as he well knew his Reaſons would be ineffectual, unleſs ſupported by force, he approached Paris with an Army, and ſeized ſome Poſts about the City. The Dauphin, not being able to bear the Thoughts of admitting to Court the Duke of Burgundy, though his Father-in-law, ſent for the Earl of Armagnac, and gave him the Conſtable's Sword.

The Earl of Armagnac made Conſtable.

This Earl, ſworn Enemy of the Duke of Burgundy, did not ſpare the Duke's Adherents, commonly called the Burgundians. He ordered ſome to be hanged, and great Numbers to be impriſoned, and thereby ſo heightened the Animoſity of the two Factions, that from thenceforward nothing was capable of uniting them againſt the common Enemy. The Dauphin ſeconded the Conſtable's Revenge, and never thought of reſtoring the ruinous Affairs of the Kingdom, the Government whereof was in his hands. Shortly after, namely, on the 24th of December, this Prince was poiſoned.

He perſecutes the Burgundians.

1415. The Dauphin poiſoned.

By the Death of Lewis, the new Conſtable remained ſole Maſter of the King's Perſon, and of the Government of the Kingdom, till the return of John Duke of Tourain, to whom the Title of Dauphin was devolved, and who was then in Hainault with the Earl his Father-in-law. This young Prince reſolving to eſpouſe neither Side, ſent Orders to both Factions to lay down their Arms. The Duke of Burgundy, who was loſing his Time before Lagny, obeyed, out of deference, as he pretended, to the Dauphin's Orders, and retired into his Dominions. But the Conſtable was not ſo tractable. As he had the King's Perſon in his Power, he did not think the Dauphin had any Right to command him, till actually poſſeſſed of the Regency, which he was bent to oppoſe, unleſs he would declare againſt the Burgundians. It was this that hindered the Dauphin's return to Court.

Is oppoſed by the Conſtable.

All this while, it was next to impoſſible for France, to take juſt meaſures for her Defence againſt the Attacks threatned from England. The Duke of Burgundy was privately treating with Henry. The Earl of Hainault was likewiſe courting that Monarch, to put the Dauphin, his Son-in-law, in poſſeſſion of the Regency. On the other hand, Lewis of Anjou, King of Sicily, then head of the Orleans Faction, was projecting to deprive the Dauphin of his Birth-right, by procuring the Crown for Charles Earl of Ponthieu his Son-in-law. To compaſs his Ends, he thought he could take no certainer Method, than to ſecure the Aſſiſtance of England. Thus all France, as it were with one Conſent, though with different Views, earneſtly ſought the Alliance of the Engliſh, againſt whom the whole Nation ſhould have firmly united, if private Intereſt had not prevailed above the Good of the Publick. In this manner paſſed the Year 1415, which the Battle of Azincourt has rendered memorable for ever.

Henry is applied to by both Parties. Act. Pub. IX. p. 328, 331, 332, 352, 354. Ib. p. 337, 384, 387, &c.

1416. The Conſternation France was under, and the Diſcord between the Duke of Burgundy and the Conſtable, ſeemed to promiſe Henry freſh Laurels, if he had continued the War. Nevertheleſs, that Prince, whoſe Wiſdom equalled his Valour, very prudently ſteered a quite different Courſe. He judged, that by fomenting the Troubles of France, and inſpiring the two Factions with Jealouſy, he ſhould procure more certain and laſting Advantages, than by means of his Arms. The truth is, by puſhing the French too vigorouſly, he ran the riſk of uniting them all againſt him. In which caſe, his Advantages, probably, would have been inconſiderable. But by granting them ſome Reſpite, he gave them opportunity to deſtroy one another. Wherefore, contrary to every one's Expectation, he laid aſide his Military Affairs for near eighteen Months, and betook himſelf entirely to Negotiation, which afforded him the Proſpect of leſs doubtful Advantages. He continued not however in a ſtate of Idleneſs. The Particulars of what paſſed in 1416, and part of the Year following, will ſhew, how attentive he was to the Execution of his Projects.

1416. Henry purpoſes to gain the Duke of Burgundy.

Henry's chief Aim was to gain the Duke of Burgundy, who had now ſhewn an Inclination to make an Alliance with him. The ſucceeding in this deſign, he perceived, would be more advantagious, than another Azincourt-Victory. To this therefore all his Endeavours tended, as to his principal Affair. To attain his Ends, it was neceſſary, that the Affairs of France ſhould remain in their preſent Situation. It was requiſite, the Conſtable, and the other Heads of that Faction, ſhould ſtill have it in their Power to perſecute the Duke of Burgundy. This alone was capable of throwing that Prince into a deſperate Reſolution, which he beheld not without dread, and which the ſole deſire of Revenge could induce him to take. If by the Continuance of the War France had loſt Towns and Battles, the Conſtable, who held the Reins of the Government, would, doubtleſs, have forfeited all his Credit. By that means, the Duke of Burgundy would have infallibly obtained the Regency again, and no longer ſtood in need of the Engliſh. This is the true reaſon of Henry's conſenting to all the Propoſals for concluding a Truce, or for renewing the Negotiations of Peace. Mean while, his, and the Duke of Burgundy's Envoys, paſſed from London to Flanders, and from Flanders to London, ever un-

1416. der colour of a Treaty of Commerce, in which freſh Difficulties were continually ſtarted, the better to hide their principal Deſign (1).

Why this Negotiation was kept ſecret.

It was not without reaſon, that this Negotiation was kept ſecret by both Sides. The Duke, whom nothing but Neceſſity would have forced to an Alliance with the King, was afraid, the diſcovery of this Project would alienate the Affections of the French, and eſpecially of the Pariſians. Henry had reaſon to fear, on his part, that if the Court of France came to know of this Negotiation, they would find means to break his Meaſures. However, his deſiſting entirely from War, ſince the Battle of Azincourt, might well cauſe his deſigns to be ſuſpected. But the Arrival of the Emperor Sigiſmund freed him from this trouble, as it gave him occaſion to pretend, he diſcontinued the War, at the Inſtance of that Prince.

Sigiſmund arrives in France. Mezerai. T. Livius. Elmham.

In the beginning of the Year, Sigiſmund came to Paris (2). He gave out himſelf, that the ſole End of his Journey was, to mediate Peace between the two Crowns of France and England (3). This Deſign was noble and charitable, and worthy a Chriſtian Monarch, ſuppoſing it to have been entirely diſintereſted. But ſeveral Circumſtances gave occaſion to believe, he undertook this Voyage to favour Henry rather than France, and in hopes of ſome Advantage for himſelf. At his arrival in France, he propoſed a four Years Truce between the two Kings, but the Court rejected this Propoſal. The French Hiſtorians charge the Conſtable with refuſing this Truce, for his own private Intereſt, but without ſhewing wherein the War could be for his Advantage. I ſuppoſe, he was then projecting the Siege of Harfleur, which he began the next June. It may be, he perceived, the Emperor was not an impartial Mediator. However this be, Sigiſmund finding he could not prevail at Paris, came into England (4) in the Month of March (5). The Engliſh Hiſtorians take notice, that being about to land, he was met by the Duke of Glouceſter, and ſome other Lords, who ſtepping into the Water with their drawn Swords, ſtopped the Boat. Surpriſed at this Reception, he asked the Reaſon: The Duke told him, if he was come to challenge any Authority in England, they had Orders to forbid his landing; but if he came only as a Mediator of Peace, he ſhould meet with all the reſpect due to the Imperial Dignity. This was to warn him not to take the Liberty of exerciſing Authority in England, as he had done in France during his ſtay (6).

The arrival of Sigiſmund at London, was preceeded by that of William of Bavaria, Earl of Holland and Zealand, who was come upon the ſame Errand. Theſe two Princes quickly ſaw, they ſhould find it difficult to procure a Peace. Henry added to his former demands, the Town of Harfleur, with part of the adjacent Territory, for the maintenance of the Garriſon. On the other hand, France perſiſting in her firſt Offers, would not hear of Peace, unleſs Henry reſtored Harfleur. So the two Mediators perceiving a Peace almoſt impoſſible, were ſatisfied with obtaining the two Kings conſent to a Truce for three Years, during which Harfleur ſhould remain in Truſt in their hands, for certain Securities, promiſed by the French Priſoners in England. But juſt as the Treaty was going to be ſigned, the Priſoners fell from their word. The Conſtable, who was reſolved to beſiege Harfleur, had agreed to this Negotiation only to amuſe Henry, and hinder him from diſcovering his Deſign.

Conflict between the Earl of Dorſet, and the Conſtable of France. Des Urſins. Walſing. Elmham. Hall.

Shortly after, under ſome pretence, he carried King Charles to Roan. His Aim was, to be ready againſt the arrival of ſome Genoeſe Ships, which were to join the French Fleet, in order to inveſt Harfleur by Sea. He managed matters ſo privately, that Henry, not having the leaſt Suſpicion of his deſign, neglected to reinforce the Garriſon. During the French Court's ſtay at Roan, the Earl of Dorſet, Governor of Harfleur, made an Incurſion even to the Gates of that City, and carried away a great Booty. In his return, he was purſued and overtaken by the Conſtable, who gained ſome Advantage over him. On the morrow, the Conſtable ſtill preſſing the Engliſh, who were haſtily retreating, forced them to halt, and ſtand upon their defence. In this ſecond Skirmiſh, the Earl of Dorſet, though inferior in number of Troops (7), had his Revenge, and compelled his Enemy to retire with precipitation to Roan. 1416.

The Conſtable beſieges Harfleur. T. Livius. Act. Pub. IX. p. 350.

This ill Succeſs prevented not the Conſtable from continuing his Preparations for the Siege of Harfleur. Immediately after the arrival of the Genoeſe Ships, he ordered his Troops, whom he had purpoſely diſperſed, to re-join, at a certain Place, where he came and headed them in Perſon (8). Then he marched directly to Harfleur, where he was not expected; ſo unable were the French thought by the Engliſh to make any Attempt. Whilſt the Conſtable beſieged the Town by Land, the Viſcount of Narbonne blocked it up by Sea, ſo that nothing could go in or out. Henry was extremely mortified to be thus overreached by the Conſtable. He was ſenſible then, that the Negotiation was intended only to amuſe him, and therefore was the more provoked to uſe his utmoſt Endeavours to break his Enemies meaſures. He had a mind, in his turn, to uſe Stratagem, and circumvent the Conſtable. To that end, he feigned a ſtrong Inclination to Peace, and deſired an Interview with his Couſin, for ſo he then called the King of France, whereas before he ſtiled him his Adverſary. He was in hopes, that if an Interview was granted, a Truce would enſue, which would give him time to relieve Harfleur; but his Propoſal was rejected. After this, he commiſſioned Morgan directly to demand a Truce. But the Court of France took care, not to give him ſuch an Advantage in the preſent Juncture. In fine, perceiving the Conſtable was not to be amuſed, he commanded a Fleet (9) to be equipped, reſolving to go himſelf and relieve the Place. He depended upon the Valour and Experience of the Earl of Dorſet, the Governor, knowing he would do his utmoſt to give him time to prepare for his Relief. In this he was not miſtaken, for though the Siege was begun about the middle of June, it was not much advanced at the end of July. So, Henry having had leiſure to prepare his Fleet, was ready to embark. But the Emperor diſſuaded him from venturing his Perſon in an Expedition of this nature, where, notwithſtanding all his Prudence, he might receive ſome diſgrace, by the Accidents of the Sea. The King yielding to the Emperor's Inſtances, gave the Command to the Duke of Bedford his Brother, who ſailed about the end of July (10). It ſoon met with the Enemy's Fleet lying before Harfleur. The Viſcount de Narbonne preparing for his Defence, withſtood for ſome time the Efforts of the Engliſh, but at length was forced to yield the Victory, after ſeeing five Genoeſe Carracks taken, and ſeveral of his own Ships ſunk. Nothing more preventing the Duke of Bedford from throwing the Succours into the Town, the Conſtable raiſed the Siege and retired.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the Duke of Burgundy continued, under diverſe Pretences, his ſecret Negotiations with Henry. One while, it was to renew the Truce between England and Flanders, another while, for Affairs concerning the Church, depending before the Council of Conſtance. In May (11), the Truce I juſt mentioned, which was to expire the 15th of June, was renewed for a Year, and yet the Duke of Burgundy ſent four Ambaſſadors more to England. In the beginning of Auguſt, the King appointed Commiſſioners to treat with them concerning ſome Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. This publick Commiſſion ſerved for pretence to the private Conferences. But by another of the ſame date, theſe Commiſſioners were empowered to agree with the Ambaſſadors upon an Interview between the King and the Duke of Burgundy. This Negotiation muſt have been now very forward, ſince, two days after, the King diſpatched Orders to ſeveral Officers, to be ready to attend him beyond Sea, where he was to have an Interview with ſome of his Enemies. baſſies 1416. baſſies were not wholly deſigned for treating about Trade, or Church Affairs. That Prince had now long demurred upon concluding his Treaty with Henry. As he was of the Blood-Royal of France, and firſt Peer of the Realm, he was ſenſible, an Alliance of that nature was directly contrary to his Honour and Duty. Beſides, ſuch a Step could not but be prejudicial to him in France, among his own Party. For theſe Reaſons, he had hitherto been ſatisfied with keeping the Negotiation on foot, in order to conclude it, only in caſe of Neceſſity. The Earl of Armagnac's Revenge, at length threw the Duke upon this Action, which, doubtleſs, he would have longer delayed, or, it may be, never done, had he not been as it were forced to it by the Perſecutions of his Enemies.

The Dauphin, and Duke of Burgundy concert Meaſures.

I have already ſaid, that the Conſtable d' Armagnac, had, under divers Pretences, prevented John the Dauphin, then in Hainault, from returning to Court. The young Prince, impatient of being thus controlled by that proud Miniſter, longed to be at the Head of Affairs, and to obſerve a Neutrality between the two Factions, which would gain him the Eſteem and Regard of both Parties. But this was not poſſible, ſince he had no Forces at his diſpoſal, but the Earl of Hainault's his Father-in-law, which were not ſufficient to enable him to execute ſuch a Project againſt the Conſtable's Will. Mean time, the Duke of Burgundy, perceiving there was no likelihood of his acquiring the Government, ſo long as the Conſtable had the King's Perſon in his power, thought it adviſeable, to ſtrengthen himſelf with the new Dauphin's Aſſiſtance. For that purpoſe, he had conferred, in the beginning of the Year, at Valenciennes, with him and the Earl of Hainault; and it was agreed, that the Dauphin ſhould once more try by fair means to be admitted to Court, in order to take the Place due to his Birth: That in caſe he ſucceeded, he ſhould carry the Duke with him: But if he could not prevail, they ſhould take other meaſures to diſpoſſeſs the Conſtable, and free the King. Purſuant to this Reſolution, the Dauphin and the Earl of Hainault, repaired to Compiegne, from whence the Earl proceeded alone to Paris, to mediate the return of his Son-in-law. Upon the firſt mention of recalling the Duke of Burgundy, the Conſtable interrupting him, ſaid plainly, the Dauphin ſhould never be admitted to the King his Father's Court, unleſs he openly declared himſelf an Enemy of the Burgundian Faction. The Earl of Hainault ſeeing this Obſtinacy, could not forbear uttering ſome Threats, which diſcovered to the Conſtable, and his Party, that the Dauphin intended to rely on the Aſſiſtance of the Duke. This was the Reaſon, that, in order to prevent the Miſchief this Union might do them, they reſolved to diſpatch him out of the way. A few days after, the Dauphin was poiſoned at Compiegne, the 16th of April 1416, and not in 1417, as we find it in the Abridgement of Mezerai. The King of Sicily was ſuſpected of this deed, to make way for Prince Charles his Son-in-law. If he was guilty, his Death, which happened preſently after, hindered him from reaping any Advantage.

The Dauphin is poiſoned.

Charles his Brother ſucceeds him.

By the Death of John the Dauphin, Charles his Brother, Earl of Ponthieu, became Dauphin, and Heir-apparent to the Crown. This young Prince immediately eſpouſed the Party of the Armagnacs, for ſo the Orleans Faction was now called. By that means, the Duke of Burgundy was more out of hopes than ever, and the Earl of Armagnac maintained himſelf in the Government, where nothing was done without his Orders. His hatred to the Duke of Burgundy, cauſed him to loſe no opportunity of perſecuting the Burgundians, who were very numerous at Paris. His ſevere and tyrannical Behaviour, joined to an extreme Greedineſs, induced at length the Pariſians of the Burgundian Party, to lay a Plot to introduce their Head into the City. The Conſpiracy being diſcovered, the Conſtable took occaſion, ſo to exerciſe his Rage upon the whole Party, that the Duke of Burgundy did not think himſelf any longer obliged to regard the Court. Immediately, to let the World ſee his Reſentment, he concluded with the King of England, a Truce for all their reſpective Dominions, not excepting his Poſſeſſions in France. But his Revenge did not ſtop here.

Treaty between Sigiſmund and Henry. Ib. p. 377. Walſing. T. Livius. Elmham.

Mean while, the Emperor Sigiſmund having no farther Buſineſs in England, departed about the middle of Auguſt. In his way to Canterbury, he ſigned a Treaty of perpetual Alliance with Henry, and, at the ſame time, a League againſt France. He promiſed to aſſiſt the King in the Recovery of the Kingdom of France, and Henry engaged to aid him in conſtraining King Charles, and ſome other Princes, to do him Homage, for certain Territories not ſpecified in the Treaty. Probably, this concerned the Kingdom of Arles, and the Dauphiné, to which the Emperors had ſome ſtale Pretenſions. By the way, this Treaty diſcovers one of the Motives of Sigiſmund's Journey to France and England. Very likely, by procuring a Peace between the two Kings, he hoped to obtain for himſelf ſome one of thoſe Countries, to which he laid Claim. Be this as it will, it may be conjectured, that he expected ſome private Advantage from the Peace. Great Princes are ſeldom ſeen to ſpend whole Years out of their Dominions, with the ſole View to mediate a Peace, in which they have no manner of concern. Sigiſmund was, of all others, the fartheſt from this Character. I do not know, whether, before his Journey to England, he had contracted a Friendſhip with Henry; but after his departure, it appears by ſeveral Records, that there was between them a ſtrict Correſpondence and mutual Confidence, very uncommon among Princes (1).

Henry goes to Calais.

France ſends the Archbiſhop of Rheims. Act. Pub. T. IX. p. 342, 384, 386. Elmham. Walſing. T. Livius.

The Emperor being arrived at Calais, ſtaid there for Henry, who could not come till about the end of September (2). Mean while, the Court of France, alarmed at the report of the Duke of Burgundy's Interview with Henry at Calais, and wanting to know what ſhould paſs at the Conference, ſent thither the Archbiſhop of Rheims, with ſome other Ambaſſadors. The Pretence was, to treat of a Peace with the King, but, in all appearance, the chief Aim of this Embaſſy, was to diſcover what ſhould paſs at the Interview. Henry was not ſorry, the Ambaſſadors of France would be witneſſes of the Duke of Burgundy's Arrival at Calais, and therefore readily diſpatched their Safe-Conducts, and preſently after their coming (3), appointed Commiſſioners to treat with them. But he took ſuch Precautions, that the French could never diſcover the real Motive of his Journey to Calais, at leaſt, with any certainty. It did not appear he had any other deſign, than to confirm the late Truce between the King and the Duke, which was already publiſhed at London. It is true, that, afterwards, the Duke's Proceedings made him ſuſpected of being in Friendſhip with the Engliſh, but this was only a bare Suſpicion. The French Hiſtorians ſpeak of it very uncertainly, and we had properly nothing fixed, till the Publick Records, printed in England, diſcovered the Secret. There we find what follows upon this Subject.

The Duke of Burgundy comes to Calais. Act. Pub. IX. p. 390. T. Livius. Elmham.

The 1ſt of October, the King diſpatched a Safe-Conduct for the Duke of Burgundy, and eight hundred Attendants, and ſent him the Duke of Glouceſter his Brother in Hoſtage. The Articles ran, word for word, thus.

What would that Hiſtorian have ſaid, had he known all? It is further to be remarked, that the Earl of Charolois, afterwards Duke of Burgundy, entered into the ſame Engagements with the Duke his Father. After this, there is no queſtioning the ill deſigns of theſe two Princes, againſt France their native Country. They choſe rather to ſee it under a foreign Dominion, than governed by their Enemies.

Truce with France, p. 397, &c. Cotton's Abridg. Walſing.

Before Henry left Calais, he concluded a Truce with France, till the 2d of February; and then he returned into England about the middle of October, in order to hold a Parliament, called for the 19th of the ſame Month. During this Seſſion, the Parliament granted a Subſidy (1) for carrying on the War. But this Aid was ſo little proportioned to his Wants and Projects, that he was forced to pawn his Crown to the Biſhop of Wincheſter his Uncle, for a hundred thouſand Marks, and part of his Jewels to the City of London, for ten thouſand Pounds Sterling. This is a clear Evidence, how many difficulties he would have met with, in the Conqueſt of France with his own Forces, if the inteſtine Troubles of that Kingdom had not paved the way for him. Mean while, notwithſtanding his preſſing Neceſſities, he aſſigned the Earl of Dorſet, who defended Harfleur, a Penſion of a thouſand Pounds, upon creating him Duke of Exeter (2).

Act. Pub. IX. p. 405, 416.

Henry reſolves to renew the War.

Henry having bound the Duke of Burgundy, by their late private Treaty, thought it time to renew the War. He knew not only, that one half of France would not oppoſe him, but moreover the Burgundian Party would make a diverſion in his favour, which could not but procure him great Advantages. In this Reſolution, he made all the neceſſary Preparations to accompliſh his Enterprize. Mean while, as the Supply granted him by Parliament was not ſufficient for his purpoſe, and as the Money came ſlowly into the Exchequer, he was quickly in great Want. To remedy this Inconvenience, he made uſe of the following Means. After he had ſettled the Pay of each Soldier, Horſe and Foot, and of each Officer, according to every one's Rank and Character, he made private Contracts with ſeveral Lords and Gentlemen, whereby they were obliged to find him a certain Number of Horſemen or Footmen, for ſuch a yearly Sum to be paid quarterly. The firſt Quarteridge was advanced, but when the ſecond came to be paid, the King had no Money. To ſupply the preſent Occaſion, he pawned to them the reſt of the Jewels, with Letters under the Great Seal, empowering them to ſell them, if the Money was not paid within ſuch a time. The Term allowed, was twelve or eighteen Months, according as the Creditors were more or leſs tractable. By this means he gained time for the Payment of his Troops, which was a great Conveniency, as he could reimburſe his Creditors according as the Money came into the Treaſury, without being obliged to pay all at once. People were ſo well ſatisfied of his Sincerity, that they made no ſcruple to ſerve him, or lend him Money, upon ſuch Securities, as would have been little worth under a Prince of leſs Probity.

His way of raiſing the Army. Des Urſins. Act. Pub. IX. p. 433, 459, 460, 461.

The State of the Court of France.

The Preparations carrying on in England, very juſtly alarmed the Court of France, who were little able to make the like. The Duke of Burgundy's late Truce, publickly made with Henry, was a demonſtration there was no Aſſiſtance to be expected, either from the Duke or his Adherents. Nay the Court was apprehenſive, the Duke had gone farther, at the Conference held with the Enemy of the Kingdom: At leaſt, he was very much ſuſpected of having ill Deſigns. So, the Conſtable who ſat at the helm was not a little embarraſſed. He enjoyed a great Authority; but it was not without uneaſineſs. Beſides, ſince the Death of John the Dauphin, he was forced to have a regard for the new Dauphin, leaſt the young Prince ſhould think of governing without his Aſſiſtance. To all theſe Difficulties was added, the War, the Engliſh were preparing to carry into France. As the Kingdom was in an ill ſituation, and the Enemy like to make a great Progreſs, he conſidered, he ſhould be anſwerable for all the ill Succeſſes. In this ſtate of Perplexity, he thought he ſhould try to put a Stop to the King of England's Arms, by an extraordinary Negotiation, which ſhould give that Prince room to believe, the Court of France would be forced to make Peace, though never ſo unwilling. He was aware, that if he ſhould himſelf treat of a Peace, it would be loſt Labour, becauſe it was generally believed to be for his Intereſt, that Affairs ſhould remain embroiled, in order to preſerve his Authority. It was therefore unlikely, that the King of England ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be amuſed by any Propoſal from him. For this reaſon, he thought proper to make uſe of the Priſoners in England, and particularly of the Duke of Bourbon. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral Safe-Conducts dated about this time, for the Duke of Bourbon's Domeſticks going to and coming from France, under divers Pretences. It may therefore be preſumed, that the Plot was then formed, and that the Duke of Bourbon did nothing in the Affair, of which I am going to relate the Particulars, but in concert with the Court of France.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 423, 425.

This Plot was ſo artfully framed, that if the King had not been in a continual Miſtruſt, he would doubtleſs have been deceived. But his firm Reſolution, not to interrupt the Execution of his Deſigns, for any Offers that ſhould be ſhort of his Demands, cauſed him to eſcape the Snare. The Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Eu and Vendôme, and ſome other Priſoners, feigning to deſpair of the Affairs of France, intimated to Henry, that they were willing to treat with him, for themſelves in particular. This was told him, not poſitively, but as what they might poſſibly be brought to. But the King, fearing that, under this Pretence, they deſigned to retard his Voyage, gave no great Attention to the Overture.

Ib. p. 427.

Negotiation between Henry and the French Priſoners; Act. Pub. IX. p. 427, &c.

Some time after, theſe ſame Princes, who had hitherto endeavoured to make the Propoſal come from the King, finding they could not ſucceed, began firſt. At an Audience which they demanded, they expreſſed their Inclination, and prayed him to acquaint them with his Pretenſions; adding, they did not queſtion, but they ſhould return him a ſatisfactory Anſwer, without any Prejudice to their Honour. The King, who would not be amuſed, roundly told them, he had no other Propoſal to make, except only, that they ſhould acknowledge him for King of France and their lawful Sovereign. The Duke of Orleans exclaimed againſt this Propoſal, and plainly told him, they had no Anſwer to return to ſuch a Demand. Matters went no farther for this time.

Particularly the Duke of Bourbon. Ibid.

But a few Weeks after, the Duke of Bourbon reſumed the Affair. He told the King, that ſince they had the Honour to talk with him, ſeveral of the Priſoners had ſent Perſons into France, to make inquiry concerning his Title to that Kingdom, and had received better Information than ever before. He added, for his part, he was fully convinced of the Juſtice of his Rights. Then he ſaid, he was told, that, notwithſtanding his juſt Claim to the whole Kingdom, he had offered to reſign it, if certain Provinces were delivered to him; and, in his opinion, that Offer ought not to be refuſed: That the other Priſoners were of his mind, and had reſolved to do all that lay in their Power to procure him what he deſired. That therefore, he begged leave to go into France, and declare to King Charles, in the Name of all the Priſoners, that, as faithful Subjects, they could not but adviſe him, to cloſe with this Expedient for Peace, and pray him to accept ſo reaſonable an Offer. In ſhort, the Duke added, that if the Court of France conſented to the Offer, Henry might this very Year take poſſeſſion of the Provinces, which ſhould be reſigned. But if, on the contrary, it was rejected, the Princes would account themſelves acquitted from the Oath they had taken to their King. The Duke engaged, for his own part, to put

He promiſed to return into England, by the time which ſhould be appointed him, and own Henry for King of France, and pay him Homage as his lawful Sovereign. Moreover, he added, that he would ſo evidently demonſtrate the Juſtice of Henry's Right to the Crown of France, that all the World ſhould be ſatisfied, he could not diſpenſe with doing him Homage, without acting contrary to his Honour. In fine, he entreated the King to be ſilent till his Return, by reaſon of the Danger he ſhould be expoſed to, if the thing was divulged, during his Stay in France.

Henry could not tell what to think of ſuch a Propoſal. He knew France was not governed either by the Duke of Orleans, or the Duke of Bourbon; and that it was not the Earl of Armagnac's Intereſt to make a Peace upon theſe Terms. But, at the ſame time, the hopes of recovering the Provinces of France, loſt ſince the Treaty of Bretigny, without being obliged to renew the War, were very agreeable. On the other hand, the Alternative propoſed by the Duke, could not but be advantagious to him. All he had to do, was to be upon his Guard, and not be perſwaded, on this pretence, to interrupt the Execution of his Projects. Wherefore, reſolving not to ſuſpend his Expedition one ſingle day, upon any account whatever, he believed there was no Danger in granting the Duke of Bourbon the Leave he deſired. But firſt, he had one of the Duke's Sons given him in Hoſtage, with Security for the Sum of two hundred thouſand Crowns. Theſe Particulars are in the Collection of the Publick Acts. We find there a Letter, written with the King's own Hand. to Sir John Tiptoft, his Ambaſſador to the Emperor, ordering him to acquaint Sigiſmund with the Secret, ask his Opinion upon it, and aſſure him that the Negotiation ſhall not retard his Expedition into France. At the ſame time, he enjoyns him not to make the leaſt Diſcovery to any other Perſon, on pain of his heavy Diſpleaſure. Probably, his firm Reſolution not to be amuſed by any Propoſal, was the reaſon, this Stratagem was carried no farther. The Duke of Bourbon returned into England; but performed not his other Engagements. It was, doubtleſs, Henry's Indignation againſt the Priſoners, for endeavouring to deceive him, that cauſed him to order them to be confined in Pontefract Caſtle; whereas before, they were upon their Parole. Though there are no poſitive Proofs, that this Plot was contrived by the Conſtable, it is viſible however, by ſeveral Conjectures, which all together amount to a ſort of Demonſtration. It would be too long to give the particulars here. But if the French Priſoners are ſuppoſed to have acted ſincerely, without the Direction of the Conſtable, it muſt be inferred, that France was then in a very deplorable State. King Charles, frequently ſeized with a Frenzy, was incapable of taking care of his Affairs. The Duke of Burgundy, firſt Peer of the Realm, and Head of a powerful Party, had made a ſecret Alliance with the Enemy of the State. The Princes of the Blood were about to acknowledge Henry for King of France. In fine, the Kingdom was governed by a young Prince of fourteen Years, and by the Earl of Armagnac, a violent Man, who ſought only to be revenged of his Enemies, and openly ſacrificed the publick Good to his Ambition.

Though the Conſtable had already been the Cauſe of much Miſchief to France, by perſecuting the Duke of Burgundy, and forcing him, as it were, to throw himſelf into the Arms of the King of England, he did not think it ſufficient to ſecure his Quiet. Iſabella of Bavaria, Wife of Charles VI, appeared ſo diſpleaſed to be ruled by a Subject, that he could not help fearing, ſhe would in the end find means to deprive him of his Authority. This was not impoſſible. The King being of an eaſy Temper, it would not have been difficult to gain him, in one of his Intervals. Neither was it impracticeable, to perſuade the Dauphin to rid himſelf of a troubleſome Governor, in order to rule as he pleaſed, without fear of being controlled. Thus the Conſtable's Deſtiny hanging by ſo weak a Thread, whilſt he had ſuch an Enemy at Court, he believed, that, to ſecure himſelf, it was abſolutely neceſſary to remove her. The Queen gave him a ſufficient Handle by her Behaviour, which was not altogether conformable to the Rules of Decency. The Conſtable taking this Advantage, inſpired the King and Dauphin, with ſuch ſtrong Suſpicions of her, that ſhe was ſent away to Tours, where ſhe remained as a Priſoner, not knowing on whom to rely, to free herſelf out of Captivity. This fatal Policy of the Conſtable was a freſh Source of Calamities to France. The injured Mother could never forgive her Son the Affront ſhe had received, and, unfortunately for the Kingdom, it was but too much in her Power to glut her Revenge.

The Conſtable cauſes the Queen to be ſent away to Tours.

The Queen hates the Dauphin mortally.

The Conſtable's violent Conduct, the Death of the two Dauphins laid to his Charge, the Queen's Baniſhment, with numberleſs other Occaſions, furniſhed the Duke of Burgundy with a pretence to make a Diverſion, in favour of the King of England. He publiſhed a Manifeſto againſt the Conſtable, aggravating his Faults and Oppreſſions, with all the Reſentment of an injured Enemy. Then he wrote to the King, that, as firſt Peer of France, it was incumbent upon him, to endeavour to prevent the utter Ruin of the Kingdom, which was infallibly going to Deſtruction, unleſs timely relieved. By the ſame reaſons, he tried to ſtir up the Cities of the Kingdom, and win them to his Intereſt. In fine, perceiving that ſome of the Towns had already declared for him, he approached Paris at the head of an Army, when the King of England was ready to ſail for France. His Aim was, to lay the Dauphin and Conſtable under a Neceſſity, either of quitting Paris, in order to oppoſe the King of England, or of ſuffering the Engliſh to act without Oppoſition, if they intended to ſave Paris. They thought fit to take this laſt Courſe, chuſing rather, that Part of the Kingdom ſhould fall into the hands of the Engliſh, than to ſee themſelves diſpoſſeſſed of the Government, by their private Enemies.

The Duke of Burgundy takes up Arms.

Henry willing to improve ſo favorable a Juncture, ſailed about the end of July (1), and landed at Tonque in Normandy. His Army conſiſted but of twenty five thouſand five hundred effective Men, too inconſiderable a Number for the Conqueſt of France, had he not been ſecure of meeting little Oppoſition. Upon his Arrival, he beſieged the Caſtle of Tonque, and became maſter of it the 9th of Auguſt. Then, after the Conqueſt of ſome other ſmall Places (2), he laid Siege to Caen, which ſurrendered the 9th of September.

The Court of France was then in great perplexity. The Duke of Burgundy, at the Gates of Paris, hindered their regulating the Affairs of the Kingdom. They ſhould have had two Armies in the Field, one to oppoſe the Burgundians, and another to defend Normandy againſt the Engliſh. But they had ſcarce Troops enough to defend Paris, where the King, Dauphin, and Conſtable, were ſhut up. Their only Refuge was to renew the Negotiations with Henry. To that end they demanded a Conference between Ambaſſadors of the two Crowns, to conſult about means to conclude a Peace. Henry agreed to the Propoſal, but without diſcontinuing the War, being unwilling to loſe ſo precious an Opportunity. The Court of France chuſing the Archbiſhop of Rheims for firſt Plenipotentiary, he appointed, on his part, the Earl of Warwick and ſome others (3), who were to meet with the French, at Bernonville, in Normandy. This Congreſs, for what reaſon I know not, was deferred to the end of November. Mean while, Henry became maſter of Bayeux, Argentan, Chateau de l'Aigle, Alenſon, and ſome other Places.

Whilſt the King was continuing his Conqueſts, the Duke of Burgundy did him great Service, not only by the Diverſion he made about Paris, but chiefly by increaſing the Troubles in France, ſo as never more to be appeaſed. Queen Iſabella, baniſhed to Tours, had been hitherto an Enemy to the Duke of Burgundy, but the deſire of being revenged on the Dauphin and Conſtable, made her overlook all the Cauſes of Diſguſt at the Duke. As ſhe had no other Refuge, ſhe diſpatched truſty Meſſengers to tell him, ſhe was ready to join with him againſt their common Enemies. The Duke immediately accepted the Offer, and privately concerted meaſures with her, to free her from Confinement. Then, he ſuddenly departed from Corbeil, where he was encamped, with only a ſmall Body of choſen Horſemen. He made ſuch ſpeed, that before his Deſign could be known, he was at the Abbey of Marmoutier near Tours, where he found the Queen, who was come thither under colour of Devotion. As ſhe was not ſuſpected of attempting to eſcape, he eaſily carried her away, and conducted her to Troye in Champagne. When ſhe ſaw herſelf in ſafety, ſhe

Congress of Bernonville. Act. Pub. IX. p. 517.

The Conference between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Crowns, was held at Bernonville, on the 28th of November. As Henry suspected, the Court of France sought only to make him lose time, he resolved to deprive them of that Expectation. Immediately upon the opening of the Conference, his Ambassadors set forth his Pretensions, assuring withal, there would be no Abatement. The Substance of his Offers was, That he would marry the Princess Catherine: That King Charles should enjoy the Crown for his Life, but after his Death, it should come to the King of England: That during Charles's Life, Henry should be Regent of France, by reason of the King's Infirmity. Moreover he demanded such Securities, as should render the Performance of these Articles unquestionable.

Henry's Demands.

The Conference breaks up.

But as the French Ambassadors were not sufficiently impowered to treat upon these Articles, and it was not Henry's Interest vainly to prolong this Negotiation, the Congress immediately broke up. He was justly apprehensive, the Court of France would have made use of this occasion, to raise a Jealousy in his Allies, and particularly in the Duke of Burgundy. Mean while Henry, intent upon the Siege of Falaise, took the Town on the 20th of December, but the Castle held out till February.

Some time before the Congress of Bernonville, the Duke of Bretagne came and made a Truce with Henry for a Year (1), and another in the Name of the Queen of Sicily, as Guardian of Lewis her Son, for Anjou and Maine. Thus by degrees, Henry greatly weakened France, by depriving her of the Assistance she might have received from her Vassals.

Whilst the King was employed in France, Oldcastle, of whom I have spoken elsewhere, was seized (2) and brought to London, to the great Satisfaction of the Clergy, who were extremely incensed against him. They were determined to sacrifice him, for a Terror to all the rest of the Lollards. Notwithstanding his Birth and Merit, he was sentenced to be hung up by the middle with a Chain, and burnt alive. By the way, his being burnt, is a clear Evidence, that he was condemned for Heresy, rather than for conspiring against the King. Be this as it will, his Sentence was executed amidst the Curses and Imprecations of the Priests and Monks, who even laboured to prevent the People from praying for him. Thus died Sir John Oldcastle Baron of Cobham, with a wonderful Constancy, perfectly answerable to the Firmness, wherewith he had all along maintained the Doctrine of Wickliff, which he professed. He was the first Nobleman, that suffered on the account of Religion (3). After the Execution, the Parliament enacted fresh Statutes, in order to the utter Extirpation of the Lollards; the Clergy never ceasing to require their Blood, with all the eagerness imaginable.

In some Histories, it is said, this Year, Queen Joanna of Navarre, Widow of Henry IV, and Mother-in-law of the reigning King, was accused of conspiring, with her Confessor, against the King. Some add, she was condemned to a ten years Imprisonment, and that her Confessor was killed by the Chaplain of the Tower, in a Dispute upon that occasion. This is all that can be said concerning this Accusation, of which Historians speak very confusedly.

Pretended Invasion of the Scots refuted. Speed. Walsing. T. Livius. Elmham.

As for the Scotch Invasion, placed by some in this Year, and, as they say, repulsed by the Duke of Bedford, with a hundred thousand Men, I dare venture to affirm, it is all a Mistake (4), since it is not mentioned, either in the publick Records, or in the Histories of Scotland. All we find with relation to the Scots, is, that they threatned to invade England in the Year 1415, about the time of the King's first Expedition into France (5).

1418. Henry takes several Places in Normandy. Act. Pub. IX. p. 541, ----- 618. Walsing. Elmham.

The situation of Affairs in France was extremely advantagious to Henry. Accordingly, he did not fail to improve it. The Campaign, begun in August, lasted all the Winter, without any Interruption, so that his Troops had no time to rest. The Castle of Falaise, surrendering on the 16th of February, Henry divided his Army into several Bodies, of which he gave the Command to the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester his Brothers, to the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Salisbury, with Orders to attack several Places at once; being resolved not to neglect so favorable an Opportunity. In the Months of March and April, he became Master of St. Lo, Carentan, St. Sauveur le Vicomte, and many other Places in Normandy; so that of all the strong Towns, he only wanted Cherbourg and Roan, to complete the Conquest of that Province. Evreux surrendered in May, and presently after, he laid Siege to Cherbourg, which cost him three Months. 1418.

T. Livius.

Cherbourg holds out three Months.

During the Siege, the Court of France suffered a new Revolution, which was not favorable to Henry, though, at first it seemed to procure him great Advantages. The Council of Constance, which had been opened ever since the Year 1414, having deposed the three Popes (6), who contended for the Papacy, had elected on the 10th of November 1417, Cardinal Colonna, who assumed the Name of Martin V. The new Pope, upon his mounting the Papal Throne, sent two Legates into France, to try to appease the Troubles, and unite the two Factions. The Sollicitations of these Legates were so powerful, that the two Parties sent their Deputies to Montereau-Faut-Yonne, where it was agreed, that the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy should jointly govern the Kingdom, during the King's Infirmity. If this Agreement had taken place, and the two Parties been sincerely reconciled, probably, Henry's Affairs would have received a notable Prejudice. But the Constable, and the Chancellor his Creature, could not bear to see the Duke of Burgundy in the Administration again. So, preferring their own private Interests to the Good of the Publick, they so managed, that the Agreement remained ineffectual.

This Proceeding drew the publick hatred on the Constable, and strengthened the Burgundian Faction in Paris, which, from thenceforth, became much more powerful. At length, May the 18th at Night, they found means to introduce into Paris, Lisle-Adam Governor of Pontoise, and a zealous Adherent for the Duke of Burgundy. He entered only with eight hundred Horse, but at his Arrival, the Burgundians being under Arms, made a terrible Slaughter of the Armagnacs. Tanneguy du Châtel, Governor of the Bastile, not being able to remedy the disorder, ran to the Louvre, and carried away the Dauphin in his Shirt, in order to secure him in his Fortress. Next morning, the Dauphin fled to Melun, not thinking himself safe in the Bastile, but the King remained in the Power of the Burgundians. The same day the Constable, being hid in a Mason's House, was discovered, and thrown into Prison.

But this was only a Prelude to a much greater Commotion, in the same City, some days after. Upon News of what had passed, the Exiles being returned to Paris from all Quarters, the Massacre was renewed June the 12th. The Constable was taken out of Prison, murdered, and shamefully dragged through the Streets. The Chancellor, several Bishops, and other Persons, to the number of two thousand, underwent the same barbarous Treatment. The Massacre being ended, the Queen and the Duke of Burgundy came to Paris, and entered the City in Triumph, on the 14th of July. The Plague, which afterwards broke out at Paris, and which, in three Months, swept away above forty thousand Persons, added fresh Calamities to those I have mentioned. Mean while, the Queen and Duke having the King in their Power, issued, in his name, what Orders they judged most conducive to their own Interests. On the other hand, the Dauphin, assuming the Title of Regent, threatned all that should obey the Duke of Burgundy. Thus which ever side the French espoused, they could not avoid being called Rebels by one or other of the Factions. Neutrality itself was accounted a Crime.

Mean while, notwithstanding the Animosity of the two Parties, the Troubles seemed for some time to be going to end. As there was not yet any Cause of personal Enmity between the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Bretagne had so managed, that each of these Princes had consented to an Agreement. 1418. was settled, but some persons about the Dauphin persuaded him not to sign. This was attended with fatal consequences. Thus the dissension which prevailed between the two Factions, caused each to have two enemies to oppose, the contrary party on one hand, and the English on the other. But Henry was far from looking upon both parties with the same eye. He was sworn enemy of the Armagnacs, whilst he was only a feigned enemy of the Burgundians.

broke off by the Dauphin.

Henry had now begun to reap some advantage from the late revolution in the court of France. The new Earl of Armagnac, the Lord D'Albret, and the other Gascon Lords of the same party, who were waging in Guienne fierce war with the English, thought proper to conclude a truce with him, which freed him from a troublesome diversion. These Lords considering, that, since the death of the Constable, the government of France was in the Duke of Burgundy's hands, believed it repugnant to their interest, to continue a war, of which their enemy would reap all the benefit. By this truce, instead of being obliged to send succours into Guienne, Henry drew from thence some troops, with which he reinforced his army in Normandy.

Truce in Guienne between Henry and the Gascon Rebels. July 27. Act. Pub. IX. p. 602.

Cherbourg having at length capitulated (1), after a three month's siege, France had nothing left in Normandy but Roan, the loss whereof would deprive her of all hopes of recovering that Province. And therefore, without delay, Henry laid siege to that city, about the latter end of August, or the beginning of September. Mezerai says, the siege began in June, which is a mistake. However that be, it was very remarkable for the vigorous defence of the Besieged (2), who held out five months, and endured the greatest miseries, before they capitulated. They applied to the Duke of Burgundy for succours, but it was to no purpose (3). France, in changing governor, had not acquired new strength. Besides, the Duke of Burgundy, following the Earl of Armagnac's maxims, was more careful to disappoint the practices of his enemies, than oppose the progress of the King of England. He put however the Pope's Legates upon trying, whether, by a negotiation, he could interrupt the siege of Roan. This method not succeeding, he assembled all the forces in his power, and feigned a design to give the English battle. He even carried the King as far as Beauvais, but all this ended in nothing. Perhaps he did not much care to obstruct the King of England's progress. It is uncertain, whether, after his being at the head of the government, he preserved the same sentiments for that monarch, as when banished from court. It may at least be affirmed, he had not the same interest to promote his affairs. He could not however but shew some regard for a Prince, who had in his possession a writing capable of ruining him, with all the French, of what party soever. For this reason, since the revolution at the court of France, his conduct had been very ambiguous. He had resolved, it seems, to do neither good nor hurt to the King of England, till he should be determined by the events.

Several Attempts to save that Place. T. Livius. Elmham.

The Duke of Burgundy not relieving the Besieged, they applied to the Dauphin, who was as little able to raise the siege by force. The way of negotiation seemed to him more proper to produce that effect. It is hard to know for certain, whether he really intended to make a peace and an alliance with Henry, as he expressed a desire, or designed only to amuse him. Be this as it will, he sent him word, that he desired to treat with him upon three articles. First, concerning the means of restoring a peace to France. Secondly, about the marriage already projected. Lastly, about an alliance between them two, against the Duke of Burgundy. Henry rejected not these proposals. Perhaps he did not much rely on the Duke of Burgundy, or else he had a mind to raise the jealousy of the court of France, in order to procure more advantagious offers than had yet been proposed. He appointed for his ambassadors, at the congress desired by the Dauphin, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, Philip Morgan, and some others. Their instructions, dated at the camp before Roan, October the 26th, were in substance as follow:

The Dauphin offers to make an alliance with Henry. Des Ursins. Montrelet. T. Livius.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 626. 628.

The King's instructions to his Ambassadors.

I. That they should use their utmost endeavours to induce the Dauphin's ambassadors to declare all their proposals, and absolutely reject all offers of the countries he was already possess'd of.

II. If the French should offer at length to put all things upon the foot of the treaty of Bretigny, they were to demand, how the King should be assured of the performance, since the Dauphin was not authoriz'd for that purpose.

III. He judged, they would for that reason insist only on a truce, in which case, he ordered his ambassadors to require, what dominions should be given him for making the same. 1418.

IV. He expresly forbid them to treat of an alliance with the Dauphin, till the peace or truce was settled. He did not leave them however at liberty to conclude either; but ordered notice to be sent him, when matters should be upon the point of conclusion, in case they proceeded so far.

V. As to the alliance with the Dauphin, he said, that Prince's aim was, probably, to obtain his assistance against the Duke of Burgundy. If so, he forbid them to agree upon an inconsiderable aid; but commanded them to offer forces sufficient to restore the kingdom of France to a state of tranquillity.

VI. But withal, he expected, in consideration of these forces, that the Earldoms of Artois, Boulogne, and Flanders, should be given him. But if this was refused, the ambassadors were to lower their demands to the Earldom of Flanders only, provided the Dauphin would assist in conquering it. He offered, on his part, to give up to the Dauphin whatever should be conquered elsewhere upon the Duke of Burgundy.

The King's View in treating with the Dauphin.

It is easy to see by these instructions, that the King did not believe the congress would end in a peace; nor even intended to conclude with the Dauphin, who had not power to resign to the King, what had been taken from his predecessors, since the treaty of Bretigny. It may therefore be presumed, his sole aim was to stir up the jealousy of the Duke of Burgundy, who being master of the King's person, was alone able to make a solid peace. This appears moreover by the King's writing, the very day he signed these instructions, to the Duke of Burgundy, that if the negotiation for a peace was renewed, he would do his utmoit to render it successful. Upon this letter, Charles sent him word, he had nominated the Bishops of Arras and Beauvais, the first president of Morvilliers, and some others, for his plenipotentiaries. Thus Henry was in hopes, by treating with the two parties at once, he should raise such a jealousy in both, that from thence would result a happy conclusion to his affairs.

Congress of Alenson. p. 632. T. Livius. Elmham.

The congress between the King's and the Dauphin's ambassadors, was held at Alenson, the 10th of November. The English, pursuant to their instructions, absolutely refused to treat about the alliance, before the terms of the peace were agreed upon. At length, after evading all the captious proposals made by the French, they obliged them to come to their last offers; namely, the Towns and Provinces contained in the treaty of Bretigny, on condition of homage to the crown of France. But the English rejected these offers, unless the sovereignty of the Provinces was added, according to the tenor of the treaty of Bretigny. They demanded moreover, Normandy; raised difficulties about the Dauphin's inability to perform these conditions; and required, in what manner he intended to accomplish them, supposing their master should be satisfied therewith. The French answered, it was needless to talk of the manner of performance, since the offers themselves did not please. Whereupon they broke up the conference.

Another between the Ambassadors of the two Kings of no effect. Act. Pub. IX. p. 648, 654, 655, ---659.

Hardly was this congress ended, before another was held at Pont de l'Arche, between the plenipotentiaries of the two Kings; or rather the ambassadors of the two crowns met to confer together, in presence of the Pope's Legates. But in the first meeting, King Charles's ambassadors insisted, that the conference should be managed in French, to which the English refused to agree. In short, at the instance of the Legates, who were very urgent, Henry was willing there should be two Protocols, one in French, and another in Latin, of which the last only should be accounted authentick. But the French rejecting this expedient, the conference about the peace was not so much as opened. Probably, the Duke of Burgundy did not seriously intend to enter into negotiation. He was still unresolved of his course, or rather, was then framing a design, which we shall see come to light the next year.

The Dauphin wants to renew the Treaty. Ib. p. 661, 672.

This conference however alarmed the Dauphin, who, doubtless, was ignorant of what passed. He was afraid of being prevented by the Duke of Burgundy, well knowing, if a peace was made between the two Kings, it must tend to his prejudice. In this belief, he sent to Henry, intreating him to appoint the place where the negotiation, begun at Alenson, might be renewed. Henry readily consented to his request, as he could desire nothing more advantagious, than the mutual jealousy of the two

The taking of Roan. Ib. p. 664. T. Livius. Elmham.

During all theſe negotiations, Henry had not diſcontinued one moment the ſiege of Roan, though his army ſuffered much by the ſharpneſs of the ſeaſon. But the Beſieged were in no better condition. Reduced to eat Horſe-fleſh, and all kinds of Animals, and even this ſort of food failing them, they could hold out no longer. Wherefore, ſeeing no remedy, they capitulated on the 13th of January, to ſurrender on the 19th, in caſe they were not relieved by that time. Henry continued to them all their privileges, for the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns. By the ſurrender of Roan, all Normandy, a few Caſtles excepted, fell again under the dominion of the Kings of England, two hundred and fifteen years after it was taken from them by Philip Auguſtus, in the reign of John Lack-land. After the taking of Roan, Henry ſent part of his army into Picardy, under the command of the Duke of Exeter, who became maſter of Dieppe and Montreuil (1).

February. Act. Pub. IX. p. 674, ------682. T. Livius. Elmham.

The Duke of Burgundy takes new meaſures.

Affairs were then at a Criſis, which could not fail of producing ſome great change. As the Duke of Burgundy had fought the King of England's alliance, only to diſpoſſeſs the Dauphin and Earl of Armagnac, he no longer ſtood in need of his protection, ſince he was maſter of Paris, and the King's perſon. On the contrary, his ſtation ſhould have induced him to wiſh, that Henry might not grow too powerful in France, and conſequently it was his intereſt to oppoſe the progreſs of the Engliſh arms. But on the other hand, he had in the Dauphin a ſworn enemy, againſt whom it was chiefly neceſſary to be ſecured. Beſides that Prince's natural right to govern the kingdom during his Father's infirmity, he was moreover at the head of a powerful party. Beſides, it was not impoſſible, either by the King's death, or ſome other way, he might recover the advantage he had loſt. In that caſe, the Duke would rather have had Henry maſter of all France, than ſee the Dauphin triumphant. Mean while, whatever turn affairs ſhould take, he plainly perceived, it would not be poſſible to preſerve his authority, though Henry ſucceeded in his deſigns. And indeed it was not likely, that Henry would truſt him with the government, when he was once in poſſeſſion. Thus ſtanding as it were between two Precipices, he remained ſome time undetermined, without knowing what to reſolve. Probably it was this that prevented his more effectual endeavours to relieve Roan. He durſt not break with the King of England, for fear he ſhould want his farther aſſiſtance againſt the Dauphin. After continuing ſome time in this ſtate of perplexity, he determined at length to do all that lay in his power to be reconciled with his enemy, in order to break ſafely with the King of England. This courſe ſeemed to him both advantagious and honourable. By a hearty reconciliation with the Dauphin, he might hope to have ſome laſting ſhare in the government, and hold the ſecond rank. Beſides, France being his native country, he could not openly forſake her intereſts, without rendering himſelf odious to all true Frenchmen. If he had privately relinquiſhed her, it was not without remorſe. He had been led to it by the ſole thirſt of revenge. The execution of the deſign he had formed, was not however without difficulties. The Dauphin had conceived an inveterate hatred of him, which was continually fomented by the friends and adherents of the late Duke of Orleans, who were always about him, and carefully watching all opportunities to revenge the death of that Prince. Notwithſtanding theſe obſtacles, the Duke of Burgundy became more and more confirmed in his reſolution, not ſeeing any other way to ſave himſelf, and the kingdom. He undertook therefore to accompliſh this reconciliation by all ſorts of means, even to the forcing the Dauphin to it, by the fear of ſeeing France otherwiſe loſt. In fine, if the Dauphin's hatred and obſtinacy ſhould render it impracticable, he was determined to take the deſperate courſe of rendering Henry maſter of France.

He reſolves to be reconciled to the Dauphin. T. Livius.

Conference of Louviers. Act. Pub. IX. p. 686. 701, 703.

At the ſame time that the Duke of Burgundy came to his laſt reſolution, the conference between the ambaſſadors of Henry and the Dauphin was held at Louviers. The ſame difficulties which occurred at the congreſs of Alenſon, rendered this fruitleſs. It was only agreed, that the King and the Dauphin ſhould meet and confer together. But this interview, the time whereof was twice prolonged, did not take effect, becauſe the Dauphin took other meaſures. However, to continue the Duke of Burgundy's jealouſy, Henry granted the Dauphin a truce, from the 12th of February till Eaſter, for all the country between the Loire and the Seine, Normandy excepted. 1419.

Truce with the Dauphin. p. 692.

The Dauphin refuſes to be reconciled with the Duke of Burgundy.

Purſuant to the Duke of Burgundy's project, he ſent and ſued for the Dauphin's friendſhip, offering, on his part, to deſerve and cultivate it to the utmoſt of his power; intimating withal, that it would be proper to have a conference together, as well mutually to confirm their reconciliation, as to concert meaſures for the welfare of the kingdom. But the Dauphin ſcornfully rejected this propoſal. He was too apprehenſive of ſharing the authority with the Queen his mother, and the Duke of Burgundy, or rather of ſeeing himſelf ſubject to them. The ſole command of the Province, that owned him for Regent, ſeemed to him preferable to the advantage propoſed, from a reconciliation, which could not be made without leaving the Queen his mother, and the Duke, a ſhare in the adminiſtration. So, the Duke of Burgundy ſaw himſelf reduced to a neceſſity, of ſeriouſly endeavouring to make a Peace with England, in caſe the Dauphin perſiſted in his obſtinacy. The Congreſs at Louviers having alarmed him, he was afraid of being prevented, and of not being afterwards ſtrong enough to reſiſt the King of England and the Dauphin, if they ſhould join in a league againſt him. He reſolved therefore, in order to free himſelf from this fear, to unravel affairs ſome way or other. To that end, he ſent Henry word, that King Charles was inclined to a Peace, and, to ſucceed the more eaſily, he propoſed an interview, where the two Kings, aſſiſted by their councils, might ſettle the terms, and conclude the intended marriage. Henry readily cloſed with the propoſal, and even granted a three months truce; that during the interval, the time, place and manner of the conference might be agreed on.

The Duke propoſes a Peace to Henry. Act. Pub. IX. p. 696, 709, 717, 724, 734, 735. Elmham.

Fruitleſs attempts to reconcile the Dauphin with the Duke of Burgundy. T. Livius. Elmham.

All France was juſtly alarmed at this reſolution. It was eaſily perceived, that the peace and marriage could not be made in ſuch a juncture, without the kingdom's being delivered to the King of England. Matters ſtanding thus, ſome Lords, who had the welfare and intereſt of their country at heart, uſed all poſſible endeavours to procure a peace, or at leaſt a truce between the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy. The Dauphin would have conſented to a three years truce, but the Duke would have it only for two months. His aim was to conclude a peace with England, if by that time he could not agree with the Dauphin. The pains taken to perſuade them to ſo neceſſary an union proving fruitleſs, the project of the interview between the two Kings was at length accompliſhed, after ſeveral prolongations, till the 30th of May. It was agreed, it ſhould be near Meulant, in a field choſen for that purpoſe, where a magnificent pavilion was ordered to be erected. As King Charles's infirmity hindered him from being preſent in perſon, it was agreed, that his Queen and the Duke of Burgundy ſhould act as his Procurators, and that the Duke of Bretagne ſhould be there. Mean time, to avoid the heats which might ariſe from the diſcuſſion of affairs, commiſſioners were appointed on both ſides to ſettle the particulars. Henry was pleaſed to give the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter the honour of being heads of this commiſſion. The court of France being at Pontoiſe, Henry came to Mante, in order to be near the place of conference. From theſe two towns it was that the two courts repaired every day to the place appointed. The firſt day (2) the Queen of France brought the Princeſs Catherine her daughter, with whom Henry was charmed. The effect of this firſt ſight being very viſible, the Queen believed ſhe ſhould inflame the deſires of that Prince, by not letting her daughter appear any more. Henry ſoon perceived her deſign. He found the Princeſs was to ſerve for a decoy to enſnare him. But, to fruſtrate the Queen's expectation, he told the Duke of Burgundy, it might be depended upon, he would never quit his arms, till he had the King and the Princeſs his daughter in his power, and had expelled him the kingdom, in caſe he oppoſed it. At any other juncture, the Duke, who was as high-ſpirited as the King, would doubtleſs have returned him a ſharp anſwer. But not to exaſperate too much a Prince, of whom he might ſoon ſtand in need, he was content with ſaying, he did not queſtion but he would have reaſon to be tired of the war.

Henry's Demands. Act. Pub. IX. p. 762.

The conference of Meulant (3) ran upon three articles, required by Henry, as previous to the peace and marriage.

I. That he ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of whatever was granted to Edward III by the treaty of Bretigny.

(1) The moſt eminent Perſons in the Engliſh Army that died during this Siege, were, Henry Beaufort Earl of Somerſet, Edmund Beaufort, Earl de Mortayne, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Blount, the Prior of Kylmainam in Ireland, and the Lord de Caſtyleygne of Gaſcony. Goodwin, p. 208-----After the Reduction of this City, King Henry eſtabliſhed there his Exchequer, Coinage, and Chamber of Accounts of the Revenues of Normandy. II. That 1419. II. That moreover all Normandy ſhould be delivered to him.

III. The full and independent ſovereignty, of whatever ſhould be reſigned to him by the preſent treaty.

As Henry would not recede from theſe articles, the Duke of Burgundy plainly ſaw, if he directly oppoſed them, he ſhould occaſion the breaking up of the conference, which it was his intereſt to continue, as the only way left to bring the Dauphin to a reconciliation. So, without diſputing, or granting the King's pretenſions, he delivered to the King the counter-demands of France. They were ſo drawn as to be liable to great objections, which he might either urge or relinquiſh, according as he ſaw what courſe the Dauphin would take. In a word, the Duke of Burgundy's aim, was to give the Dauphin a little more time, before any thing was concluded with the King of England. Theſe were the demands of France, with the King's anſwers annexed.

Demands of France. Ib. p. 763.

I. That the King of England renounce the crown of France.

The King conſents to it, provided this Clauſe be added, [except what is granted to him by the preſent treaty.]

II. That he quit claim to Touraine, Anjou, Maine, and the ſovereignty of Bretagne.

The King is not pleaſed with this article.

Probably, becauſe of the ſovereignty of Bretagne, which he claimed as Duke of Normandy.

III. The King of England ſhall ſwear, that neither he, nor his ſucceſſors, ſhall receive at any time hereafter, upon any account whatever, the ceſſion of the crown of France, from any perſon, who hath, or pretends to have a right.

The King agrees to this, provided his adverſary will alſo ſwear the ſame, &c.

IV. The King of England ſhall cauſe the renunciations, promiſes, and engagements to be recorded, as the King of France and his council ſhall think moſt adviſeable.

The King likes not this article.

V. Inſtead of Ponthieu and Montrevil, the King of France ſhall have liberty to give an equivalent in ſome other part of his kingdom, as he ſhall judge proper.

The King diſapproves of this article.

VI. As there are ſtill in Normandy ſeveral places unconquered by the King of England, which however are to be given up by the treaty, he ſhall reſign upon that account, all his other conqueſts elſewhere. Every one ſhall be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of his eſtate, in what place ſoever it lies. There ſhall be an alliance concluded between the two Kings.

The King approves of this, on condition the Scots and the Rebels be not included in the alliance.

VII. The King of England ſhall repay the ſix hundred thouſand crowns given to Richard II, in part of the eight hundred thouſand promiſed with Queen Iſabella, and moreover four hundred thouſand for that Princeſs's Jewels detained in England.

The King is willing that this article be allowed out of the arrears due for King John's ranſom. However, he is ſurprized at the demand of four hundred thouſand crowns for Queen Iſabella's Jewels, when they were not worth a quarter of that ſum.

The Duke of Burgundy's Deſigns.

It is eaſy to perceive by the nature of theſe demands, that the difficulties were not conſiderable enough to hinder the concluſion of a peace, if both parties had been equally willing. But, on the other hand, they were ſufficient to keep the treaty depending, as long as the court of France pleaſed (1). In the Duke of Burgundy's ſituation, he inſiſted upon the articles diſapproved by the King, no farther than was neceſſary for his purpoſe. He was very glad to let the King believe, the Peace was going to be concluded; as indeed it would have been, had the Dauphin perſiſted in his obſtinacy. Henry ſo little queſtioned it, that on the 5th of July, that is, about a month after the opening of the congreſs, he gave full power to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to go to Paris, and conclude the Peace in his name, with King Charles.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 774.

The Dauphin and Burgundy are reconciled. Monſtrelet. T. Livius. Elmham.

But whilſt Henry was pleaſing himſelf with this expectation, endeavours were uſing, on the other ſide, to break all his meaſures. As he had made uſe of negotiators, now with the Dauphin, then with the Duke of Burgundy, in order to ſtir up the jealouſy of both, and attain his ends, he was himſelf over-reached in his own way. The congreſs of Meulant, where the Duke of Burgundy's chief aim was to frighten the Dauphin, produced the deſired effect. The young Prince, alarmed at ſeeing ſo near a concluſion, a peace ſo very diſadvantagious to France and himſelf, believed, he ought not to refuſe any longer, to be reconciled with the Duke of Burgundy; ſince their reconciliation was the only means to prevent ſo great a misfortune. Wherefore, after ſeveral private conferences between ſome truſty friends of the two Princes, a reconciliation, ſo earneſtly deſired by all true Frenchmen, was at length brought about. On the 11th of July, they met about three miles from Meulant, in the road to Paris, and embraced one another. After that, they ſigned a treaty, mutually promiſing, to love one another like Brothers, and jointly to oppoſe the damnable enterprize of the Engliſh, the antient enemies of the kingdom. Act. Pub. IX. p. 776.

The Duke of Burgundy breaks off the Conference of Meulant. p. 786.

This ſtep being made, the Duke of Burgundy took new meaſures. As he no longer deſired the concluſion of the peace, he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted, in the conferences which were ſtill continued at Meulant, upon the demands of France. But for fear Henry ſhould deſiſt from his objections, he added ſome freſh articles. In explaining the third demand of France, he clogged it with ſo many conditions, that in all future caſes whatever, neither Henry, nor his ſucceſſors, Kings of England, could ever claim or acquire any part of that kingdom. But Henry, who was very willing to quit his pretenſions to France, as deſcended from Edward III, thought it very unreaſonable to be obliged to extend this renunciation, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, to all caſes that might happen, and could not poſſibly be foreſeen. He complained moreover, that the Duke of Burgundy required things which could not be granted, without offending God, and breaking his oaths. I do not know what this was. In fine, to render the concluſion of the Peace impracticable, the Duke attacked the King's demands, againſt which he had taken care to alledge nothing, before his reconciliation with the Dauphin. He affirmed, that, in general, they were extravagant, obſcure, ambiguous, and unreaſonable, without mentioning particulars. At the ſame time, he expected Henry ſhould accept the offers of France, abſolutely and ſimply, without any explanation. For fear, however, of being taken at his word, he refuſed to conſent that the articles already agreed, ſhould be committed to writing.

p. 790.

Hitherto Henry had imagined, for what reaſon I know not, that the Duke of Burgundy's reconciliation with the Dauphin, would be no obſtacle to the peace. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 18th of July, that is, ſeven days after their interview, Henry empowered the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to conclude his marriage with the Princeſs Catherine. It might be thought he knew nothing yet of what paſſed on the 11th, between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy, if it did not appear by a Letter in the ſame collection, that ſome of his courtiers had received intelligence of it on the 14th. He was ſo prejudiced on this occaſion, that on the 19th he impowered commiſſioners to prolong the truce. But the Duke of Burgundy's new demands, or rather his cavils at the treaty, broke off the conferences, and all went and prepared for the war.

Henry takes Pontoiſe. Des Urſins. Monſtrelet. T. Livius. Elmham.

July the 28th, Henry ordered a detachment, headed by the Duke of Clarence, to ſtorm Pontoiſe. This enterpriſe was attended with the expected ſucceſs. L'Iſle Adam, the governor, little thinking of being attacked, was ſurpriſed and forced to fly with part of the garriſon (2). As the court of France reſided in this town, during the congreſs of Meulant, and were gone but a few days, the Engliſh Soldiers found it ſtill full of the baggage of the courtiers. The booty is ſaid to amount to above two millions of crowns.

A great Booty.

The Poſture of Henry's Affairs.

The taking of Pontoiſe opened the King a way to the very gates of Paris. But, however, the poſture of his affairs was not changed for the better, ſince the union of the two Factions by which France was divided. Whilſt they were deſtroying one another, an army of twenty-five thouſand Men was ſufficient for the conqueſt of Normandy. No enemy had appeared to force him to raiſe his ſieges. Moreover, he had been all along, publickly or privately, favoured by one of the Factions. But after their reconciliation, he could hardly expect, with his own forces alone, to accompliſh his enterpriſe. He aimed at no leſs than the conqueſt of the whole kingdom, or at leaſt of what England had loſt ſince the treaty

1419. treaty of Bretigny. And yet, after a ſix years war, and in ſo favourable junctures, he was maſter but of one ſingle Province. He knew alſo, that in England, his obſtinate continuation of ſo hazardous a war, was not univerſally approved; and that it was openly ſaid, the conqueſt of France would be the ruin of England. But this was not the only thing that gave him uneaſineſs. He had juſt received a letter from Bayonne, of the 22d of July, informing him, that a powerful fleet (1) was equipping in Caſtile for the Dauphin's aſſiſtance. Shortly after, he received another from the Mayor of the ſame town, acquainting him, that Arragon had declared for the Dauphin; that the Caſtilians and Arragonians were now entered Bearn, were ravaging the country about Bayonne, and ſeemed to have a deſign to beſiege the town. The letter added further, that the Caſtilian fleet was ordered to ſail for Scotland, and tranſport from thence a body of troops into France, to ſerve under the Dauphin. On the other hand, he could not doubt but the Flemings, who had refuſed to ſerve the Duke of Burgundy againſt France, would be ready to obey him, in defence of that kingdom. Notwithſtanding theſe ſudden accumulated difficulties, he perſiſted in his firſt reſolution. He had even the aſſurance, to offer King Charles, as a ſort of favour, that he would be contented with what he had demanded at Meulant, on condition Pontoiſe, which he had juſt taken, were confirmed to him. It is however undeniable, he ſhould have been greatly embaraſſed. When he undertook the war, he depended upon the diſſenſions of the French. And to theſe diſſentions was owing the eaſe wherewith he had hitherto conquered. Mean while, he ſaw himſelf obliged to undertake, with an inconſiderable army, the conqueſt of a kingdom, of which he yet poſſeſſed but a ſmall part. However, his good fortune, or rather the Dauphin's animoſity againſt the Duke of Burgundy, happily freed him from this embaraſſment.

The Dauphin cauſes the Duke of Burgundy to be aſſaſſinated. P. Æmyl. l. 10. T. Livius. Elmham.

In the interview between the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy, they agreed to meet again on the bridge of Montereau-Faut-Yonne, the 18th of Auguſt, to conſider how to proſecute the war againſt the Engliſh. The Duke was extremely unwilling to go to the place appointed. He ſeemed to have a ſurmiſe of what was to happen. However, as a too great miſtruſt might have broke his meaſures, and rendred what had been done ineffectual, he reſolved to perform his engagement. Not to enter into the particulars, mentioned in all the French hiſtories, I ſhall only ſay, the Dauphin cauſed the Duke to be aſſaſſinated, on the very bridge choſen for their conference. I ſay, the Dauphin, whatever pains ſome hiſtorians have taken to clear him. The deed was done before his eyes, and at his feet, and he ſtill kept the murderers in his ſervice, who were the chief officers of his houſhold. This would be a ſufficient proof of his guilt, though there were no hiſtorians faithful enough freely to own it.

The Face of Affairs changed.

This accident ſuddenly changed the face of affairs. Probably the Duke of Burgundy, at the time of his death, was well-affected to France. But Philip his Son and ſucceſſor, ſuffering himſelf to be tranſported with the deſire of revenging his Father's death, did not ſcruple to ruin the kingdom, in order to gratify his paſſion. The ſpeedieſt and moſt effectual means to attain his ends, was to make a league with the King of England, and Queen Iſabella, mortal enemy of the Dauphin her Son. Accordingly, all the reſt of the year was ſpent in ſecret negotiations, which ended at laſt in putting the kingdom into the hands of the Engliſh. Mean while, the new Duke of Burgundy held the poſt enjoyed by the Duke his Father. That is, being maſter of the King's perſon, he was conſidered as regent, by thoſe who were not in obedience to the Dauphin.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 805, 806.

The Pariſians apply to Henry. Ib. p. 747, 810.

Since the taking of Pontoiſe, the court of France was removed, by reaſon of the continual inroads of the Engliſh to the very gates of Paris. Mean while, the Pariſians ſaw themſelves in manifeſt danger. The Duke of Burgundy being wholly engroſſed by revenge, provided not for the defence of Paris. Whereupon, the inhabitants, juſtly alarmed at ſo dangerous a neighbourhood, thought it their duty to try to prevent their ruin, by an agreement with Henry. There were ſeveral negotiations, which ended in a ſeparate truce for Paris, from the 20th, to the 25th, of November (2). This was but ſmall comfort to the Pariſians: but as the treaty between the King and the Duke of Burgundy was going to be concluded, they had no occaſion for a longer truce, ſince they were to be included in the treaty. Beſides, Henry did not mean to deprive himſelf of the advantage, which the neighbourhood of Pontoiſe gave him upon the Pariſians, in caſe the treaty he was negotiating with the Duke of Burgundy, ſhould be broken by ſome unforeſeen accident. After the Duke of Burgundy's death, couriers and envoys continually paſſed between the King and the new Duke. Henry refuſed not to make the ſame alliance with him, as with the deceaſed. But having been deceived by the Father, he would not run the hazard of being deceived by the Son. So, before he joined with him againſt the Dauphin, he reſolved to ſecure a peace with King Charles (3). 1419.

They obtain a ſhort truce. p. 815. Elmham.

At the congreſs of Meulant, Henry had limited his pretenſions to the articles of the treaty of Bretigny, with the addition of Normandy. But though, after the breaking up of the conferences, he had made a ſhew of keeping to theſe terms without relaxation, it is to be ſuppoſed, if the Duke of Burgundy's murder had not, very ſeaſonably, happened, he would have conſiderably lowered his demands. At leaſt, the poſture of affairs would have left him no room, to expect to compel France ever to grant him ſo great advantages. After the death of that Duke, the ſcene was changed in his favour. So, finding he was earneſtly courted by Queen Iſabella, and the new Duke of Burgundy, he did not queſtion but it was in his power, to impoſe upon France what terms he pleaſed. He forgot therefore his offers at Meulant, and reſumed his former pretenſions to the crown of France, with the condition that Charles IV, ſhould be King during life. Theſe are the articles he propoſed as a foundation for peace.

Henry claims the Crown of France.

Preliminary Articles of the Peace. Act. Pub. IX. p. 816.

I. That he ſhould eſpouſe the Princeſs Catherine, without any charge to her relations, or the Kingdom.

II. That he would not diſturb King Charles in the enjoyment of the crown, or poſſeſſion of the revenues of the Kingdom, during his life. That his Queen Iſabella ſhould likewiſe enjoy, during her life, the rights annexed to her dignity.

III. That after the death of King Charles, the crown of France ſhould deſcend to the King of England and his heirs for ever.

IV. That by reaſon of King Charles's infirmity, which rendered him uncapable to reign, the King of England ſhould take upon him the adminiſtration of affairs, as regent, during the life of the King his Father-in-law.

V. That the Princes, Nobles, Corporations, Burgeſſes, &c. ſhould take an oath to the King of England as Regent, and bind themſelves by the ſame oath to own him for Sovereign after the death of King Charles.

VI. That for ſecurity of the performance of theſe articles, the King of France ſhould give the King of England his Letters Patents under his Great Seal. That he ſhould cauſe the like letters of approbation to be given him by the Queen, the Duke of Burgundy, the Nobles, &c. in clear and plain terms, as ſhould be agreed by the parties.

VII. That the King of England would give and cauſe to be given the like letters.

Approved by the Duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub. IX. p. 822. Sept. 25.

Henry's pretenſions being thus ſettled in theſe few fundamental articles, the Duke of Burgundy ſigned Letters Patents (4), whereby he approved of theſe articles as good, beneficial, reaſonable, and tending to the welfare of France and all Chriſtendom. This done, a general truce was publiſhed from the 24th of December to the 1ſt of March next. As ſoon as the affair concerning the peace was ended, the plenipotentiaries of the King and the Duke of Burgundy ſigned a private treaty of alliance, containing theſe ſix articles:

Treaty between Henry and the Duke of Burgundy. Ib. p. 825. Monſtrelet.

I. That one of the King's Brothers ſhould marry a Siſter (5) of the Duke of Burgundy.

II. That the King and Duke ſhould love and aſſiſt one another like Brothers.

III. That they ſhould jointly endeavour to puniſh the Dauphin, and his accomplices in the late Duke of Burgundy's murder.

IV. That if the Dauphin, or any of the murderers, were taken priſoners, they ſhould not be releaſed without the Duke of Burgundy's conſent.

V. That the King of England ſhould cauſe to be aſſigned to the Duke, and his Dutcheſs, Daughter of King Charles, Lands adjoining to his Demeſns in France, of

VI. That if any perſon hereafter, under colour of his marriage with a daughter of France, ſhould claim the like aſſignment of Lands, the Duke ſhould aſſiſt the King to the utmoſt of his power to prevent it.

1420. This treaty was ratified by the two Princes in the beginning of January (2) 1420.

Though the peace was not yet ſigned, it was looked upon as concluded, ſince the terms were agreed. Henry was ſo ſecure of it, that January the 24th, that is, four months before the ſigning of the treaty, he promiſed by his Letters Patents, to maintain the Pariſians in their privileges when King of France.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 854.

Mean while, as it was neceſſary to draw the articles agreed in the moſt exact form, and to avoid all obſcure and ambiguous expreſſions, it required ſome time; this occaſioned the truce to be frequently prolonged. During that time, Henry had ambaſſadors at Troye, to draw up the treaty of peace jointly with the Duke of Burgundy. For the greater precaution, it was firſt digeſted like preliminary articles, that every one might examine what was to be added, retrenched, or explained. This done, Charles confirmed all the articles by his Letters Patents, dated April the 9th. It is remarkable, that by the XXI, Henry was to ſwear, that upon no occaſion whatever, during the Life of King Charles, he would take upon him the title of King of France. And yet we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, one of his ordinances, dated April 18, for coining new money in Normandy, with an H on one ſide, and theſe words round it: Sit Nomen Domini Benedictum; and on the other, Henricus Francorum Rex (3).

p. 890. After the preliminaries were approved, an interview between the two Kings was agreed, for ſwearing and ſigning the treaty. This interview was to be ſomewhere near Troye: But afterwards Henry conſented it ſhould be in Troye itſelf. As King Charles was not fit to appear in publick, the Queen and the Duke of Burgundy were empowered to ſwear the peace in his name. Henry being come to Troye (4), May the 20th, found there the King of France, the Queen and the Princeſs Catherine, to whom he preſented a ring of great value. On the morrow, the treaty was ſigned and ſworn with the uſual formalities, and the ſame Day Henry was affianced to the Princeſs, but the marriage was not conſummated till the 2d of June. Treaty of Troye. p. 896.

" I. THE King of England being now Son of the " King of France, by his marriage with the " Princeſs Catherine, ſhall honour the King and Queen " of France, as his Father and Mother, &c.

" II. He ſhall not diſturb the King of France during " his life, in the quiet poſſeſſion of the royal dignity, " and revenues of the crown. In like manner, Queen " Iſabella, whilſt ſhe lives, ſhall enjoy the royal dignity, " with the rents, revenues, honours and prerogatives be- " longing to the Queen of France.

" III. Queen Catherine ſhall have for her dowry in " England, forty thouſand crowns a year, as the Queens " of that nation uſually had.

" IV. This dowry ſhall be ſo ſettled upon her, that " ſhe may enjoy it from the day of the King her Huſ- " band's death.

" V. If ſhe ſurvive the King her Husband, there ſhall " be paid to her out of France a yearly revenue of twenty " thouſand Livres, to be raiſed upon the Lands belonging " formerly to Queen Blanch, wife of Philip.

" VI. After the death of King Charles, the crown of " France, with all its rights and dominions, ſhall remain " to the King of England and his heirs.

" VII. As the King of France is frequently rendered " by his infirmity uncapable to reign, the King of Eng- " land ſhall from this day be Regent of the kingdom, " and govern it according to Juſtice and Equity, with the " advice of the Princes, Peers, Barons, and Nobles of " the kingdom.

" VIII. The Parliament of Paris ſhall be maintained 1420. " in their juriſdiction over the places ſubject to the King.

" IX. The King of England ſhall preſerve the privi- " leges, rights, liberties, immunities and cuſtoms of the " Peers, Nobles, Communities, and of all the King's " ſubjects in general.

" X. Juſtice ſhall be adminiſtred according to the " laws, cuſtoms and uſages of the realm.

" XI. All the offices, as well civil as military, ſhall be " filled with perſons duly qualified, according to the laws " of the realm.

" XII. The King of England ſhall endeavour to the " utmoſt of his power, to reduce to the obedience of the " King, all the provinces, cities, and towns, which have " withdrawn their allegiance, and joined the party, com- " monly called the Dauphin's or Armagnac's.

" XIII. All the Princes, Peers, Barons, Nobles, " States, as well ſpiritual as temporal, Cities, Commu- " nities, Burghers, &c. ſhall ſwear, 1. Punctually to " obſerve what ſhall be enjoined by the two Kings and " the preſent Queen. 2. To obey the King of England " as Regent. 3. To recognize him after the death of " King Charles for their lawful Sovereign, and to obey " none but him. 4. Not to aſſiſt, with their counſel or " conſent, any plot againſt his perſon, and to diſcover to " him all ſuch conſpiracies as ſhall come to their know- " ledge.

" XIV. All the conqueſts which ſhall be made here- " after, in the kingdom of France, Normandy excepted, " ſhall be to the uſe of the preſent King. Item, All the " Lands and Lordſhips, which ſhall be conquered, ſhall " be reſtored to their true proprietors, being in obedience " to the King, and having ſworn to obſerve the preſent " treaty.

" XV. All the Eccleſiaſticks of Normandy, ſubject to " the King of England, and paying obedience to King " Charles, or that are of the Burgundian party, upon " ſwearing the preſent treaty, ſhall enjoy their benefices, " as well in Normandy, as elſewhere.

" XVI. All the Norman Eccleſiaſticks holding bene- " fices in France, ſhall be continued in them upon the " ſame terms.

" XVII. The Univerſities and Colleges, as well in " Normandy, as in France, ſhall be preſerved in their " rights and privileges, on the fore-mentioned condi- " tions, ſaving to the crown of France its preroga- " tives.

" XVIII. When the King of England ſhall come to " the crown of France, Normandy and all his other con- " queſts ſhall be united to the crown.

" XIX. If the King of England has already diſpoſed in " Normandy of any lands, revenues, or poſſeſſions, be- " longing to any of the Burgundian party, they ſhall " have an equivalent in France, out of the lands of the " Rebels. And if they receive not this equivalent, before " the ſaid King is in poſſeſſion of the crown of France, " he promiſes to give it when he aſcends the throne. But " what he has not diſpoſed of, ſhall be reſtored to the " proprietors, according to article XIV.

" XX. All the publick acts ſhall run in King Charles's " name. However, as ſome unforeſeen caſes may occur, " where the King of England may be obliged to diſpatch " orders, then it ſhall be lawful for him to join his name, " as Regent, with the preſent King's.

" XXI. The King of England ſhall forbear, on all " occaſions, during the Life of King Charles, to aſſume " the title of King of France.

" XXII. In the publick Acts, the King of France, " ſpeaking of the King of England, ſhall uſe this form, " Our moſt dear Son, Henry King of England, Heir of " France (5).

" XXIII. The King of England ſhall lay no taxes on " the French, but ſuch as are reaſonable, and for the good " of the publick, according to the laws and cuſtoms of " the kingdom.

" XXIV. When he himſelf, or any of his heirs, ſhall " come to the crown of France, the two kingdoms of " France and England ſhall be for ever united, under one " Prince. Sens taken, Act. Pub. IX. p. 910. and Monterau. Walſing. T. Livius. Elmham.

The marriage being conſummated (3) June the 2d, the two courts ſet out together next morning for Sens, which was now inveſted. This place holding out but ten or twelve days, the army marched to Montereau, where the Duke of Burgundy was murdered, and took the town in a ſhort time. The Duke of Burgundy found there the body of his Father, very indecently buried in his doublet, and ordered it to be removed to Dijon.

Melun beſieged, Act. Pub. X. p. 4. Walſing. T. Livius. and taken.

About the middle of July, the army laid ſiege to Melun, which was defended by the Lord De Barbazan, the governor, four months. The King of England, with his army, was lodged on the ſide of the town towards Gatinois, and the Duke of Burgundy, with his troops, on the ſide next La Brie. This ſiege became famous by the ſtout defence of the Beſieged (4), who repulſed ſeveral aſ- ſaults, and whom famine compelled at laſt to capitulate, about the middle of November. A French hiſtorian ſays, the capitulation was not obſerved, by which the garriſon were to have their lives without ranſom, except ſuch as were concerned in the murder of the Duke of Burgundy; but inſtead of being ſuffered to depart, they were thrown into priſon at Paris, and ſtarved to death. To judge of the truth of this fact, it is neceſſary to ſee the articles of ſurrender, and to know, whether thoſe that were carried to Paris, were not ſuch as were expreſsly excepted. It is the more likely they were really of this number, becauſe the ſame author ſays, the King, and the Duke of Burgundy, demanded four and twenty hoſtages by name, and that theſe hoſtages were conveyed to Paris, with as many more as could be ſeized. This ſeems to argue, that the garriſon were releaſed, and none but private perſons ſei- zed, who might be ſuſpected, as well as the hoſtages, of being concerned in the Duke of Burgundy's death. Be this as it will, as Henry ought not to be excuſed in caſe of breach of faith, ſo neither ought a too haſty credit to be given to a ſingle hiſtorian, who appears, in other reſpects, exceeding partial againſt Henry, and even refrains not from abuſive language. After the ſurrender of Melun, the two courts returned to Paris, where the two Kings made their entry together, on the firſt Sunday in Advent, and the Queens, the next day.

The States of France confirm the Peace of Troye. Act. Pub. X. p. 30. T. Livius.

In the beginning of December, the States General met at Paris. King Charles going to the aſſembly on the 6th, told them, that of his own free will, he had made a peace with the King of England, was perſuaded it would be beneficial to France, and deſired them to confirm it by their authority. The King's declaration in his preſent condition, was not a ſufficient reaſon to induce the States to ratify a peace, which, according to their principles, vio- lated the moſt ſacred rights of the kingdom, in order to ſet the crown on the head of a foreign Prince. But in the ſtate they themſelves were in, it was ſcarce in their power to examine the conſequences, or freely to ſpeak their minds. So it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the peace of Troye ſhould be obſerved, and held as a publick law, and that all the French ſhould be obliged to take the oaths mentioned in the treaty. This is not a proper place to examine Henry's pretenſions to the crown of France. They were the ſame as were formerly urged by Edward III, and of which I have amply ſpoken in the hiſtory of his reign. But however, it may be ſaid, that when the French ſwore to this peace, they thought it very unjuſt, and conſequently there could be but little reliance on oaths, which they conſidered as involuntary. Ac- cordingly, they plainly ſhowed afterwards, they valued them not. And yet Henry, with all his policy, depended upon theſe extorted promiſes, as if the French then living, had been more ſcrupulous, than thoſe who had ſworn to the peace of Bretigny. 1420.

Sentence upon the Murde- rers of the Duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub. IX. p. 33. Monſtrelet. T. Livius. Elmham.

On the 23d of the ſame month, King Charles's coun- cil being ſummoned for the purpoſe, the Duke of Bur- gundy appeared in a mourning habit, and demanded Ju- ſtice againſt the murderers of the Duke his Father. Me- zerai ſays, the Dauphin was ſolemnly called to the Mar- ble-Table (5), and not appearing, was attainted and con- victed of cauſing the Duke of Burgundy to be killed; pro- nounced unworthy of all inheritance, particularly of the ſucceſſion to the crown (6); and baniſhed the realm for ever. It is hard to believe, ſuch a hiſtorian would ad- vance ſuch a fact, without good authority. And yet this ſentence, which is extant in the Collection of the Pub- lick Acts, mentions neither the ſucceſſion to the crown, nor the baniſhment of the Dauphin. The ſentence is gene- ral, againſt all the murderers of the Duke of Burgundy, without naming the Dauphin, or his accomplices, at leaſt in the Purvieu. It is true, that in the preamble, there is men- tion of the treaty between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy, and that afterwards it is ſaid, the Duke of Bar- gundy was killed by him; which words, by him, manifeſt- ly relate to the Dauphin, named a few lines before. It ap- pears however, that the ſentence was ſo worded, that the Dauphin was included only in the general notion of the murderers of the Duke of Burgundy (7), and that it does not ſeem to point particularly at him. Conſequently, it was not natural to ſpeak of the ſucceſſion to the crown. Probably therefore, Mezerai had more regard to the in- tent of the decree, than to the words themſelves.

The Dauphin appeals to God and his Sword. Paradin.

The Dauphin finding all ſorts of means were uſed to deprive him of the crown, appealed to God and his ſword, from whatever had been hitherto, or ſhould be for the future, tranſacted againſt him, in the name of the King his Father, and continued ſtill to aſſume the title of Regent. As ſuch, he removed the Parliament and Univerſity of Paris, to Poictiers, where ſome of the members of theſe two bodies repaired. Thus were ſeen at the ſame time in France, two Kings, two Queens, two Regents, all the officers of the crown double, ſeven or eight Marſhals of France on each ſide, two Parliaments, and two Univerſi- ties of Paris (8).

Though Henry was declared Regent, and Heir of France, it was however only by the Burgundian party, who hav- ing the King in their power, thought they had a right to diſpoſe of the affairs of the kingdom. The Dauphin had ſtill a ſtrong party, who, far from ſubmitting to the peace of Troye, maintained, that though the King had been free, and in perfect health, he could not diſpoſe of the crown as he had done, much leſs, being diſtempered, and a captive. The provinces diſtant from Paris, not being awed by the Engliſh arms, adhered for the moſt part to the Dauphin. Even the country about the Me- tropolis was divided. In the ſame Province, there were ſome places for the Engliſh, and others for the lawful heir of the King. So, notwithſtanding the peace, the war was not yet ended, ſince the two Kings were under a neceſſity of driving the Dauphin out of all the towns

Pardon granted to the Gaſcon Rebels.

Guienne, part of which was ſubject to Henry, was moreover a very conſiderable advantage, as it ſerved to keep in awe the Provinces beyond the Loire. Till the death of Armagnac the conſtable, this Province had rather been a charge, than a benefit to the Engliſh. There was a conſtant occaſion for a ſtanding army, to defend it againſt the continual attempts of the party, which had declared for France, about the end of the reign of Edward III.

Act. Pub. X. p. 3.

The houſes of Armagnac and Albret, who were at the head of this party, had created the King of England great trouble, particularly after the Earl of Armagnac came to have the management of the publick affairs. But after the death of that Earl, the heads of the party thought fit, as I ſaid, to make a truce with Henry, in order not to favour the Duke of Burgundy by their diverſion. After the treaty of Troye, they ſued for peace, as believing they could no longer reſiſt. Henry hoping to reap great advantages by the quiet poſſeſſion of Guienne, readily received them into favour, and ordered letters of pardon to be given them (1), upon their renouncing, by a publick inſtrument, the appeal of their anceſtors, to the court of the Peers of France, in the time of Edward III. that by the peace of Troye, Guienne was to be united to the crown of France, after the death of Charles VI. But, beſides that in the treaty of Troye, there is no mention of Guienne, it plainly appears, by what has been related, that Henry had no ſuch intention. It is rather evident, that he grounded on the treaty of Bretigny, his preſerving, as King of England, the ſovereignty of Guienne, independent on the crown of France.

Henry having ſettled his affairs in France, in ſo glorious a manner for himſelf and his nation, reſolved to return into England, where three things required his preſence. A Parliament called. The King goes to York. Walſing.

Whilſt the People were buſy in chuſing their repreſentatives, the King took a progreſs into ſeveral counties, and ſtayed ſome weeks at York. His aim was, under colour of ſhowing the Queen the country, to procure by his preſence, elections of members that ſhould be favourable to him. He was ſenſible of the nation's diſcontent, at being obliged to bear the expences of the conqueſt of France.

A Proclamation againſt the Pope's Collations.

Some ſay, it was during this progreſs, that the King iſſued a proclamation, prohibiting the admiſſion of Eccleſiaſticks into benefices, by the Pope's proviſions, contrary to the rights of the Patrons. But it is more likely, this proclamation was not iſſued till after the Parliament of Leiceſter, purſuant to an act made for that purpoſe. Be this as it will, it was a mortal blow to the court of Rome, to whom the clauſe of Non-obſtante, ſo frequently uſed by the Popes, became fruitleſs, at leaſt with regard to the collation of benefices.

The Duke of Clarence is ſlain. Monſtrelet. Walſing. Elmham.

Before the meeting of the Parliament, Henry received the ſad news, that the Duke of Clarence his Brother, was ſlain, April the 3d, in a battle in Anjou. The Duke had led ten thouſand Men into that Province, to reduce it to the obedience of the King. Whilſt he was employed in this expedition, he heard, that the Earl of Buchan, with ſeven thouſand Scots, had entered the Province, and was encamped at Baugé. At the ſame time, he had falſe intelligence, that the vanguard of the Scotch army was ſo far from the main body, that it would be eaſy to put them to rout, provided they were ſpeedily attacked. Upon this information, he haſtily headed his horſe, leaving the Earl of Salisbury orders to follow him, with the reſt of the army. When he came to Baugé, he found indeed ſome Scotch troops intrenched in the Church-yard. He charged them immediately, and diſmounted in order to head his troops. But he was ſo long in forcing the Scots from this poſt, that the Earl of Buchan had time to come to their relief. Then the Duke remounting his horſe, furiouſly attacked the newcomers, notwithſtanding the inequality of his forces. He gave, on this occaſion, proofs of an uncommon valour; but at length, being over-powered by numbers, and unable to bear the thoughts of flying, he was wounded in the face by a Scotch Knight (4), and killed by the Earl of Buchan himſelf. His death cauſed an entire defeat of Walſing. the Engliſh horſe, whereof fifteen hundred were ſlain (5), and many taken priſoners (6). Among the ſlain were, the Earl of Kent, the Lords Grey and Roſs, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The Earl of Salisbury, not being able to advance in time to aſſiſt the Duke of Clarence, had however the comfort to recover from the enemy, the body of that Prince, which he ſent to the King his Brother (7).

The Parliament confirms the Peace of Troye, and grants a Subſidy. Act. Pub. X. p. 110.

The advantage gained by the Scots, rendered the King's preſence neceſſary in France. But he had ſtill in England affairs, which were no leſs urgent. The Parliament meeting the 2d of May, readily confirmed the peace of Troye ſo glorious to England. A ſubſidy was alſo granted (8) for proſecuting the war againſt the Dauphin; but at the ſame time was preſented to him a petition, wherein he was told, it was but too true, that the conqueſt of France proved the ruin of England. To obtain this ſubſidy, the King had laid before the Parliament, a ſtate of the revenues and expences of the crown. By this account, a fragment whereof is inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, it appears, that the King's revenue amounted but to fifty five thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-three pounds Sterling; and that the ordinary expences ran away with fifty two thouſand two hundred and thirty-five pounds; ſo there remained but three thouſand five hundred and eight pounds, to provide for a dozen extraordinary articles, mentioned in the account. The Parliament's petition could not but be very diſpleaſing to the King. One half of France was ſtill unconquered, and the Provinces ſubject to the King were ſo drained, that there was no proſpect of drawing from thence, the neceſſary ſupplies for continuing the war. Wherefore, the burden was ſtill to fall upon England. But the Parliament grew weary of furniſhing money, at a time, when it was more neceſſary than ever, by reaſon of the diverſion the kingdom was threatned with from the Scots.

They preſent a Petition to the King.

State of the publick Revenues and Expences. p. 113.

Affairs of Scotland with regard to England, ſince the Beginning of this Reign. Buchanan.

I have deferred till now, to ſpeak of the affairs of Scotland, becauſe ſince the acceſſion of Henry V to the crown of England, nothing had paſſed in Scotland, remarkable enough to break the thread of the Hiſtory. But at preſent, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention them, for the underſtanding of the ſequel. It was ſeen in the late reign, that in 1406, James Stuart, then Prince of Scotland, was detained in England, and ſhortly after became King of Scotland, by the death of his Father. This new dignity was ſo far from turning to his advantage, that it rather ſerved to cauſe him to be more ſtrictly guarded. The Duke of Albany his uncle, who had aſſumed the regency, liked it too well, to endeavour effectually to procure his liberty. Not a year paſſed, but he ſent ambaſſadors into England (9), under colour of ſolliciting the freedom of the King his nephew; but his real intention was far from what he ſeemed to deſire. The chief motive of theſe frequent embaſſies, was to negotiate the exchange of the Earl of Fife his Son, for young Percy, Son of the Earl of Northumberland. The Earl had been priſoner in England, ever ſince the battle of Halidon: Percy was ſeized in Scotland by way of repriſal for the King. This exchange was effected, and yet the embaſſies were no leſs frequent. It was ever on pretence of treating about the young King's releaſe, but in reality to influence the King of England, to detain him in priſon. Buchanan affirms, it was on condition the Regent would engage not to diſturb Henry, by diverſions in favour of France. Otherwiſe, the Scots would never have ſo peaceably ſeen France attacked by the Engliſh. Mean while, as to induce the Scots to remain quiet contrary to their intereſt, it was neceſſary to give

On the contrary, the difficulties he raised in this affair, were a sure means to prevent diversions from the Scots.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 299, 302, 303, 307, 310.

In 1415, whilst Henry was preparing to pass into France, he received advice from the Northern Frontiers, that the Scots were resolved to besiege Berwick, with sixty thousand Men; whereupon the Duke of Bedford had orders to levy an army. But it does not appear, either that the Scots did then besiege Berwick, or the Duke of Bedford marched against them. The English historians say, the King, upon the above-mentioned advice, called a council, to deliberate, whether it was proper to relinquish the intended project against France, and heartily apply to the conquest of Scotland, and that it was resolved the first design should be pursued (1). This may be, but, very probably, the King was then agreed with the Duke of Albany; and the rumour of the invasion, and the meeting of the council in England, was only to make the people of Scotland believe, the Regent acted with sincerity. And indeed, we do not find in the history of Scotland any signs of so considerable an armament, in the year 1415, or of a resolution to besiege Berwick. Besides, that very year a truce was concluded between the two kingdoms, whilst all Henry's forces were employed in France. In short, Buchanan affirms, it cannot be said, that during the whole reign of Henry V, there was any war between England and Scotland; all the hostilities being nothing else but mere robberies. He alleges as a reason, that the Duke of Albany took care not to disoblige the King of England, for fear the King of Scotland should be released. Henry was however afraid, it would not always be in the Regent's power to keep the Scots quiet, who were so much concerned to prevent the ruin of France. It was doubtless from this consideration, that in 1416, he gave King James leave to pass some time in his own kingdom, having taken security for his return. He hoped this journey would create between the Uncle and Nephew such dissentions, as would divert the Scots from all thoughts of assisting France.

Ib. p. 341, 417.

The affairs of Scotland continued in this posture till 1419, when the Dauphin sent thither the Duke of Vendome to desire assistance. The States being met upon this occasion, the Regent could not hinder the decreeing a levy of seven thousand Men, which were sent into France under the command of the Earl of Buchan. The victory that General gained over the Duke of Clarence at Baugé, procured him the sword of Constable of France.

Ib. p. 791. T. X. p. 125.

Henry could not without concern see the Scots declare so openly for the Dauphin. He perceived, either that the Duke of Albany had not the same credit as formerly, or had altered his maxims. Wherefore, to break the measures of the Dauphin's adherents in Scotland, he believed it necessary to gain the King of Scotland to his interest, and make him his instrument. This was partly his design in returning to England. Upon his arrival, he intimated to that Prince, that it was his own fault if he was not at liberty, on condition he would use his authority to recall his Subjects, who were in the service of France, and join with him against the Dauphin. James passionately longing to be free, after a fifteen years captivity, very readily complied with Henry's desires. A private agreement therefore was made between these two Princes, the articles whereof are unknown, except one, which was, that James should go into France, and stay with Henry, until the end of the war. Henry's aim was to interpose the King of Scotland's authority, to oblige the seven thousand Scots in the Dauphin's service to return home. Accordingly, James attended him into France for that purpose. But when he commanded the Earl of Buchan to return into Scotland, the Earl replied, he did not think himself bound to obey him, so long as he was in the power of others. For that reason, Henry from thenceforward treated as rebels, all the Scots that fell into his hands.

The King returns to Paris. Ib. p. 108, 116, 127, 129.

Henry having finished the affairs which called him into England, left his Queen there, great with Child; and appointing the Duke of Bedford, his Brother, Regent in his absence, returned into France, where his presence was necessary. He sailed the 10th of June with a new-raised army (2), amounting, as some say, to four thousand Men at arms, and twenty-four thousand Archers. When he arrived at Calais, he sent several detachments to take some castles, the Dauphin still held in Picardy. At the same time, he ordered a considerable body to march to the Duke of Exeter's relief, who was almost blocked up in Paris. Then marching himself with the rest of the army, he came to Bois de Vincennes, from whence he went and joined his Father-in-law at Paris. 1421. Walsing. Monstrelet. Le Fevre. Elmham.

A few days after, he heard the Dauphin was before Chartres, and began to batter the town. As he desired nothing so earnestly as to decide the quarrel by a battle, he immediately assembled his troops, and marched directly to Chartres. But his forces were so superior, that the Dauphin did not think fit to expect him. Henry pursued him with all possible speed, but finding he could not overtake him, attacked Dreux, which surrendered upon terms (3). It is said, that during this siege, a Hermit came and boldly reproached him with the calamities brought on France by his ambition, and threatened him with the judgments of God. Some add, that Henry's death, which happened the next year, showed the Hermit to be inspired. But such consequences are not always just. The Dauphin besieges Chartres, but retires upon Henry's coming. Henry takes Dreux. Monstrelet. Elmham.

After the siege of Dreux, the army being seized with the flux, Henry sent his troops into Summer-quarters, and refreshed himself at Paris. He re-assembled them in October, in order to besiege Meaux, though the season was not very proper for such an undertaking. Mezerai, and some others, are mistaken in saying, this siege was laid before the King went to England. It is certain, it was not begun till four months after his return (4). The same historian says further, this place held out three months, but he should have said seven, since the siege began the 6th of October 1421, and ended not till the 2d of May 1422. It is true, as the town was divided into two parts; namely, the town and the Market-place (5), the first was taken by storm during the winter; but the Market-place held out till May (6). He returns to Paris. He besieges Meaux. Monstrelet. Act. Pub. X. p. 212.

Whilst the King was employed in the siege of Meaux, he received the agreeable news of his Queen's being safely delivered at Windsor, of a Prince (7), who was named Henry. The Duke of Bedford, and the Bishop of Winchester stood godfathers, and Jaquelina countess of Hainault, godmother. This Princess, who had united under her dominion, Hainault, Holland, Zeland, and Friseland, was married first to John Duke of Touraine, second Son of the King of France. This Prince dying in 1416, she espoused John Duke of Brabant, Cousin-German to the Duke of Burgundy. She soon grew weary of her second husband, and under colour of their being too nearly related, formed a design to have the marriage annulled. For that purpose, she procured some Knights to carry her away, and convey her into England, in order to act more freely. This pretended rape, was no secret to the King, since we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a safe conduct for this Princess. Besides, at her arrival in England, the King assigned her a monthly pension of a hundred pounds Sterling. His intent was, to marry her to the Duke of Gloucester, and by that means, put his Brother in possession of four of the noblest Provinces of the Low-Countries. The Duke of Burgundy was extremely offended, at the King's disregard for the Duke of Brabant his cousin, in giving Jaquelina a refuge in his dominions. This affront, in his opinion, reflected upon himself. Besides, it was his interest, that Jaquelina's marriage with the Duke of Brabant, should not be annulled. Mean while, Henry preferring the Duke of Gloucester's interest, to the Duke of Burgundy's, did not seem much to mind the occasion of complaint given that Prince. Birth of Prince Henry. Henry was exceeding desirous of advancing his two Brothers, who were both Princes of great merit, and with whom he was well pleased. In 1419, there was a secret negotiation between him and Joan Queen of Naples, who being pressed by her enemies, promised to adopt the Duke of Bedford, and declare him her sole heir. This project failing, upon Queen Joan's affairs taking a new turn, Henry would have obtained for the Duke of Bedford, the only daughter of Frederic Burgrave of Nuremberg, and afterwards, a daughter of the Duke of The King projects Marriages for his Brothers. Ib. p. 701, 705.

It was not till the beginning of May (1) 1422, that the Beſieged of the Market-Place of Meaux, deſired to capitulate, but they could obtain no other Capitulation, than to be Priſoners of War. The King even excepted all the Engliſh, Iriſh, and Scots, who were in the Place, and all that were concerned in the Death of the Duke of Burgundy; and moreover, all thoſe who had any Towns or Caſtles in their Power, till they were ſurrendered. In fine, he reſerved four Officers of the Garriſon, namely, Lewis du Guaſt, Dennis de Vaurus, the Baſtard of Vaurus, and another, to be proceeded againſt according to the Juſtice of the Laws. They were all four executed. Du Guaſt was beheaded, and the other three ſuffered a more ignominious Death. The Baſtard of Vaurus was hanged on a certain Tree, from him called the Tree of Vaurus, becauſe he had hanged on it many Burgundians, in revenge for the Death of the Earl of Armagnac. This was a ſevere Capitulation, which gave the Beſieged Cauſe to repent of their Obſtinacy, when probably, they had no proſpect of being relieved (2).

About the time of the ſurrender of Meaux (3), Queen Catherine arrived from England, attended by the Duke of Bedford, who had left the Regency to the Duke of Gloceſter his Brother. The two Courts joining at Bois de Vincennes, went from thence ſoon after, to keep the Whitſun Holidays at Paris. Henry lodged in the Louvre, and Charles in the Palace of St. Pol, where he had but a ſmall Court, whilſt the Regent-King's was numerous and ſplendid. On Whitſunday they dined together in publick, the two Kings and the two Queens, with Crowns on their Heads. Thoſe of the French, who had any Regard left for their Country, could not without Grief behold the King of England, though paying an outward Deference to the King his Father-in-law, ruling France with an abſolute Power. Their Diſcontent was ſtill increaſed by a Tax (4), impoſed by Henry, for coining a new ſort of Money. The Pariſians loudly murmured, but to no purpoſe. Their Condition was very different, from what it was a few Years before, when their Adherence to one of the Parties decided the Fate of both.

The Dauphin takes la Charité, and beſieges Coſne. Walſing. Le Fevre. T. Livius. Elmham.

Whilſt Henry was preparing to renew the Campain, interrupted by the Queen's Arrival, News came, that the Dauphin had taken la Charité, which opened him a Paſſage over the Loire. Shortly after, Advice was brought, that he was beſieging Coſne upon the ſame River, and the Beſieged had capitulated to ſurrender, unleſs relieved by the Duke of Burgundy before the 18th of Auguſt. The Duke finding his Honour engaged to relieve that Place, deſired the King to ſend him a Re-inforcement; to which the King anſwered, he would come himſelf, and accordingly began immediately to march at the Head of his Army. But, whilſt he was pleaſing himſelf with the hopes of a Victory, that would render him Maſter of all France, he was ſeized with a Flux (5), which obliged him to ſtay at Senlis. However, for fear his Illneſs ſhould hinder Coſne from being relieved, he ordered the Duke of Bedford, with the beſt Part of his Troops (6), to join the Duke of Burgundy. The Dauphin hearing of their Junction, and being too weak to give them Battle, retired, and the two Dukes, having nothing more to do there, marched towards Troye. Mean time, Henry, hoping his Diſtemper would wear off, after reſting a little at Senlis, had taken Litter, in order to go and head the Army. But his Illneſs ſtill increaſing, he reſolved at length to return to Vincennes.

Henry goes to Vincennes.

The Duke of Bedford, hearing of the State the King was in, departed immediately from Troye, to come to him. He found him at the Point of Death, but expecting his approaching Diſſolution with great Firmneſs. Before he reſigned his laſt Breath, he ſent for the Dukes of Bedford and Exeter, the Earl of Warwick, with ſeven or eight Engliſh Lords, to give them his laſt Inſtructions. He told them, "His Reign had been ſhort, but glorious; "though his Pretenſions to France had cauſed a great "effuſion of Blood, it could not be laid to his Charge, "ſince nothing but Force could have induced the French "to a reaſonable Peace. For his part, he beheld the approach of Death without Concern; but could not help "lamenting the Fate of the Prince his Son, who, by "reaſon of his Age, was uncapable of finiſhing a Work ſo "happily begun: Wherefore he conjured them, for God's "Sake, to remain in ſtrict Union, for the Service of "the Infant Prince, who was going to be their King; to "take care of his Education, and to give the Queen all "the Conſolation that lay in their Power, and for which "ſhe had ſo great Occaſion. He added, his laſt Advice "to them was, to cultivate diligently the Duke of Burgundy's Friendſhip, and to take care not to releaſe the "Priſoners of Azincourt, till his Son was of Age to hold "the Reins of the Government himſelf. In caſe they "thought proper to conclude a Peace, it ſhould not be, "without ſecuring the Sovereignty of Normandy to the "Crown of England. He concluded with ſaying, it was "his deſire, the Duke of Bedford ſhould take upon him "the Adminiſtration of the Affairs of France, and the Duke "of Gloceſter be Protector of England, during his Son's "Minority.

His dying Speech. Monſtrelet. Le Fevre.

Having ſpoken theſe Words, he asked the Phyſicians how long they thought he had to live. Upon which, one of them ſaid, kneeling, with Tears in his Eyes, that without a Miracle, he could not live above two Hours. This terrible Sentence giving him no manner of Concern, he ſent for his Confeſſor, and having made his Confeſſion, ordered his Chaplains to read the ſeven penitential Pſalms. When they came to theſe Words of the 51ſt, Build thou the Walls of Jeruſalem, he interrupted them, and declared, "upon the Truth of a dying Prince, that, after having ſettled a firm Peace in France, he really intended "to wage War upon the Infidels, for the recovery of "Jeruſalem out of their Hands." The Moment they had finiſhed their Devotion, this great Prince expired on the 31ſt of Auguſt, in the thirty-fourth Year of his Age, after a triumphant Reign of nine Years, five Months, and eleven Days. His Body was brought into England, and buried at Weſtminſter among his Anceſtors, with a Funeral Pomp ſuitable to the Grandeur he enjoyed whilſt alive, and to the Eſteem conceived of him by his Subjects. Character of Henry V.

If, to know this Monarch's Character, we follow, without Examination, the Praiſes beſtowed on him by the Authors of his Nation, we muſt imagine him the moſt accompliſhed Prince that ever appeared in the World before him. Not an Engliſh Hiſtorian aſcribes to him the leaſt Defect, but all unanimouſly ſpeak of him as a perfect Hero. On the other hand, the French have endeavoured to ſhade his Portraiture with certain Strokes, that fully the Luſtre. It will be neceſſary therefore, in order to form a juſt Idea of him, to conſider his Actions with their Circumſtances, independently of the Admiration of the one, and the Envy of the other.

Walſing.

In the firſt Place, with reſpect to the Government of his own Kingdom, he ought not to be denied his due Praiſe; for, avoiding to tread in the Steps of Richard II, and even of his own Father, he conſtantly forbore to incroach on the Liberties and Privileges of the People. His readineſs at all times to give the Royal Aſſent to ſuch Acts, as the Parliament judged neceſſary for the Welfare of the Kingdom, was a clear Evidence of his regard for 1422. the Good and Happineſs of his People. Nevertheleſs, in this very Thing he was guilty of Exceſs, ſince, contrary to his own Inclination, and the dictates of his Reaſon, he conſented to the Perſecution of the Lollards, out of pure Condeſcenſion to the Clergy. Indeed, it was almoſt impoſſible, that, being endued with an excellent Judgment, he ſhould not perceive the groundleſſneſs of the Accuſations againſt them, in the beginning of his Reign. And yet, rather than publickly retract, he ſtill feigned to believe it true, at the very time when he pardoned ſome condemned Perſons, who perſiſted in a denial of the pretended Crime.

But it is not chiefly for what he acted in England, that Hiſtorians have been ſo laviſh of their Praiſes; his warlike Exploits are the principal Subject of his Panegyrick. And yet, to ſpeak without Aggravation, he was, perhaps, in no reſpect leſs remarkable, notwithſtanding the glorious Succeſs that attended his Arms. The Conqueſt of France, conſidered in itſelf, has ſomething grand and marvellous. But the Deſcription of the Affairs of that Kingdom, renders it, doubtleſs, not ſo wonderful, as it appears, when abſtracted from all its Circumſtances. Lewis VIII, Father of St. Lewis, conquered England in a like Juncture, and yet no one ever thought ſolely to aſcribe the Conqueſt to his Wiſdom or Valour. Henry projected his Enterprize, at a time when the Civil Diſſenſions of the French, rendered them unable to defend themſelves. The Towns he took, were defended only by the Beſieged themſelves, without any Army ever appearing to relieve them. However, ſome of theſe Places ſtopped him ſeveral Months, and were ſurrendered only by Famine.

The Battle of Azincourt is then the great, and almoſt ſole warlike Exploit, which can juſtly afford Matter for Panegyrick. In this famous Action, he gave Proofs of an uncommon Conduct, Reſolution, and Bravery. But this very Battle, the Succeſs whereof was ſo glorious, gives likewiſe occaſion to tax him with Imprudence. It may be ſaid, that, if he was victorious, it was, becauſe he had reduced himſelf to an abſolute Neceſſity, of vanquiſhing or dying; to which a General never expoſes himſelf, whatever the Event may be, without cauſing his Conduct to be ſeverely cenſured. His undertaking to retire to Calais, without foreſeeing the difficulties of the March, and without being ſecure of a Paſſage over the Somme; his Wilfulneſs in reſolving to paſs that River, in order to force his way through an Army, ſo ſuperior in Number to his own, ſeem excuſable, only by the Succeſs of the Battle of Azincourt, which was a ſort of Miracle. Had he been vanquiſhed, as he ſhould naturally have been, he would have been infallibly charged with Indiſcretion or Raſhneſs. The Neceſſity he was reduced to, during his March, if we may believe the French Hiſtorians, of offering to reſtore Harfleur, and repair the Damages he had cauſed to France, ſhews, how much he himſelf was convinced of his Error. This Battle therefore was more glorious for him, on account of his perſonal Valour, than with regard to his military Capacity. It muſt be confeſſed, never did Prince expoſe himſelf more in a Battle, and give more ſignal Proofs of true Valour, than did Henry in that Action.

As for his other Conqueſts in France, I do not know, whether his greateſt Admirers have reaſon to wiſh he had met with more oppoſition. What might have happened in that caſe, is beyond human Knowledge. It cannot however be denied, that the Victory of Azincourt preposſeſſes us in his favour. But what may be extolled in him, without danger of being deceived, is the Excellency of his Genius, and the Solidity of his Judgment. He knew how to manage the great Undertaking he had formed, with wonderful Addreſs, wiſely improving the ſeveral Revolutions in France, and making them all turn to his Advantage. Few Princes would have ſtopped like him, after ſo glorious a Victory as that of Azincourt, and preferred a repoſe, which, though ſeemingly leſs glorious than the Continuation of the War, was in reality to him more advantagious. This Policy, in my Opinion, is one of the brighteſt Paſſages of his Life, and beſt ſhews the ſoundneſs of his Judgment. His Negotiations with the Dauphin, and the Duke of Burgundy at the ſame time, and his Inſtructions to his Ambaſſadors, are plain Indications of his Abilities, and how difficult it was to deceive him.

It is not very ſtrange, that the proſperous Succeſs of his Undertakings, ſhould gain him extraordinary Praiſes from the Nation, eſpecially, as it cannot be denied, that this Succeſs was no leſs owing to his prudent Conduct, than to favorable Junctures. In general, he forced the French to own him for Regent and Heir of their Kingdom. And this is one of thoſe Actions, which ſeldom fail of being praiſed beyond Meaſure. Accordingly, Hiſtorians have not been ſatisfied with comparing him to David, Alexander, and Cæſar, but have ranked him above theſe great Men. But however, without going ſo far for Compariſons, which, after all, ſeem not very juſt, methinks he might, with more reaſon, be put in Parallel with Edward III, his Great Grandfather. However, I ſhould hardly ſcruple to give the Preference to Edward. Edward had to deal with all France united againſt him, and the difficulties he encountered in his Conqueſts, were incomparably greater, and required an abler Head to ſurmount them, than thoſe which oppoſed the Progreſs of Henry V. 1422.

What I have been ſaying of this Prince, properly relates only to his principal Action, namely, his War with France. I ſhall now deſcribe his other Qualifications; which, though not ſo glaring, are no leſs worthy of Admiration, than the glorious Succeſſes, which have almoſt wholly engroſſed the attention of the Publick. It is certain, he had all the Endowments of Body and Mind requiſite to form a great Man. His Stature was tall and majeſtick, though a little too ſlender, and long-necked. His Hair was Black, and his Eyes, of the ſame Colour, were exceeding lively. He was ſtrong and robuſt, very expert in all bodily Exerciſes, chaſte, temperate, at leaſt after he came to the Crown, inured to Hardſhips, and patient of Hunger and Thirſt, Heat and Cold. In all this he was a ſtanding Example to his Troops, of Moderation and Conſtancy. He was a great lover of Juſtice, following it himſelf, and cauſing it to be punctually obſerved. Religious without Diſguiſe, perſevering in Piety, and conſtant in his private, as well as public Devotions; a great Protector of the Church and Clergy; he won by theſe Qualities, the Eſteem and Affection of the Eccleſiaſticks, who did not a little contribute to heighten the Luſtre of his Glory. He was prudent in Council, bold in undertaking, and reſolute in executing. As for his Valour, he gave continual Proofs of it through the whole Courſe of his Life. There is another thing likewiſe, for which he ought to be praiſed. He cauſed military Diſcipline to re-flouriſh, which was almoſt entirely neglected in England, ſince the Reign of Edward III. Never did the Engliſh Nation ſhine with ſuch Luſtre, as under this renowned Prince. To this may be added, he was ſo fortunate, as to end his Days in the midſt of his Proſperity, and not ſee, with Edward III, the Fruits of all his Labours deſtroyed.

Having related what is ſaid by the Engliſh, to this Prince's Advantage, the faithfulneſs of an Hiſtorian requires, that ſome Failings, caſt upon him by the French, and aggravated perhaps by Malice and Envy, are not paſſed over in Silence. In the firſt Place, they tax him with Cruelty, and making War in a barbarous Manner. They ground this Charge, not only upon the Slaughter of the Priſoners at the Battle of Azincourt, but alſo upon his putting to death ſeveral Officers, after the taking of Caen, Melun, and Meaux. But as to the Priſoners of Azincourt, there is no doubt, but the Maxims of War, and the Neceſſity of providing for his own Safety, will juſtify his Orders upon that account, ſuppoſing they were not too haſty. As for his treatment of the Burghers and Garriſons of the conquered Places, I confeſs, it is not impoſſible, but he might be ſomething ſwayed by Revenge, by reaſon of the Time theſe brave Men made him loſe; but this can only be ſaid by Conjecture. That he uſed Severity towards ſome is certain, but his Motives are unknown. To diſcuſs ſuch Facts, more Circumſtances are required, than are come to our Knowledge. However, with regard to thoſe of Meaux, they are known to have incurred the Guilt of ſeveral Murders, for which, doubtleſs, they deſerved to be puniſhed. It was neither unjuſt nor barbarous, to hang the Baſtard of Vaurus, on the ſame Tree, whereon he himſelf had hanged all the Duke of Burgundy's Adherents, that fell into his Hands. For the other three, executed at the ſame time, I know not the Reaſon; but it is to be preſumed, they were not capriciouſly choſen from all the reſt of the Garriſon, to be Inſtances of the Severity of the Conquerors. As for the Engliſh and Iriſh, who were in the Service of his Enemies, their being excepted in the Capitulation, needs no Apology. It were to be wiſhed, for Henry's Reputation, that he could be as eaſily juſtified, in refuſing to give quarter to the Scots, on pretence, they would not obey their King, who was actually his Priſoner.

The French accuſe moreover this Prince of exceſſive Pride, even to the cauſing, as they aſſure us, the Marſhal de l'Iſle-Adam to be committed to the Baſtile, for daring to look in his Face when ſpeaking to him (1). It is true, if he had no other Reaſon, this was a high Strain of Haughtineſs Monſtrelet. P. de Fenin.

(1) King Henry, who had little Eſteem for him, did not treat him with ſuch Favour as he ſhewed to the other Officers, as appeared upon occaſion of the Marſhal's coming to him one Day for Inſtructions; His Majeſty ſeein him in a very plain Coat, ſaid to him in Raillery, How, L'Iſle-Adam, 1422. Haughtineſs and Rigour. But can it be denied, that a Look, a bare Geſture, may be ſometimes very offenſive? And who knows but the Marſhal, as he ſpoke, uſed ſome aggravating Circumſtance, or raſh Expreſſion, which rendred him worthy of Chaſtiſement, and which has been induſtriouſly concealed, to make the King's Action appear the more odious?

Avarice is another Failing, wherewith he is confidently reproached. It is pretended, that after he was declared Regent and Heir of France, he was never bountiful, either to any of the Burgundian Party, who had ſerved him, or to thoſe of the Dauphin's, who voluntarily ſubmitted to him. I ſhall not undertake to clear him from this Charge, as it does not appear that he was very liberal to the Engliſh themſelves, who ſerved him, whether by reaſon of his great Expence, or, becauſe he was otherwiſe inclined. Though he had many good Officers, and excellent Generals, we do not find, that he rewarded them according to their Merit and Services. We muſt however, except the Earl of Dorſet, to whom he aſſigned a Penſion of a thouſand Pounds a Year, when he created him Earl of Exeter; Faſtolff, to whom he gave a conſiderable Eſtate near Harfleur; the Captal of Buch, of the Houſe of Foix, who had the Lordſhip of Longueville; and the Earl of Salisbury, to whom he gave the Earldom of Perche. But after all, very poſſibly, Henry's want of liberality was the Effect of his Prudence. I have obſerved, that the Revenue of the Crown amounted but to Fifty-ſix thouſand Pounds, and that he was forced to pawn his Jewels, to ſupply what the Sums, granted him by Parliament, wanted to defray the Charges of the War. Was it proper to appear liberal in ſuch Circumſtances? Upon many occaſions, it were to be wiſhed, Sovereigns would moderate their Bounties, which are, but too often, at the Expence of the poor People.

Act. Pub. IX. p. 329. p. 765. p. 739.

Laſtly, An unbounded Ambition is a Failing, which the French think may juſtly be laid to his Charge. To know whether this Accuſation be well-grounded, it ſhould be examined, whether he was in the right to renew, or rather to continue, a War againſt France, occaſioned by her Breach of the Treaty of Bretigny, and begun by herſelf. But this Enquiry would be needleſs, after what has been ſaid upon this Subject in the Reign of Edward III, to which recourſe may be had. However it cannot be denied, that Henry was very ambitious. His firſt Project was only to reſtore the Peace of Bretigny. But when he ſaw a poſſibility of mounting the Throne of France, his Ambition carried him beyond the Bounds preſcribed by himſelf in the beginning of the War. I have taken notice of his Intent, to make one of his Brothers King of Naples, and the other of Sicily, and of his uſing, certainly, no very honorable means to procure the Duke of Gloceſter four Provinces of the Low-Countries. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, he had a deſign to purchaſe the Duchy of Luxemburgh of the Emperor Sigiſmund, and to treat with him concerning his pretended Claim to Dauphiné. In fine, it farther appears, he would have paid the Ranſom of a Lord of the Houſe of Blois (1), Priſoner to the Marquiſs of Baden, probably, to aſſert one Day the Pretenſions of that Houſe to the Duchy of Bretagne.

By Catherine of France his Queen, Henry left but one Son of his own Name, about eight or nine Months old. The Queen his Widow, forgetting ſhe had been Wife of ſo great a Prince, and was deſcended from the moſt illuſtrious Houſe of Europe, married ſome time after, Owen Tudor, a Welſh Gentleman, not without giving great Offence both to the Engliſh and French. It is pretended, this Gentleman was deſcended from the antient Kings of Wales, but I do not know whether this Deſcent be well proved (2). Owen Tudor had by the Queen three Sons, namely, Edmund, Jaſper, and Owen (3). The eldeſt married Margaret, only Daughter of John Beaufort Duke of Somerſet, Grandſon of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, and Catherine Roet his third Wife. HENRY VI. 1422. It is reſolved in England to maintain young Henry's Right to France.

HENRY V, when within view of his end, ſeemed to have been taken out of the World by a particular direction of divine Providence, which is ſometimes pleaſed to ſtop the beſt concerted Undertakings, when juſt going to be accompliſhed. The Peace of Troye not being yet firmly ſettled, and the Prince who was to mount the Throne, but an Infant of nine Months, every thing ſeemed to concur to take from the Engliſh the hopes, of ſeeing the two Kingdoms of France and England united under a King of their Nation. But on the other hand, the noble Qualities of the Dukes of Bedford and Gloceſter, Brothers of the deceaſed King, incouraged the moſt timorous. How great ſoever the Loſs might be, it was not thought irreparable, ſince the Valour, Experience, and Wiſdom of theſe two Princes, enabled them to ſupport the new King's Minority. Inſtead therefore of being diſheartned at ſo terrible a Blow, they ſhewed, by proclaiming young Henry King of England, and Heir of France, that they were determined to maintain what the King his Father had ſo gloriouſly eſtabliſhed.

Henry VI is proclaimed Heir of France.

The Duke of Gloceſter had governed the Kingdom by the Title of Guardian, ever ſince the Duke of Bedford his elder Brother attended the Queen into France. But this Dignity being inconſiſtent with a King actually preſent in his Kingdom, ceaſed the Moment young Henry was proclaimed (1). It is true, the late King had ordered upon his Death-Bed, that during his Son's Minority, the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould be Regent, or Protector in England. But this was not a ſufficient Warrant to exerciſe that important Office. The Parliament's Confirmation was alſo requiſite. For that, and ſome no leſs urgent Reaſons, the Council ſpeedily ſummoned a Parliament for the 9th of November. Till the two Houſes ſhould ſettle the Form of Government, during the King's Minority, the Council, whereof the Duke of Gloceſter was Preſident, iſſued all neceſſary Orders for whatever would not admit of delay. 1422.

A Parliament is called. Cotton's Abridg.

A few Days after, the Council was informed of ſome Motions (2) in Wales, and the neighbouring Counties, which might be attended with ill Conſequences. Very likely, as the Earl of March had great Intereſt in thoſe parts, ſome of his moſt zealous Adherents deſigned to raiſe Commotions, in order to try, at ſuch a Juncture, to revive the Earl's Claim to the Crown. It may at leaſt be preſumed, theſe Motions ſeemed to be of great Moment, ſince, beſides the Orders of the Council to the Sheriffs, Commiſſioners were appointed to put them in execution. The Welſh begin to ſtir. Act. Pub. X. p. 254.

During the time between the calling of the Parliament, died King Charles VI at Paris, the 21ſt of October, having ſurvived Henry V, his Son-in-law, but fifty five Days. His Death entirely changed the Face of Affairs. It was not doubted that the Dauphin would take the Title of King of France, and exert his utmoſt to procure the Poſſeſſion of a Crown, which he deemed fallen to him by the Death of the King his Father. Whilſt Charles VI. was alive, many of his Subjects thought it their duty to obey him, without inquiring, whether what he did was conformable to the Laws, and beneficial to the State, becauſe, their Oath to him was not conditional. But after his Death, they believed it no leſs incumbent upon them, to acknowledge the Dauphin his Son, for Sovereign, notwithſtanding the Peace of Troye, which deprived him of his Right. Indeed, that Peace bore but too viſible Marks of Seduction and Violence, to be conſidered by true Frenchmen, as a fundamental and inviolable Law, though many that believed it very unjuſt, had been forced to approve it. So the Dauphin, who, in the latter Years of the King his Father, might, in ſome meaſure, be counted a Rebel, was upon better Terms, when he could aſſume the Title of Sovereign. The Death of the King of France. 1422. Henry VI. is proclaimed King of France at Paris. The Duke of Bedford takes the Title of Regent. J. Chartier.

These Conſiderations obliged the Duke of Bedford, who continued in France, ſeriouſly to reflect on the poſſible ill Conſequences of this Change, and to ſeek means to prevent them. Charles VI had no ſooner cloſed his Eyes, but the Duke ordered Henry to be proclaimed King of France, and, purſuant to the Will of the late King his Brother, took himſelf the Title of Regent. Then he broke the Great Seal, and cauſed a new one to be made, with the Arms of France and England, and the Effigies of the young King holding a Sceptre in each hand.

The French Lords ſwear Allegiance to Henry. Hall.

The Succeſſion to the Crown of France being ſettled by the Peace of Troye, the Regent thought he might, upon that Foundation, and without a new Conſent of the States, put the King his Nephew in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom. Wherefore, contenting himſelf with aſſembling at Paris all the great Men of the Engliſh Party, he made a Speech, exhorting them to recognize young Henry for their Sovereign. He inſiſted on the Peace of Troye, and their Oath to maintain it, and endeavoured to convince them, it was for their own, as well as the Kingdom's Intereſt, inviolably to obſerve it. This done, all that were preſent ſwore Allegiance to Henry, and did Homage to him, in the Perſon of the Regent, for the Lands they held of the Crown. The ſame thing was afterwards required of thoſe that were abſent, and of the Towns in ſubjection to the Engliſh.

A Deputation to Henry. Monſtrelet.

This Ceremony being ended, the Regent, the Council of France, and City of Paris ſent Deputies to London, of whom the Biſhop of Terouenne was the Chief, to congratulate the young King upon his Acceſſion to the Crowns of the two Kingdoms. At the ſame time, the Deputies had Orders to go by the Low-Countries, and exhort the Duke of Burgundy to remain firm to the Alliance. It was feared, the Death of Henry V, and of Charles VI, might cauſe him to alter his Meaſures.

The Dauphin takes the Title of King of France, and is crowned at Poictiers. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Whilſt the Duke of Bedford was taking all neceſſary Precautions to ſettle the Affairs of the King his Nephew, the Dauphin was no leſs intent upon his. He was at Eſpaly, a Houſe belonging to the Biſhop of Puy, when he heard of his Father's Death. He ſhed many Tears at the News, whether Nature rouzed herſelf upon the occaſion, or he had really ever preſerved an Affection for a Father, who was not to be blamed for the Miſchiefs he had done him. The firſt Day he appeared in Mourning, but on the morrow put on Scarlet, and was proclaimed King of France, with all the Solemnity the Circumſtances of his Court, and the place he was in, would permit. After that, he came to Poictiers, where he had removed the Parliament of Paris. He was crowned here, in the beginning of November, becauſe the City of Rheims, where the Coronation of the Kings of France is uſually performed, was in the hands of the Engliſh.

Neceſſity of joining together the Hiſtories of France and England.

Thus Henry VI and Charles VII aſſumed, both at the ſame time, the Title of King of France, and diſputed with each other the poſſeſſion of the Throne thirty Years. This renders the Hiſtory of the preſent Reign ſo interwoven with That of France, that they cannot poſſibly be ſeparated. The Engliſh were bent to preſerve for their young King, the Crown of France, acquired by his Father's Labours, and of which they believed his Anceſtors to have been unjuſtly deprived. On the other hand, Charles meant likewiſe to take poſſeſſion of the ſame Crown, which it was deſigned to wreſt from him, and which, in his Opinion, he held not ſo much from the King his Father, ſeduced by ill Counſels, as from a long Train of Anceſtors, who had enjoyed it before him. This important Quarrel produced numberleſs Events, which to be well underſtood, require an exact Knowledge of the State of the Affairs of both Kings, in the beginning of their Reigns. It is no leſs requiſite to know the Perſons that managed the Affairs, as well Civil as Military, of the two Kingdoms. In ſhort, to perceive wherein conſiſted the Advantages and Diſadvantages of each King, during this tedious War, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to have a general Idea of the then State of France, with regard to the Aſſiſtance each might have, as well from the Princes and Vaſſals of the Crown, as from Foreigners. This Review ſeems to me indiſpenſable, in order to avoid the Obſcurity, which would inceſſantly occur, in a mixt Recital of ſo many various Events.

Situation of the Affairs of both Kings.

Firſt then, for the Perſons of the two Kings, Charles was one and twenty Years old (1), and Henry but an Infant of nine Months. However, in this very thing the Advantage was on Henry's Side, whoſe Affairs were managed by two Uncles of great Abilities, and by the wiſeſt Council then in Europe. On the contrary, Charles, who never paſſed for an extraordinary Genius, was, by reaſon of his Age, more difficult to be ruled; his Paſſions frequently hindering him from following the beſt Advice. To the time he aſſumed the Title of King, he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf neither by his Valour nor Conduct. More prone to Pleaſures than War, he appeared very unfit to reſtore the Affairs of the French Monarchy, which was upon the Brink of Deſtruction. The Duke of Burgundy's Murder, committed in his preſence, and doubtleſs by his Orders, had raiſed diſadvantagious Prejudices againſt him. He had not been more ſcrupulous, with regard to the Duke of Bretagne his Brother-in-law. This Prince, whom the Earls of Pontievre, by a notorious Treachery, had carried away by Force, and long detained in Priſon, came to know, after his Deliverance, that the Plot was contrived againſt him with the Dauphin's Privity and Conſent. And therefore, it might be ſaid, it was not Charles's Fault, that the Duke of Bretagne had not undergone the ſame Fate with the Duke of Burgundy. Theſe things made a deep Wound in his Reputation, which was not otherwiſe ſupported by any bright Virtue or Action. All that could be ſaid to his Advantage, was, that he had not meanly ſtooped to his Enemies. But it did not require a great Genius, to refuſe running into manifeſt Deſtruction. 1422. Act. Pub. IX. p. 876, 884.

As to the Forces of the two Kings, it is eaſy to ſee, that Henry had greatly the Advantage of his Rival, ſince, with what he poſſeſſed in France, he had moreover all England on his Side. France was then ſo divided between them, that each had whole Provinces under his Obedience, and in others, each had fortified Towns and Adherents. In the Provinces thus divided, there was ſcarce a walled Town, but what had a Garriſon for one or other. And this rendered them, above thirty Years, the Seat of the War.

Charles was poſſeſſed of all Languedoc, from whence he had lately expelled the Earl of Foix, whilſt Henry V was employed in the Siege of Melun, and had appointed for Governor the Earl of Clermont, eldeſt Son of the Duke of Bourbon. From that time, the Earl of Foix had in vain attempted to recover that Province.

The Dauphiné, was likewiſe entirely ſubject to Charles, who poſſeſſed alſo Berry, Auvergne, Touraine, part of Saintonge, the City of Rochel and Poictou. Beſides theſe Provinces, he conſidered as Countries dependent of him, Provence, Maine, and Anjou, for reaſons mentioned hereafter.

Henry was in poſſeſſion of Normandy and Guienne, the richeſt Provinces of the Kingdom. Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, and the Iſle of France belonged to him, excepting a few Places, which ſtill held out for King Charles. In a word, he was Maſter of Paris, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, which alone was equivalent to a great and rich Province. He could moreover rely on the two Burgundies, Flanders, and Artois, which belonged to the Duke of Burgundy, his Vaſſal and Ally.

From what has been ſaid, it is eaſy to perceive, that the War might be carried on in all the Provinces of France, Bretagne excepted, which hitherto had ſtood Neuter. But there were ſome Places more expoſed than others to the Fury of the Sword, as Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, and the Iſle of France. The reaſon is, becauſe the Engliſh, before all things, would clear theſe Provinces of King Charles's Garriſons, in order to attack him afterwards beyond the Loire, without being forced to leave any thing behind them. For the ſame reaſon, it was Charles's Intereſt to proſecute the War in the ſame Provinces, to prevent his Enemies from carrying their Conqueſts into the Southern Provinces, which were his laſt Refuge.

After ſeeing the Diſpoſition of the Provinces, it will be neceſſary to examine that of the French Princes, immediate Vaſſals of the Crown. And firſt of the Duke of Bretagne.

Situation of the Duke of Bretagne.

Ever ſince the beginning of the War, John V, Duke of Bretagne, had ſtood Neuter, without concerning himſelf in a Quarrel, which could not fail of drawing the War into his Country, if he had been ſo ill-adviſed, as to declare for either of the Kings. But after the Peace of Troye was ſigned and ſworn, he believed it no longer poſſible to continue in a State of Neutrality. Charles VI, and Henry V, being united by the Peace, and there being but one King of France, he could not help acknowledging him, unleſs he would openly join with the Dauphin. But ſuch a Proceeding would have been very imprudent, ſince the Dauphin was ſo low, that there was little appearance of his ever recovering. Upon theſe accounts, as ſoon as the Duke ſaw the two Kings united, he ſent Henry V word, he was ready to ſign the Peace of Troye, and do Homage for his Dutchy to King Charles. This Negotiation, though begun in 1420, could not be ended before Henry's Death. Probably, the Duke of Bretagne prolonged it, on purpoſe to ſee how the War againſt the Dauphin would go. Be this as it will, Henry dying before this Affair was finiſhed, the Duke of Bre- Act. Pub. X. p. 8, 15, 206, 228.

1422. tagne saw himself in the same State, as before the Peace of Troye, that is, at liberty to chuse his Side, or stand Neuter, according as he should be determined by the Events. There was however one strong reason for his not siding with the Dauphin, and that was, the discovery of the Dauphin's being deeply concerned in the Conspiracy of the Pontievrians. Nevertheless, preferring the Peace of his Subjects, to the pleasure of Revenge, he had not thought proper to declare for England.

The State of the Earl of Richemont.

Arthur, Earl of Richemont, Brother to the Duke of Bretagne, was taken Prisoner at Azincourt in 1415, and carried into England, where he remained till 1420. Mean while, the Duke his Brother being seized by the Pontievrians, he desired King Henry's leave, to go and endeavour to free him. Leave was granted him upon certain Conditions, namely, That on Michaelmas-day 1422, Arthur should return to London, and appear before the King, or his Successor, the Lord Chancellor, or the Mayor of London.

Act. Pub. X. p. 5, 8, 46.

That during the Term of his Enlargement, he should make no Alliance with the Dauphin, or any other Person whatever, against the King of England, or the Duke of Burgundy; neither should he attempt any thing contrary to the Peace of Troye.

That Alan de Rohan, the Duke of Bretagne's Lieutenant, the States and Barons of the Country, should promise the same Thing, during the Earl's Absence from England.

For Security of these Conditions, the Earl of Montfort was to be delivered to the King, whom he promised to restore, upon the Earl of Richemont's return to London.

The Earl ratified and swore all these Articles, and then departed for Bretagne. The Death of Henry V happening a Month before the Expiration of his Leave, instead of returning into England, according to his Oath, he still remained at the Duke his Brother's Court, who was freed from his Imprisonment. Thus, at the time of Charles VI's death, he was really Prisoner of the English, though he was not actually in their Power; and moreover, liable to the reproach of Breach of Faith. Some have thought to justify him, by saying, he only stood bound to the Person of Henry V, and therefore, upon that Monarch's decease, believed himself freed from his Oath. But this pretended Limitation of his Engagement, is destroyed by the forementioned Articles.

Hist. of Charles VII, by J. B. J. Tom. I. p. 195.

Besides the Duke of Bretagne's Disposition with respect to the two rival Kings, he was moreover prompted to side with the English, by the Earl of Richemont his Brother, who had a great Influence over him. Arthur not only thereby designed to free himself from his Engagement, but had also other Views, which shall be mentioned hereafter. It may therefore be said, that though the Duke of Bretagne stood Neuter, or was desirous of still passing for such, he was however upon the Point of declaring for England.

State of the Duke of Burgundy.

As for the Duke of Burgundy, there is no occasion to repeat here his Reasons to remain firm to the Alliance of the English. It will suffice to say, that he did not think the death of the Duke his Father sufficiently revenged, whilst Charles enjoyed any part of France.

Of the Duke of Anjou King of Sicily.

Lewis III, Duke of Anjou, and King of Sicily, who was possessed in France, of Provence, Anjou, and Maine, was entirely in the Interest of King Charles his Brother-in-law. But he had been some time employed at Naples, in securing the Inheritance of Joan II, Queen of that Country, who had adopted him for her Son. In his Absence, Violante of Arragon, his Mother, had the Administration of Affairs, and remained firmly attached to King Charles her Son-in-law.

Of the Earl of Foix and his Brothers. Oshag. Hist. of Foix and Bearn.

The House of Foix made then a very great Figure in the Kingdom (1). Matthew of Castlebon, Earl of Foix, and Sovereign of Bearn, dying without Issue in 1399, Elizabeth his Sister, Wife of Archembald de Graille, Captal of Buch in Guienne, took possession of his Dominions. Charles VI attempted to deprive the Captal and his Wife of this noble Inheritance, but they found means to keep possession. Archembald died in 1413, leaving five Sons, all of distinguished Merit. John, the eldest, was Earl of Foix and Bigorre, and Sovereign of Bearn. Gaston, who bore the Title of Captal of Buch, adhered to Henry V, who made him Knight of the Garter, and Earl of Longueville. From him sprung the House of Candale. Archembald, Lord of Noailles, the third Son, was killed on Montereau Bridge, with the Duke of Burgundy. Matthew the fourth Brother, married the Heiress of Cominge. 1422. We shall see hereafter, that a Quarrel between him and his Wife, caused the Country of Cominge, to fall into the Hands of Charles VII. Peter the youngest, was at first a Franciscan Friar, then Bishop of Lescar, and at last Cardinal, and Legate à Latere in France, under the Pontificate of Martin V. He founded the College of Foix at Toulouse.

Hence it appears, that the House of Foix was very considerable, as well for Extent of Dominion in the southern Parts of France, as for the Merit of the four Brothers, whereof it consisted. The Neighbourhood of Guienne obliged the Earls of Foix, to pay great regard to the Kings of England, who were Masters of that Dukedom. Foix, Bearn, and Bigorre, could with ease be invaded by so powerful Neighbours, and with difficulty be assisted by the Kings of France. Besides, the Captal of Buch, and the Earl of Cominge, were Vassals of the King of England. An antient Quarrel between the House of Foix, and the Earls of Armagnac, was a farther Inducement to that House, to continue under the Protection of the English, and the Duke of Burgundy, sworn Enemy of the Armagnacs. These Considerations led Henry V, when he entered upon the Regency of France, to give the Government of Languedoc (2) to the Earl of Foix. He made an Agreement with the Earl, to find a considerable Number of Troops (3), to keep that Province in Obedience to Charles VI. He was, as has been shewn, expelled by the Dauphin, and the Earl of Clermont put in his room. Immediately after the death of Henry V, the Earl of Foix renewed the Agreement with his Successor, who made him Governor again. But it was not in his power to dispossess the Earl of Clermont. Afterwards, the Earl of Foix, seeing England did not observe the Agreement, sided with King Charles. But in the beginning of the present Reign, he and his two Brothers openly declared for the English.

Of Armagnac and Albret. Ib. p. 41, &c.

On the other hand, the Houses of Armagnac and Albret, very powerful in Guienne, declared for Charles VII, tho', a little before, they had complied with the Times, and made their Peace with Henry V.

Of the Duke of Orleans, and Earl of Angoulême.

The House of Orleans consisted of two Princes, Charles Duke of Orleans, and John Earl of Angoulême his Brother, both Prisoners in England. The first had been there ever since the Battle of Azincourt in 1415. The second was given in Hostage to the Duke of Clarence in 1412, for Security of the payment of the English Troops, sent by King Henry IV, to assist the Princes in League against the Duke of Burgundy. These two Princes being Prisoners, were, as to their Persons, neither serviceable nor hurtful to either of the two Parties, but their strong Towns were at the disposal of King Charles. Some affirm, that the Duke of Orleans made a Treaty with Henry V, whereby, in consideration of a great Pension paid yearly for his Expence, he obtained of that Monarch, a Neutrality for his City of Orleans, and all his other Places. But this pretended Treaty is only a Chimera, since the Foundation on which it is built, namely, the Pension, had never any Existence. The ninth and tenth Volumes of the Publick Acts of England, are full of Papers concerning the Duke of Orleans; and yet, among so great a Number, there is not one that gives the least Intimation of this Pension, much less of the pretended Treaty. Besides, it is not very likely, that Henry V, should, in the Time of his Prosperity, grant such a Neutrality, for Places situated in the Heart of a Kingdom, he was undertaking to conquer.

Hist. of Charles VII.

Of the Duke of Alenson.

John Duke of Alenson, about thirteen or fourteen Years old, Son of the Duke of Alenson, slain in the Battle of Azincourt, began to give Tokens of an uncommon Valour and Conduct, which caused him to be looked upon as a Prince of great hopes. He was firmly attached to King Charles's Side, as well as Peter his Bastard-Brother, who passed for one of the stoutest Warriors in the Kingdom.

Of the Earl of Eu.

Charles d'Artois, Earl of Eu, was Prisoner in England, ever since the Battle of Azincourt. As he was not released till 1434, he made no Figure in France, the first Years of this Reign.

Of the Duke of Bourbon.

John Duke of Bourbon, Head of the illustrious House of Bourbon, which was divided into several Branches (4), was Prisoner in England since the Year 1415. So, though he was a Prince of great Merit, he had no Share in the Transactions of France. But the Earl of Clermont, his

And by Anthony of Bourbon, Duke of Vendôme, marrying Joan, Heiress of this House, became King of Navarre, Earl of Foix, and Sovereign of Bearn, whose Son Henry II, King of Navarre, &c. succeeded to the Crown of France in 1589, being Grandfather to Lewis XIV, late King of France.

Of the Earl of Vendôme. Lewis Earl of Vendôme, of the Houſe of Bourbon, was likewiſe Priſoner in England, ſince the Battle of Azincourt. It is true, he agreed with Henry V for his Ranſom, whereof he had even paid Part; but as he could not raiſe the reſt, was not yet releaſed. The French Authors ſay, that in 1423, he miraculouſly eſcaped out of Captivity, and in Memory thereof, inſtituted an annual Proceſſion at Vendôme. I know not the manner of his Eſcape; but find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that in May 1423, he was taken out of the Tower of London, by the King's Order, and delivered to Sir John Cornwal, who took him Priſoner at the Battle of Azincourt; that in July of the ſame Year, he obtained Leave to go into France, to provide the reſt of his Ranſom, that, upon Payment of the whole, he might have his Liberty. In all likelihood, he fully ſatisfied the King, for it does not appear, that he was re-demanded. So, I do not ſee what Miracle there could be in his Eſcape, unleſs it was his miſuſe of his Paſs-port, in which Caſe the Miracle would not be very great. But however, he might inſtitute a Proceſſion at Vendôme, in memory of his eighteen Years Captivity.

Act. Pub. X. p. 289.

Having ſpoken of the Princes of the Royal Family of France, it will be proper to mention the other Lords and Generals, in the Service of King Charles.

The Earl of Buchan. The Earl of Buchan (1) a Scotchman, Son of the Regent of Scotland, and Firſt-Couſin to King James I, was Conſtable of France; a Dignity conferred on him by the Dauphin, after the Battle of Baugé.

Other Generals. Among the other Generals, the moſt conſiderable were, the Marſhals de la Fayette, and de Severac, Andrew de Laval Lord of Loheac, John d'Harcourt Earl of Aumarle, John de la Haye Lord of Cologne, Culant, afterwards High-Admiral, Aymeri Viſcount of Narbonne, Pothon of Xantrailles, Stephen de la Hire, ſirnamed Vignoles, Graville, and ſome others of an inferior Rank, or leſs Note. To theſe I add, the Baſtard of Orleans, natural Brother of the Duke of that Name, though as yet, he did but begin to appear, becauſe he rendered himſelf very famous in the Hiſtory of this Reign.

State of Charles's Court. After the Generals, it will be farther neceſſary to ſay ſomething of the moſt eminent Perſons, belonging to the Court of the new King. I have already ſpoken of the Perſon and Qualities of King Charles.

Mary Queen of France. Mary of Anjou, his Queen, was a Princeſs of exceeding great Beauty, but much more valuable for her extraordinary Merit. And yet, he loved her not as he ought, and as ſhe deſerved, being continually drawn aſide by other Amours, which poſſeſſed in his Heart the Place, ſhe ought to have held. How mortifying ſoever the King's Coldneſs might be, ſhe bore it with great Conſtancy, without the leaſt Murmur, or Reproach; ſtill hoping to gain his Affection by her Patience, Moderation, and dutiful Behaviour. If this Conduct was not capable of inſpiring the King, with a Tenderneſs for ſo accompliſhed a Spouſe, it commanded at leaſt all his Eſteem, and forced him to ſhew it, by conſulting her generally, in his moſt important Affairs.

The Queen of Sicily. Violante of Arragon Queen of Sicily, and Mother of the Queen, was commonly at Charles's Court, where her Merit and Capacity gave her great Credit.

Tannegui du Châtel. Tannegui du Châtel was the King's chief Favorite. It was he that firſt ſtruck the late Duke of Burgundy, on Montereau Bridge. It was not doubted, that, as he was the firſt in executing, ſo he had been the principal in adviſing, that deteſtable Treachery. However, all the French Writers repreſent him as a very honeſt Man. I do not know, how that Character can be reconciled with ſuch an Action, which, let what will be ſaid, was but too premeditated.

Louvet. Louvet, Preſident of Provence, was the next in the King's Favor. He had the Management of the Finances. As he was very covetous and ambitious, he generally preferred his own, to his Maſter's Intereſts. He is ſaid to be one of the Adviſers of the Duke of Burgundy's Murder. On the other hand, the Duke of Bretagne conſidered this Miniſter, as well as d'Avaugour, another of Charles's Courtiers, as the chief Authors of the Pontievrian Conſpiracy, becauſe they had prevailed with the Dauphin to approve it.

La Trimouille, of a very ancient Family, was in great Favor with the King, though not in ſo great as Du Châtel and Louvet. He was very ambitious, and notwithſtanding his high Birth, regularly made his Court to the Favorites, in order to increaſe his Credit. 1422. La Trimouille.

De Giac, and the Camus de Beau-lieu, Creatures of Louvet, were conſiderable at Court, by reaſon of their Patron's Intereſt. De Giac and Beau-lieu.

Theſe were the moſt noted Perſons of Charles's Court, which uſually was not very numerous. Moſt of the Princes of the Blood were Priſoners in England, and the other great Men found it more advantagious to follow the Army; the King's Circumſtances not affording them any great Proſpect at Court.

I ſhall now conſider the chief Managers of the publick Affairs of the Engliſh, both at Court and in the Army. The Engliſh Lords.

John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, under the young King his Nephew, was the moſt accompliſhed Prince then in Europe. Wiſe, judicious, of great Valour, Solidity, and Penetration, Maſter of his Paſſions, and of a Genius, ſuperior to all employed by him, he ſeemed born for a Throne, though Providence had ranked him among Subjects. To all theſe Qualities he added a majeſtick Stateline's, which became his Birth, and high Rank in France, and in England. But this he never carried beyond what was neceſſary to command a due Reſpect and Regard, for his Perſon and Authority. To ſum up his Character in a Word, he was perfectly like the late King his Brother, and in all his Actions took him for Pattern. He had with him in France, the Earls of Warwick (2), Salisbury (3), Arundel (4), the Dukes of Somerſet (5), Faſtolff (6), Talbot (7), and many others, all eminent for their Valour and Experience in the Art of War. The French Authors who have writ the Life of Charles VII, ſeldom ſpeak of theſe Generals, without an honorable Epithet. For my part, I ſhall only mention theſe illuſtrious Perſons. Their Names became ſo famous in the Hiſtory of thoſe Days, that all the Encomiums I can beſtow on them, would be no Addition to their Glory and Reputation. Engliſh Generals.

The Duke of Burgundy had, at the ſame time, three Generals, whom I ſhall rank among the Engliſh, becauſe they were in the Service of the ſame Prince. Their Actions well deſerve an honourable Mention. Generals of the Duke of Burgundy.

The firſt was John de Luxemburg, Earl of Ligny, Son of Valeran de Luxemburg, Conſtable of France. This General ſignalized himſelf, during the whole War. Earl of Ligny.

Liſle-Adam, Marſhal of France, was a bold and enterprizing Warrior, and withal, capable of managing the moſt difficult Undertaking. It was he, that in 1419, made the Duke of Burgundy Maſter of Paris. After that, incurring, by his too great Haughtineſs, the Diſpleaſure of Henry V, he was committed to the Baſtile; from whence the Duke of Bedford had lately freed him, at the Duke of Burgundy's Requeſt. Liſle-Adam.

Toulongeon, commonly called Marſhal of Burgundy, was in high Eſteem with the Duke his Maſter, on account of his Valour and Parts. Toulongeon.

I muſt now paſs into England, and briefly mention ſome of the Princes, and great Men, who were chiefly concerned in the Direction of the young King's Affairs. The Court of England.

Humphrey Duke of Gloceſter, younger Brother of the Duke of Bedford, was a Prince equally qualified for the Field and the Cabinet. His noble Endowments, improved by an extenſive Knowledge of the Sciences, would have put him upon a Level with the Duke his Brother, had he been more Maſter of his Paſſions, or leſs ambitious and haughty. I ſhall have frequent occaſion hereafter, to make known more fully the Character of this Prince. Duke of Gloceſter.

The Princes of the Houſe of Lancaſter, legitimated by the Name of Beaufort, held the next Rank to the Duke of Gloceſter. Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, and Henry his Brother, Biſhop of Wincheſter, were Sons of John of Gaunt, and Catherine Roet, his third Wife. John Earl of Somerſet, their elder Brother, was dead, and had left four Sons, of whom, Henry the eldeſt, bore the Title of Earl of Somerſet. Of the other three, Thomas, John, and Edmund, the laſt only was at Court, the other two being Priſoners in France (8). The Princes of Lancaſter.

(8) There is no Pedigree wherein Rapin differs more from our Genealogiſts than in this of Beaufort. Neither does it appear from whence he had his Account. For Dugdale, Sandford, &c. make it thus: John of Gaunt, by Catherine Roet, had one Daughter called Joan, Counteſs of Weſtmoreland; and three Sons: 1. John Beaufort Earl of Somerſet, who died 11 Henry IV. 1410, and lies buried at Canterbury. 2. Henry, Cardinal Biſhop of Wincheſter. 3. Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Earl of Dorſet. (See Note (1) p. 537.) The ſaid John, by Margaret Holland, had four Sons: 1. Henry Earl of Somerſet, who died without Heirs, 7 Henry V. 2. John, taken Priſoner at the Battle of Baugé, and long kept in Captivity. He was, after his releaſe, advanced in 21 of Henry VI, to the Dignity of Duke of Somerſet. By Margaret Beauchamp he had an only Daughter named Margaret, (Wife of Edmund Tudor, by whom ſhe had Henry VII.) He died 22 Henry VI, 1444. 3. Edmund, who had the Grant of his Brother's Dukedom in 26 Henry VI, having before ſucceeded his Uncle, 1422. Duke of York. Richard Duke of York, Son of Richard Earl of Cambridge beheaded at Southampton in 1415, and Grandſon of Edmund de Langley Duke of York, fifth Son of Edward III, was the only Male-Iſſue of this Family. He was very young at the time I am ſpeaking of, but I ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention him in the courſe of this Reign.

Other Lords. Humphrey Earl of Stafford, was Son of Ann of Gloceſter, Daughter of the unfortunate Duke of Gloceſter, whom Richard II, his Nephew, cauſed to be ſtrangled at Calais.

Henry (1) Earl of Eſſex, Half-Brother of the Earl of Stafford, had married Iſabella, Siſter of the young Duke of York.

Ralph Nevill Earl of Weſtmoreland, was allied to the Royal Family, by his Marriage with Joan Beaufort, Siſter of the Duke of Exeter, and Piſhop of Wincheſter.

Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, had for Wife a Siſter of the Duke of Somerſet.

Henry Talbot, had married a Siſter of the Earl of Eſſex.

Henry Holland Earl of Huntington, deſcended from a Half-Siſter of Richard II, was Priſoner in France, ſince the Battle of Baugé, wherein the Duke of Clarence was ſlain.

Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, and John Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel, were married to Princeſſes of the Houſe of March (2).

Nothing more remains, in order to give a general Knowledge of the Affairs of the two contending Kings, but to ſee how ſome foreign Princes ſtood affected towards them.

How the Princes of Europe ſtood affected with regard to the two Kings. It is very ſtrange, that during this long War of thirty-eight Years, no Prince in Europe would be concerned in it. Immediately after the Peace of Troye, Henry V ſent Ambaſſadors into ſeveral Parts, to make Alliances, in order to render himſelf ſo ſuperior to the Dauphin, as to put it out of his Power to make any Reſiſtance. But we do not find that he ſucceeded in this Deſign. If he made Alliances with ſome Princes, they were ſo worded, as did not oblige them to be Parties in this War; ſo that he reaped but little Advantage from thence.

The Emperor. The Emperor Sigiſmund might, by Virtue of his League with Henry V, have aſſiſted his Son. But he was himſelf embroiled in Troubles on the account of Religion in Bohemia, which wholly employed him. The reſt of the German Princes were unconcerned at what paſſed in France. They were not ſorry to ſee the Engliſh and French unable, by their Diſſenſion, to diſturb their Neighbours.

Italy. All Italy ſtood Neuter. The Duke of Milan alone was inclined to King Charles, but hitherto had ſent him no Supplies.

Spain. Caſtile, Arragon, and Portugal were in Peace, or in Truce, with the two rival Kings, and aſſiſted Neither. Their Policy was to let them beat one another, and afterwards join with the Conqueror.

Duke of Lorrain. The Duke of Lorrain was inclined to King Charles, on account of the Alliance between their Families. But he durſt not aſſiſt him, for fear of drawing the War into his Country.

Among all the neighbouring Princes of France, Amadeus, firſt Duke of Savoy, and Lewis de Chalon Prince of Orange, were thoſe, on whom the Eyes of both Parties were chiefly fixed, by reaſon of the Diverſions they could make in Provence and Dauphine. Mean while, theſe two Princes obſerved yet a Neutrality, pleaſed with being courted by both Sides. It was, however, eaſy to perceive, they leaned to the Engliſh, on account of the Duke of Burgundy, the Prince of Orange being his Nephew, and the Duke of Savoy his Vaſſal.

The Low-Countries. As for the Neighbours of England, there were only the Princes of the Low-Countries and the Scots, that could be ſo concerned in the Quarrel, as greatly to advantage, or prejudice the two Kings. The Duke of Burgundy poſſeſſed Flanders and Artois. John of Burgundy, his firſt Couſin, held Brabant, and the Earldom of Limbourg. Moreover, by his Marriage with Jaquelina of Bavaria, Daughter of the late Earl of Hainault, he had acquired the Sovereignty of Hainault, Holland, Zeland and Friſeland. The firſt of theſe two Princes was firmly united with the Engliſh, and the other took care not to declare againſt them, for fear of depriving his Subjects of their advantagious Commerce with England. 1422.

Scotland. As for the Scots, the War in France ought not to have been indifferent to them. It is certain, their Intereſt required their utmoſt endeavours, to ſtop the Progreſs of the Engliſh in that Kingdom. Beſides their ancient Alliance, whereby they were obliged to aſſiſt the French, it was eaſy for them to perceive, it could not but be very dangerous to their State, to ſuffer the King of England to grow ſo very powerful. But, the private Intereſts of the Regent had hindered them from taking the Courſe, moſt agreable to the Good of their Country, till at length, they ſent ſeven thouſand Men to the Dauphin. From that time, growing more and more ſenſible of their Error, in permitting the Engliſh to become Maſters of France, they had reſolved to ſend thither a more powerful Supply. But the Duke of Albany dying in the mean time, and Mordac his eldeſt Son, a Prince of a mean Genius, ſucceeding him in the Regency, inteſtine Troubles aroſe, which prevented the Scots from executing their Reſolution. So, till the Death of Henry V, they had acted nothing in that reſpect, and King James was returned into England Priſoner as before.

Here I ſhall end this Digreſſion, which will not appear needleſs, when we come to ſee the Relation it bears to the Events mentioned hereafter. And now having given a general Knowledge of the Affairs of the two Kings, it is time to reſume the Thread of our Hiſtory.

The Parliament meets. The Parliament met on the 9th of November, according to the Summons. The Duke of Gloceſter, by a Patent under the Great Seal, was commiſſioned to hold it in the King's Name, according to the uſual Practice, when the Sovereign is not in condition to be preſent in Perſon. Cotton's Abridg. Act. Pub. X. p. 257. The Parliament's firſt care was to ſettle the Government, during the King's Minority. They nominated the Members of the Council; filled the Offices of the Crown; and gave the Great Seal to the Biſhop of Durham (3), and not to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, as ſome affirm. To purſue the Plan that was formed, it was neceſſary to appoint a Protector, who ſhould take upon him the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs, during the Minority. Henry V had ordered, on his Death-bed, that this high Dignity ſhould be conferred on the Duke of Gloceſter his Brother. But his Will could not be obeyed, without great Injury to the Duke of Bedford, the eldeſt Brother, the ſecond Perſon in the Kingdom, and preſumptive Heir of the Crown as long as Henry was Childleſs. This Prince would thereby have been below the Duke of Gloceſter, his younger Brother. It is true, he was Regent of France; but very poſſibly, he might return into England, during ſo long a Minority. Wherefore, it was neceſſary to find ſome Expedient, to perform the deceaſed King's Will, without derogating from the elder Brother's Rights. After a ſerious Examination of the Affair, the Parliament nominated the Duke of Bedford, Protector of England, Defender of the Church, and firſt Counſellor to the King. But a Clauſe was added, that he ſhould exerciſe this Office, only whilſt in the Kingdom, without having, in his Abſence, any concern in the Government. At the ſame time, the Protectorſhip was likewiſe conferred on the Duke of Gloceſter (4), with Power, to act only in the Abſence of the Duke of Bedford his Brother, who, upon his return into England, was to be acknowledged for ſole Protector. The Protector's Salary was ſettled at eight thouſand Marks a Year (5).

The Privy-Council ſettled. Ib. p. 259. Cotton's Abridg.

The Duke of Bedford is made Protector; Act. Pub. X. p. 261. and in his Abſence the Duke of Gloceſter. Ib. p. 261, 268.

Jealouſy of the Council againſt the Duke of Gloceſter. It has been ſeen, that the Duke of Gloceſter was not ſo moderate, as the Duke of Bedford his Brother. He was impatient of any oppoſition to his Will. For this reaſon, the Privy-Council were always upon their Guard, to hinder his aſſuming a greater Authority, than his Station entituled him to. As they held not their Places of him, but of the Parliament, they were the leſs afraid of diſpleaſing him, knowing it was not in his Power to remove them. Therefore, in the Council itſelf, there was a ſort of Confederacy againſt him, managed by the Biſhop of Wincheſter his Uncle. The Biſhop's oppoſition to the Protector, ended at length in a Quarrel, the ſad Effects whereof, we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the Sequel of this Reign.

Governors appointed for the King. After having ſettled what related to the Protectorſhip, the Parliament appointed Governors, to take Care of the Hall.

Uncle, the Duke of Exeter in his Title of Earl of Dorſet. He was killed at St. Albans, 33 Henry VI. 4. Thomas, whoſe Name is only mentioned; and four Daughters. The ſaid Edmund had four Sons: 1. Henry, (from whoſe natural Son by Joan Hill, are ſprung the preſent Dukes of Beaufort) beheaded 3 Edward IV. 2. Edmund Duke of Somerſet, beheaded 1471. 3. John Duke of Somerſet, ſlain at Teukſbury, 11 Edward IV. 4. Thomas, who died without Iſſue-Male; and ſeven Daughters.

1422. King's perſon and education. Theſe were Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, and Henry his Brother, Biſhop of Wincheſter, both Great-Uncles of the King. I know not the qualities of the Duke of Exeter, not having met with his character in any hiſtorian (1).

Character of the Biſhop of Winchester.

As for the Biſhop of Wincheſter, he was a Prince more proper for the World and a Court, than the Church. However, he is placed by ſome in the claſs of the Learned of thoſe days. After he was made Biſhop of Wincheſter, in 1405, his principal buſineſs was to heap up riches; wherein he had ſo happily ſucceeded, that he was commonly reckoned the wealthieſt of all the Engliſh Nobles. Henry V, his nephew, had ſome regard for him, but was apprehenſive of his intriguing temper. Hence he oppoſed the Pope's making him a Cardinal, for fear that dignity would give him occaſion to exerciſe his talents too much. The truth is, he was a Man of ſenſe, and well-skilled in all the means humane prudence ſuggeſts to the Ambitious, to accompliſh their ends. His birth, parts, riches, and office of governor to the King, gave him great credit in the council, and of courſe in all the reſt of the kingdom. In a word, he knew ſo well to manage his affairs, that he had a better intereſt than the Duke of Gloceſter his Nephew, though Protector, and ruined him entirely.

Jealouſy between the Duke of Gloceſter and Biſhop of Winchester.

The occaſion of their quarrel is not fully known. Some ſay, the Biſhop, angry that the Duke of Gloceſter was preferred before him in the government of the kingdom, which he would rather have had, than that of the King, never ceaſed plotting to ſupplant him. Others on the contrary affirm, the Duke of Gloceſter hated him, only becauſe he always found him ready to oppoſe his aſſuming too great an authority, as Protector, which might in the end, prove fatal to their common Maſter.

Few warlike Exploits during the reſt of the year 1422.

Whilſt the courts of the two new Kings were equally employed in affairs, which would not admit of delay, the war was but faintly proſecuted in France. Beſides, the ſeaſon permitted not, (after the death of Charles VI, on the 21ſt of October,) great armies to keep the field. So, from that time, to the end of the year 1422, the troops of the two Kings took ſome repoſe, in order to prepare to renew the war. There is nothing therefore remarkable in this interval, but the taking of St. Valery, a place of great importance, ſurrendered to the Engliſh, purſuant to a capitulation made ſome months before, and of Buſſi in the Earldom of Guiſe, by the Earl of Ligny, the Duke of Burgundy's General. On the other hand, James de Harcourt became maſter of La Rue in Picardy, and La Hire of Vitry in Champagne.

1423. The Duke of Bedford's deſign, according to the late King his Brother's project, was to reduce all the towns Charles ſtill held in the Iſle of France, and the adjoining Provinces, that he might afterwards attack him beyond the Loire. It was the more neceſſary to proceed in this manner, becauſe, ſo long as Charles had places about Paris, the Engliſh durſt not remove from the Metropolis, without leaving a ſtrong garriſon, and much weakening their armies. At the time the Regent was preparing to execute this deſign, he received the ill news that Graville, one of King Charles's captains, had taken Meulan by ſtorm, the 4th of January. This loſs troubled him extremely, as well becauſe it retarded the execution of his projects, as by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Meulan, which was but ſix leagues from Paris. Beſides, the taking of a place ſo very near him, was a ſort of affront he could hardly digeſt. And therefore, he determined to open the campaign with this ſiege.

Meulan taken by Storm by the French. Monſtrelet. Hall.

They take alſo la Ferté-Milon.

Shortly after, King Charles's troops took likewiſe La Ferté-Milon, a ſmall town between Meaux and Soiſſons. But the caſtle making a brave reſiſtance, the Marſhal de L'Iſle Adam had time to relieve it, and drive the French out of the town.

The Regent beſieges Meulan;

In the beginning of February, the Regent himſelf beſieged Meulan (2). As it was King Charles's intereſt to keep the war in the Iſle of France, and the neighbouring Provinces, he ordered the Earl of Aumarle to join Stuart, who commanded the Scotch troops, and march with him to the relief of that place. The French give Stuart the title of Conſtable of Scotland; but it does not appear, he was ſtiled ſo by the hiſtorians of his nation. I imagine, the miſtake of the French ſprung from their ignorance of the Engliſh and Scotch tongues, where the title of Conſtable may be given to every Leader, or Commander in chief, of a body of troops, without his being, for all that, Conſtable of the kingdom. Be this as it will, the Earl of Buchan, being then in Scotland, Stuart commanded the auxiliary troops of that kingdom. The two Generals were actually joined; but a conteſt ariſing about the command, they parted again without action. Graville hearing of it, capitulated the 2d of March. The capitulation ran, that ſuch of the Beſieged as had any caſtles in their power, ſhould deliver them to the Regent. Purſuant to this agreement, the Regent took poſſeſſion of Marcouſſi, Montlheri, and ſeveral other places (3). 1423.

Though theſe towns are of little conſequence at this day, they were then of great importance, chiefly on account of their lying near Paris, and keeping the Engliſh at a diſtance from the Loire, which was very advantagious to King Charles. For this reaſon he ſo managed, that his adherents fortified themſelves in thoſe parts, in all the towns and caſtles capable of making any reſiſtance in order to continue the war there. And this alſo was the reaſon, that induced the Regent to form the project, of clearing the Iſle of France of all theſe garriſons. However, he would not have opened the campaign ſo early, had he not been forced to it by the loſs of Meulan. He was meditating a much more important deſign, which he executed immediately after the retaking of that place.

Interview of the Dukes of Bedford, Burgundy, Bretagne, and Earl of Richemont, at Amiens. April. Act. Pub. X. p. 280.

I have obſerved, that the Duke of Bretagne made ſome advances towards ſwearing the peace of Troye, but that the death of Henry V, broke off the negotiation. The Duke of Bedford perceiving of what conſequence it was to the King his Nephew, to gain this Prince to his intereſt, had ſpent the whole winter in negotiating an alliance with him, by the Duke of Burgundy's mediation. This negotiation ſucceeding to his wiſh, he came to Amiens, where he met the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, with the Earl of Richemont his Brother. According to the plan before formed, they ſigned a treaty of league and alliance againſt King Charles. To render their union more firm, they moreover concluded two marriages, namely, between the Duke of Bedford and Ann, fifth Siſter of the Duke of Burgundy; and between the Earl of Richemont and Margaret, eldeſt Siſter of the ſame Duke, and Widow of Lewis the Dauphin, who died in 1415. As the Earl of Richemont had been the means of engaging the Duke of Bretagne in this alliance, it was very reaſonable the mediator ſhould find his advantage therein. The young Earl, having an extraordinary opinion of his own merit, his vanity was agreeably flattered by this marriage. Indeed, it was no ſmall honour for him, to eſpouſe a Siſter of the Duke of Burgundy, Widow to a Dauphin of France. But to obtain the Princeſs's conſent, he was forced to agree, that, according to the cuſtom of England, ſhe ſhould keep the title of Dauphineſs, becauſe ſhe abſolutely refuſed to take the inferior one of Counteſs of Richemont. The treaty between theſe Princes was concluded April the 8th.

They ſign a League againſt King Charles. Marriages. Monſtrelet.

The Regent conſummates his marriage. Monſtrelet.

Soon after, the Duke of Bedford went to Troye, where he conſummated his marriage. An hiſtorian ſays, that the Duke of Burgundy, in caſe he died without Male-Iſſue, promiſed him the Earldom of Artois, but there was no occaſion to perform this engagement. In conducting his Bride to Paris, the Regent ſtayed ſome time in Champagne, to form the ſiege of Pont-Sur-ſeine, a ſmall town of that country, which was carried by ſtorm. After that, he came to Paris, and lodged in the Hotel des Tournelles, which he had ordered to be repaired, and magnificently furniſhed.

The Earl of Salisbury beſieges Montaigu. April. Monſtrelet.

In the beginning of the year, the Earl of Salisbury had been inveſted with the government of Champagne and La Brie, and had received orders from the Regent, to clear theſe two Provinces of King Charles's garriſons. This General, having taken the field in April, beſieged, or rather blockaded, Montaigu an exceeding ſtrong Caſtle, ſeated upon a cape, belonging to the Province of Burgundy, but running into Champagne. There were but ſixſcore Men in the Caſtle, and yet, by reaſon of its ſi-

(1) Rapin ſeems to have miſtaken this Thomas Beaufort for his Nephew of the ſame Name, of whom indeed there is no mention but of his Name. This Thomas Beaufort, third Son of John of Gant by Katharine Swynford, was in the 5th of Henry IV made Admiral of England, and afterwards Lord Chancellor. He was created 13 Hen. IV, Earl of Dorſet; and 4 Hen. V, Duke of Exeter, for Life. He was Earl of Harcourt in Normandy, and behaved with much Valour and Conduct in the French Wars, and particularly at the famous Battle of Azincourt, where he commanded the Rear-ward. He bravely defended Harfleur in Normandy, (of which he was Governor) and in a pitch'd Battle, encountered and put to flight the Earl of Armagnac. He married Margaret, Daughter of Sir Thomas Nevil, and had a Son by her, who died young. So that leaving no Child, he departed this Life at Greenwich in 1424, and was buried at St. Edmundſbury in Suffolk, leaving his Nephew John, Earl of Somerſet, his Heir, who was twenty-three years old. *Sandf. tuation, it was almoſt impregnable. The Earl of Saliſbury having formed the blockade, left the Earl of Suffolk (1) with ſome troops, and marched himſelf to other conqueſts. In June, he became maſter of Vertus, Sezanne, Epernay, and ſome other places.

Tannegui attempts to relieve Montaigu.

Mean while, King Charles, to whom the keeping of ſome towns in thoſe parts was of great conſequence, ordered Tannegui du Châtel to relieve Montaigu. The Earl of Salisbury, who had left but few troops before that caſtle, fearing ſome misfortune, poſted immediately to their aſſiſtance. He made ſuch ſpeed, that Tannegui du Châtel, who was now far advanced, finding himſelf too inferior to the Engliſh, was forced to retire into Burgundy, where the French had lately ſurprized Mâcon and Crevant, at the two extremities of that Province. Salisbury followed, but not being able to overtake him, reſolved to beſiege Crevant, a ſtrong place upon the Yonne, three leagues above Auxerre.

Salisbury beſieges Crevant.

Charles had no ſooner received this news, but he ordered Stuart, who was lately reinforced from Scotland, to draw ſome troops out of the neighbouring garriſons, and join du Châtel, in order to attempt the relief of Crevant. All theſe forces together made a body of ten thouſand Men, whereof, by order of the King, the Marſhal de Severac went and took the command. But as it required ſome time, before they could be joined in one body, Salisbury had ſufficient leiſure to take the place. After that, not knowing yet the deſigns of the French, he joined Suffolk before Montaigu.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Burgundy, the Duke of Bedford cauſed Orſay to be beſieged, a ſmall place between Paris and Montlheri. The garriſon holding out ſix weeks, and ſurrendering only at extremity, he reſolved to make them an example, for a terror to the other ſmall towns. All the officers and ſoldiers were carried away priſoners to Paris, and ordered to be put to death. But, happily for them, the ducheſs of Bedford meeting them as they were going to puniſhment, ſtopped the execution, and obtained their pardon.

The French beſiege Crevant. Hall.

Mean time, the French army, drawn together in Auxerrois, marched to Crevant, which they had not been able to relieve, and beſieged it. The army was commanded by the Marſhal de Severac, who had under him du Châtel, Stuart, Ventadour, and ſome other officers of note. The ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, then at Dijon, ſent immediately to the Marſhal Toulongeon, and all the Burgundian Nobles, to try to relieve Crevant. At the ſame time, ſhe deſired the Earl of Salisbury to join her Generals, in order to raiſe the ſiege. Salisbury was very ſenſible, how neceſſary it was to comply with the ducheſs's requeſt, and therefore leaving part of his troops before Montaigu, the garriſon whereof was reduced to twenty Men, repaired to Auxerre, and joined the Burgundians. Next day, they marched together to Crevant. They had in all, but ſix thouſand Men (2), however, they were ſome of the beſt ſoldiers then in Europe. The Beſiegers, hearing of their march, raiſed the ſiege in order to meet them, and poſted themſelves at ſome diſtance from Crevant, upon a Hill, where it was very difficult to force them. The reſolution of the French Generals, ſurprized the Engliſh and Burgundians, who ſeeing no poſſibility of attacking them in that poſt, altered their rout, and, as if they had ſome other deſign, paſſed the Yonne at Cologn-le-Vimeux, with intent to repaſs it at ſome other place, and proceed to Crevant. The French finding, that by this march, their ſtation on the Hill was become uſeleſs, deſcended, and poſted themſelves by the River-ſide, in order to defend the paſſage. The two armies remained above three hours facing one another, with the river between them. At length, a body of Engliſh gaining a certain bridge, withſtood the efforts of the French army with uncommon reſolution, and gave the reſt of the troops time to come to their ſupport. This action, which was one of the boldeſt, was performed with that bravery, order, and conduct, that it was not poſſible for the French to beat them from the bridge. As ſoon as all the Engliſh and Burgundians were over, they ſo vigorouſly attacked their enemies, that they put them to rout. The Marſhal de Severac was blamed for retiring too ſoon, and leaving Stuart engaged with his Scotch troops. There was ſlain on the ſpot, above five hundred (3), moſt of them Scots. As many more were made priſoners, among whom were Stuart, and Xaintrailles, with forty officers of note.

Mâcon and other places taken by the Engliſh.

The loſs ſuſtained by the French on this occaſion, rendering them uncapable to keep the field before a victorious army, the Earl of Salisbury returned to the blockade of Montaigu. A few days after his arrival, the place capitulated, and the fortifications were demoliſhed. Then, being apprehenſive of no oppoſition from the French, he divided his army with the Earl of Suffolk, who took Mâcon, whilſt the Earl of Salisbury finiſhed the conqueſts of Champagne. After that, Salisbury entered the Iſle of France, and took Coucy, and ſome other caſtles. 1423.

Siege and Capitulation of Crotoy. Monſtrelet.

In the mean time, the Regent had laid ſiege to Crotoy, a town in Picardy, ſituated on the Somme, over-againſt St. Valery. Ralph Boteler had the management of this ſiege, which employed him till October. At laſt, James d'Harcourt, governor of the town, agreed to ſurrender it the 1ſt of March next, if not relieved by that time. This ſort of capitulation was very common in thoſe days. On the day fixed for the relief, or ſurrender of the place, the Beſiegers drew up under the walls, expecting their enemies. This was called Tenir Journee. If no army appeared that day to give them battle, the place was ſurrendered according to the capitulation. Though the governor of Crotoy had given ample time to prepare for his relief, Charles was not in condition to attempt it, and the town was ſurrendered to the Duke of Bedford.

The battle of Crevant was the more prejudicial to Charles's affairs, as he loſt many officers of diſtinction, ſome whereof were ſlain, and the reſt priſoners in the hands of the Engliſh or Burgundians. Among the priſoners, Xaintrailles was the perſon for whom the King was moſt concerned, knowing him to be one of the braveſt officers in the kingdom, and moſt capable of doing him ſervice. Though he had not much money, he ſent him however wherewithal to pay his ranſon. Xaintrailles very thankfully received this favour, and to give the King ſenſible marks of his gratitude, preſently after his releaſe, found means to ſurprize Ham and Guiſe. At the ſame time, La Hire or Vignoles, did the like by Compeigne.

The loſs of theſe places gave the Regent no ſmall uneaſineſs, as it obliged him to keep his forces near Paris, in ſpite of the projects he had formed. As he could not execute his deſigns till the French were expelled the northern Provinces, he ordered the three towns taken by ſurprize, to be beſieged all at once. If I ſhould ſtay to relate the circumſtances of all the ſieges on both ſides, during this war, it would inſenſibly lead me into numberleſs relations, for which few people would be concerned. The beſt way will be to keep to generals, and only mention the beginnings and events of the ſieges.

The Regent's deſign being, as I ſaid, to retake theſe three places, the Earl of Ligny inveſted Ham, and the Marſhal de l'Iſle-Adam made an attempt upon Compiegne. But l'Iſle-Adam falling into an ambuſh laid for him by La Hire, loſt three hundred of his Men. Nevertheleſs he obliged his enemy to keep within the walls. After Ligny had taken Ham, he inveſted Guiſe. Xaintrailles, who commanded in that place, perceiving, that with his few troops he ſhould make but a faint reſiſtance, went away in queſt of relief. But inſtead of ſucceeding in his deſign, he fell himſelf into the hands of the Burgundians, and Guiſe ſurrendered immediately. After that Ligny joined l'Iſle-Adam before Compiegne, and La Hire was forced at laſt to capitulate. So, all the advantage Charles gained by taking the three places, was making the Regent loſe time, which however was no ſmall matter, conſidering the ſituation of his affairs.

Charles receives an Aid from the Duke of Milan.

After the Duke of Bretagne had taken part with the Engliſh, Charles ſaw nothing in France able to ſupport him, and therefore reſolved to apply to foreign Princes, for aſſiſtance. He could hope for aid, only from Philip Maria Viſconti Duke of Milan, and the Scots. Philip was Uncle to the Duke of Orleans, and conſequently a friend of the Houſe of Valois. His affairs being then in a good ſituation, he ſent King Charles a thouſand Men at arms, and five hundred Lances, at the time when the loſs of the battle of Crevant had made him deſpair of keeping the field. Theſe troops being arrived on the borders of France, Grolée governor of Lyonnois, and Culant, lately made admiral, went to receive them. As they were entering Baujolois, the governor of la Fuſſiere ſent the Generals word, that he was in negotiation with Toulongeon, Marſhal of Burgundy, to ſurrender the town, and as the Marſhal knew nothing of their march, it would be eaſy to ſurprize him when he came to take poſſeſſion. This ſtratagem was executed with ſuch ſecrecy, that Toulongeon entering la Fuſſiere with ſeven hundred Men, was made priſoner with all his followers. The Duke his maſter exchanged him afterwards for Stuart taken at Crevant.

1423. Battle of Gravelle, where the Engliſh are worſted. Hall.

This little advantage was not capable of comforting King Charles for all his loſſes. But ſhortly after, he had a freſh occaſion of joy, in the news, that a body of Engliſh troops were defeated in Maine with great loſs. John de la Pole, Brother of the Earl of Suffolk, knowing the French had no army in the field, departed from Normandy with a body of troops drawn out of ſeveral garriſons, and throwing himſelf into Anjou, burnt the Suburbs of Angers. After that, he retired with a booty of twelve thouſand head of cattle, taken in his incurſion. Whilſt he was employed in this expedition, the Earl of Aumarle, governor of Anjou, aſſembled ſome troops to ſtop his progreſs. The young Duke of Alenſon, Loheac, Coulonge, the Baſtard of Alenſon, and ſeveral others, joining him with what troops they could draw together (1), he overtook the Engliſh at Gravelle in Maine. Pole perceiving it was impoſſible to drive away his booty without fighting, drew up his troops, and intrenching himſelf with his carriages in the front, received the French with great reſolution. But whilſt his Men were couragiouſly fighting, a detachment of the enemy attacking them in the rear, it was not poſſible for them to defend themſelves on two ſides. After a very obſtinate reſiſtance, they were at length defeated with the loſs of fourteen hundred Men (2), and all their booty. Pole himſelf was taken priſoner (3). Charles's flatterers would have made him believe, he was revenged for the buſineſs of Crevant. But there was a wide difference between theſe two actions, with reſpect to the conſequence. The battle of Gravelle did not affect the affairs of the Engliſh, whereas that of Crevant had almoſt ruined Charles.

Charles has Aid from Scotland. Buchanan.

This ſucceſs however ſerved to raiſe his hopes, eſpecially when it was ſeconded with the news of the arrival of five thouſand Men, brought him from Scotland by the Earl of Buchan. This Lord had returned into his own country, to take care of the intereſts of his new Maſter, to whom he was entirely devoted. The great Men of Scotland were very much inclined the ſame way. The new Regent being a Prince of no great genius and credit, it was not difficult for the Earl his Brother to do King Charles ſervice. By his care and ſollicitations he procured an aid of five thouſand Men, commanded by Archibald Earl of Dowglaſs his father-in-law (4). Dowglaſs was a Lord of great repute in his own country, on account of his quality, riches and alliances, but ſtill more conſiderable for his merit and experience in military affairs. At Rochel he landed his troops, which could never more ſeaſonably arrive. Charles pleaſed, as may be imagined, to ſee theſe ſupplies, loaded the principal Scotch officers with honours, careſſes, and favours. He had already conferred on the Earl of Buchan the higheſt military poſt, to which he could make no addition. Dowglaſs was created Duke of Touraine. Stuart was made Baron d'Aubigni, and afterwards Earl of Evreux, with licence to quarter his arms with thoſe of France. To give the Scots a farther mark of his eſteem and confidence, Charles choſe out of them a company of guards, which in proceſs of time was increaſed to a regiment. In ſhort, he forgot nothing, that could help to gain the affection of the Scots, in order to ingage them to ſend him greater ſupplies, or make a powerful diverſion in England.

Birth of Prince Lewis.

Thus the affairs of Charles began to flouriſh, by the ſuecours of the Scots and the Duke of Milan, which enabled him to withſtand his enemies. His joy at the arrival of theſe troops, was preceded by the ſatisfaction of having a Son born on the 4th of July the ſame year. He gave the young Prince the name of Lewis with the title of Dauphin.

The Earl of Richemont quarrels with the Duke of Bedford.

Beſides theſe happy ſucceſſes, which gave new life to King Charles, an event was preparing in his favour, that was no leſs proper to reſtore his affairs: I mean the Earl of Richemont's change, who drew after it that of the Duke of Bretagne. Richemont having conſummated his marriage at Dijon, where the Duke of Burgundy came with the Dauphineſs his Siſter, went and paid a viſit to the Duke of Bedford at Paris. During his ſtay, he frequently intimated to the Duke, that he was extremely deſirous of commanding the Engliſh army, to which he offered to join a conſiderable body of the Duke his Brother's troops. But the Regent did not think proper, to ſet at the head of his army a young foreign Prince, who had never commanded in chief, nor even ſerved ſince the battle of Azincourt. The Earl of Richemont, who was extremely haughty and ſelf-conceited, could not brook this refuſal. He conſidered it as a great affront, and from that time reſolved to be revenged. We ſhall ſee hereafter how he executed his reſolution. 1423.

Truce for Burgundy and Lyonnois.

Shortly after, Charles and the Duke of Burgundy made a truce for Lyonnois and Burgundy. This truce was abſolutely neceſſary for theſe two Provinces, as well as for the Duke of Savoy, by whoſe means it was procured. His ſubjects and the inhabitants of Burgundy and Lyonnois not being able to live without trading together, the war was very detrimental to theſe two Provinces.

Affairs of England. Act. Pub. X. p. 282. Earl of March Governor of Ireland.

Whilſt France was the Seat of war, England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, by the good order eſtabliſhed in the government. In the month of May (5), Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, was made governor of Ireland, with a very extenſive authority. Policy required that, during the King's minority, this Prince ſhould be removed from the kingdom, on account of his right to the crown. Not that he had given occaſion by his conduct for any ſuſpicion. But it was not impoſſible, that even without his conſent, he might prove the cauſe of commotions, which the wiſdom of the council was willing to prevent. He did not depart till February or March the next year.

A Subſidy granted. Cotton's Abridg. Act. Pub. X. p. 310.

The Parliament, which met on the 20th of October, granted the King a ſubſidy (6) for the ſupport of the war in France, where King Charles ſtill kept his ground, notwithſtanding the great diſproportion between his and his rival's forces (7).

Treaty about letting the King of Scotland at Liberty. Ib. p. 286.

I have obſerved, that the Scots were extremely careſſed by King Charles, and that the nation began to follow maxims entirely different, from what they had done during the Duke of Albany's regency. The Duke of Gloceſter and the council of England, perceiving this alteration, which might prove very prejudicial to the King's affairs, thought it neceſſary to countermine King Charles's deſigns, by means of the King of Scotland, priſoner in England ever ſince 1408. To that end, they reſolved to ſet him at liberty, upon ſuch terms as ſhould attach him to the intereſts of England. This was indeed the only way to ſtop the career of the Scotch Nobles, who were almoſt all inclined to an open rupture with the Engliſh. Whilſt the council was thinking how to proceed without a too plain diſcovery of their deſign, an accident in Scotland ſaved them the trouble of making the firſt advances.

Buchanan.

Murdac Stuart, Regent of Scotland ſince the death of the Duke of Albany his Father, had three Sons, all very ill-tempered, and who created him a great deal of trouble, becauſe he was neither able nor ſteddy enough to keep them within the bounds of their duty. The youngeſt asking one day for a certain Hawk, and being denied, wrung the Bird's neck, though he knew it to be greatly valued by his father. This action convincing the Regent, how difficult it would be for him to govern the nation committed to his care, ſince his own children had ſo little reſpect for him, he aſſembled the States, and propoſed a negotiation with England concerning their King's liberty. A motion ſo agreeable to the wiſhes both of Nobles and People, was received with joy and applauſe. And, not to afford him time to repent, ambaſſadors were immediately named, and impowered to negotiate the affair. As the council of England ſtood affected, theſe ambaſſadors met with a very civil reception, and commiſſioners (8) were preſently appointed to treat with them. The commiſſioners inſtructions were, that they ſhould conſent to King James's liberty, upon the following terms: That the captive Prince ſhould pay the King the ſum of forty, or at leaſt of thirty-ſix thouſand marks, for his expences in England during his captivity: That a truce ſhould be made, during which neither of the two Kings ſhould aſſiſt the other's enemies. Moreover, they were ordered to intimate to the Scotch ambaſſadors, that it would be very proper to marry their King to a Princeſs of the Royal Fa- Act. Pub. X. p. 294, 296.

Firſt Conference. September. p. 299.

The firſt conference upon this affair was held at York in the beginning of September, and on the 10th of the ſame month the plenipotentiaries agreed, that James ſhould have his liberty, and return into his kingdom. That he ſhould pay, at ſeveral times, the ſum of forty thouſand Marks, and give hoſtages for ſecurity of payment. In the ſecond conference, held at London on the 4th of December, every thing relating to the payment of the money, and the quality of the hoſtages, was ſettled. Then it was agreed, that the King of Scotland ſhould marry Joanna, Siſter of the Duke of (1) Somerſet, and Niece of the Duke of Exeter and Biſhop of Wincheſter. On account of this marriage, which was ſolemnized in the beginning of February next year, Henry, or the council in his name, abated ten thouſand of the forty thouſand Marks the King of Scotland was to pay (2).

Matters being thus ſettled, the ambaſſadors of both nations ſigned (3) a ſeven years truce, to commence May the 1ſt, 1424; during which, each of the two Kings was obliged to hinder his ſubjects from doing any damage to the other. So, by this treaty, James bound himſelf indirectly, to recall his troops out of France, before May the 1ſt. Nevertheleſs, whether he neglected to ſend orders for their return, or, as is moſt likely, his Generals found ſome pretence to evade them, theſe troops, as will be ſeen preſently, were ſtill there in Auguſt. All theſe negotiations being thus ended, James was conducted to the borders, and ſet at liberty the beginning of March.

Miſtakes of ſome Engliſh Hiſtorians concerning the Homage. Hollingſh. p. 587.

An Engliſh hiſtorian affirms, that before James quitted England, he ſwore fealty, and did homage to young Henry in Windſor caſtle, for the whole kingdom of Scotland. It were to be wiſhed, that in advancing a fact of ſuch importance, and ſo very improbable, this hiſtorian, who relates the very words of the oath and homage (4), had diſcovered the fountain from whence it was drawn. It cannot be denied, that, ſince John Baliol, all the Kings of Scotland had conſtantly refuſed this homage. For we muſt not reckon among the Kings Edward Baliol, who, to aſcend the throne of Scotland, had made himſelf Slave of Edward III. But not to take things ſo high, it will ſuffice to remark, that Robert III, Father of James, refuſed to do homage to Henry IV; and that ſince, there had been no treaty of peace between the two nations, but truces only, which had ſettled nothing upon this head: ſo James was upon the ſame terms with the King his Father. If therefore he did homage to Henry VI, it muſt have been by virtue of a new agreement. And yet, it does not appear in the inſtructions of the Engliſh commiſſioners, that they had any orders upon that point. The conventions of the Plenipotentiaries, appointed to treat concerning the liberty of King James, make no mention of this homage, though they are very large upon things of much leſs importance. Neither has the treaty of truce any thing like it. In ſhort, in above thirty ſeveral acts, extant in Rymer's Collection, concerning the affairs negotiated in the years 1423 and 1424, between the Engliſh and Scots, there is not one ſyllable alluding to any ſuch thing. Upon all theſe accounts, it is to be preſumed, in my opinion, that what is advanced by this hiſtorian, and by ſeveral others after him, concerning the pretended homage at Windſor, is the pure effect of their prejudice. They verily believed, as many do ſtill, that this homage was due from the King of Scotland; and accordingly they imagined, the captive King would not be ſuffered to depart, without being obliged to pay it. But, beſides the reaſons which the King of Scotland had to refuſe this homage, the ſilence of the records in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeems to me a clear demonſtration. The reader may look back to what has been ſaid upon this ſubject, in the reign of Edward I, where the rights of the Engliſh and Scots were ſufficiently explained.

Beaumont taken by the French. Monſtrelet.

Whilſt the King of Scotland's liberty was negotiating in England, the war was continued in France, with various ſucceſs. In the beginning of the year, the French took, by ſcalade, Beaumont upon Oyſe, a ſmall town in the Iſle of France, ſix leagues from Pontoiſe. 1424.

La Charité ſurprized.

On the other hand, Perrinet Graſſet, a Burgundian adventurer, ſurprized La Charité, a place of great importance, which might open the Engliſh a paſſage over the Loire, and enable them to carry their arms beyond that river.

The taking of places by ſurprize was then ſo frequent, that it is ſtrange, the daily inſtances ſhould not render the governors more vigilant. The Duke of Bedford was extremely concerned to ſee, that as he promoted the execution of his projects, by taking the enemy's towns about Paris, others were ſurprized, which retarded his deſigns. His ſcheme was, as I obſerved, to clear the northern Provinces, and yet he could not accompliſh it. There was no end of it, and therefore it was neceſſary, in order to purſue his project, to take Beaumont from the French. For that purpoſe, he opened the campaign in March, with an army of ten thouſand Men. After he had recovered this place, he made himſelf maſter likewiſe in the Iſle of France, of ſeveral Caſtles, by which the Pariſians were very much incommoded.

The French ſurprize Ivry.

Whilſt he was employed in theſe ſlight expeditions, news was brought, that Giraut, a captain of King Charles's party, had ſurprized Ivry, on the frontiers of Normandy. He poſted immediately into thoſe parts, and, not to give the French time to provide for its defence, laid ſiege to the town, the beginning of July. Giraut perceiving he could not long defend it, in his preſent condition, capitulated to ſurrender on the 15th of Auguſt, if not relieved by that time. King Charles being ſoon informed of this capitulation, reſolved to relieve Ivry at any rate, and to employ in that ſervice the Italian and Scotch troops lately arrived. To theſe, he joined about eleven thouſand Men, drawn out of ſeveral provinces and garriſons; foreſeeing, that without a great ſuperiority of forces, it would be very difficult to ſucceed in his deſign. All theſe troops together, made an army of twenty thouſand Men (5), which was formed in Maine. Charles had never had one ſo numerous. It was the Earl of Buchan's place, as conſtable of France, to command in chief. But he was pleaſed to reſign that honour to the Earl of Douglaſs his Father-in-law, to whom the King ſent for that purpoſe a patent, conſtituting him his Lieutenant-General of the whole kingdom, otherwiſe, the conſtable could not have been under his command.

Earl of Douglaſs commands the Army of France.

All the French Nobles of Charles's party repaired to the army, in order to ſhare in the glory, which was expected from this expedition. The French beginning to march, paſſed on the 12th of Auguſt, by the walls of Verneuil, a town in Perch, poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. The next day, they came in ſight of the Engliſh army, which was advantagiouſly intrenched before Ivry. Douglaſs had no ſooner viewed the enemy's camp, but he judged it impoſſible to be attacked. So, altering his deſign on a ſudden, he immediately returned, and reſolved to lay ſiege to Verneuil. He reckoned, he ſhould have time ſo to fortify his camp, as to expect the Engliſh with advantage; or, in caſe they would not venture to attack him, the taking of Verneuil, would make the King ample amends for the loſs of Ivry. Upon his appearing before Verneuil, the garriſon prepoſterouſly imagined, he was come from defeating the Engliſh before Ivry; taking it for granted, that with ſo great a ſuperiority, he would never return thus without action. In this belief, which the French took care not to deſtroy (6), they ſurrendered upon the firſt ſummons, and Douglaſs garriſoned the place with French.

For that purpoſe, he choſe an advantagious Poſt for his Camp, and for the Field of Battle, a Ground flanked by a Hill, on which he placed two thouſand Archers. He ordered his foremoſt Ranks to take ſuch Piles, as the late King his Brother had ſo ſucceſsfully uſed in the Battle of Azincourt, for the better reſiſting the Efforts of the French Horſe, among whom were all the Nobles. In this poſture, he waited the Enemies Reſolutions, hoping they would be ſo imprudent as to attack him in this Poſt; and he was not deceived in his Expectation.

Diſſentions in the French Council of War.

The Earl of Douglaſs having viewed himſelf the Engliſh Camp, called a Council of War. He repreſented, that the Duke of Bedford, inſtead of advancing, deſigned to fight with advantage, on a Ground choſen by himſelf; and therefore, it was by no means proper to attack him in that Place. That the danger the King's Affairs would be in, was of ſo great a Conſequence, that he thought a Battle was not to be hazarded. That however, if it was judged neceſſary to fight, the beſt way would be to chuſe an advantagious Poſt, and there expect the Enemy, in order not to ingage, till after ſuch Precautions were taken, as would in ſome meaſure warrant Succeſs. This advice coming from a Foreigner, was thought too cautious by ſome of the Council. Amidſt the Debates, a Party was formed againſt the General, headed by Aymeri, Viſcount of Narbonne. This Lord repreſented, that, if with ſuch a Superiority, a Battle was avoided, the reputation of the King's Arms would be irreparably loſt. That by this Cowardiſe the Troops would be ſo terrified, that there would be no poſſibility to lead them againſt Enemies, who were avoided, when they ought to have been attacked. That the King's Affairs were not to be reſtored without ſome great Action; and, as there could not be a fairer Opportunity to vanquiſh the Enemy, to neglect it, would be to betray the Intereſt of the King and Kingdom. Notwithſtanding theſe Reaſons, the Conſtable and oldeſt Captains were of the General's Opinion. But the contrary party were reſolved to carry their Point. Narbonne, their Head, going out of the Council, ordered his Banner to be diſplayed, and began to march towards the Enemies. They who were of his Mind did the ſame, and were joined by all the Volunteers of the Army. Douglaſs was enraged at this Diſobedience. But neither his, nor the Conſtable's Authority, was capable of making them return. Had he been in his own Country, he would have left theſe raſh men to periſh. But as he was in a foreign Kingdom, he was afraid of being taxed with Cowardiſe, or with having voluntarily ſuffered Part of his Troops to be loſt. Beſides, the number of the Diſobedient continually increaſing, he ſaw himſelf forced, though with extreme Indignation, to march with the reſt of the Army. When they ſaw themſelves followed, they readily left the General the Conduct of the Army, congratulating one another upon having conquered his Obſtinacy. Mean while, notwithſtanding the Earl of Douglaſs's care, his Troops, fearing Victory would eſcape them, were in ſuch Diſorder and Confuſion, that, when they came in ſight of the Engliſh, they were almoſt quite out of Breath. However, they immediately attacked them, without regarding thoſe that adviſed to reſt a little before they engaged. The Italians, being expoſed to the Arrows of the two thouſand Archers on the Hill, were the firſt that took to Flight. The French and Scots behaved better, but had to deal with Soldiers inured to War, who were not eaſily frightened. In ſhort, the Leaders ſeeing the attack unſucceſsful, and themſelves liable to everlaſting Diſgrace, and ſome even juſtly fearing an exemplary Puniſhment, choſe an honorable Death before a ſhameful Retreat. The Earl of Douglaſs, the Earl of Buchan, Narbonne, Ventadour, Graville, Rambouillet being ſlain, and many others of the moſt conſiderable wounded, there was ſcarce a General left to lead the Soldiers to the Charge. So the whole Army was utterly routed, and hotly purſued. Then it was, that the greateſt Slaughter was made, as it uſually happens on ſuch Occaſions. The Italians returning, upon a falſe Information that their Friends had the Advantage, met the victorious Engliſh, who ſlew many more of them. Theſe foreign Troops would have been all cut in pieces, had not the Night cooled the Ardor of the Conquerors. The French and Scots loſt above five thouſand Men (1), who lay dead on the ſpot, beſides a great number of Wounded and Priſoners. Among the laſt were the Marſhal de la Fayette and Gaucour. The young Duke of Alenſon, who had behaved moſt gallantly, was found among the Dead, with ſome remains of Life, and by the extraordinary Care of the Regent, cured of his Wounds. But, as will be ſeen hereafter, the Recovery of his Liberty coſt him dear. The Engliſh loſt ſixteen or ſeventeen hundred of their braveſt Soldiers. The 17th of Auguſt, the next day after the Battle, the Regent inveſted Verneuil, where Rambure commanded. This Governor could have long defended himſelf, had he been well ſtored with Proviſions. But that Want, and perhaps the Conſternation of the Garriſon, obliged him to ſurrender the third day. There was found in Verneuil, all the Baggage of the French, Scotch, and Italian Generals, with the Money deſigned for the Payment of the Army. As they entered the Town, the Engliſh met the Corps of the Viſcount of Narbonne, going to be buried; and, becauſe he was one of the Duke of Burgundy's Murderers, took his Body and hung it on a Gibbet (2).

After the Battle of Verneuil, the Regent left the Command of the Army to the Earl of Salisbury, and poſted to Paris, where ſome Mutineers had raiſed a Sedition, in a belief, that he could not fail of being defeated by the French. This Commotion was appeaſed by the Death of ſome of the Ring-Leaders: However it convinced the Regent, that he muſt not truſt to the Affection of the Pariſians, unleſs it was in his Power to keep them always in Awe.

The Earl of Salisbury finding himſelf able to make ſome conſiderable Attempt, entered Maine (3), and beſieged Mans, the Capital of the Province, and one of the ſtrongeſt Cities in France. The Governor made a long and brave Defence; but at length, deſpairing of Relief, he capitulated. After the taking of Mans (4), the Engliſh General inveſted La Ferté Bernard, another Place in the ſame Province, which could hardly be carried by Storm, by reaſon of its Situation. Whilſt Part of his Troops kept this Place blocked up, he over-ran the reſt of the Province, and took St. Suſanne (5), with ſome other Places. He finiſhed this glorious Campaign, and the Conqueſt of Maine, with taking La Ferté Bernard (6), after a four Months Blockade.

Salisbury conquers Maine. Hall. Monſtrelet.

The Defeats of Crevant and Verneuil, had thrown King Charles's Troops, and all his Towns, into great Conſternation. Had not Winter been ſo near, probably, the Engliſh would have puſhed their Conqueſts farther. But this delay, which the Seaſon gave King Charles, would have only retarded his ruin a few Months, if a favorable and unexpected Event had not given him time to breathe. I mean the Quarrel between the Dukes of Gloceſter and Brabant, wherein the Duke of Burgundy was alſo engaged. It may be truly ſaid, that this Affair cauſed the Engliſh to loſe the fatal Moment, which, probably, was to determine the ruin of the Houſe of Valois, and render them maſters of all France. This will plainly appear in the Sequel. But it will be neceſſary firſt, to give a brief Account of the Riſe of this Quarrel, which proved ſo fatal to England.

A favorable Event for Charles.

William of Bavaria, late Earl of Hainault, had by Margaret his Counteſs, Daughter of Philip le Hardy, Duke of Burgundy, an only Daughter called Jaquelina, who had been married to John ſecond Son of Charles VI. John being Dauphin by the Death of his elder Brother Lewis, died at Compiegne in 1416, and Jaquelina remained a Widow at her Father's Houſe. The Earl her Father dying ſhortly after, ſhe became Heireſs of his Dominions, containing Hainault, Holland, Zealand and Frieſland. So noble an Inheritance could not fail to attract the Addreſſes of many Princes. But the Counteſs her Mother being deſirous to procure this rich Match for a Prince of her own Family, caſt her Eyes on John Duke of Brabant, her Nephew, and perſuaded her Daughter to marry him. This Marriage proved unfortunate. The new-married Couple ſoon quarrelled, for Reaſons foreign 1424. to our Hiſtory (1). Their Quarrel grew to that height, that Jaquelina at laſt cauſed herſelf to be run away with, by ſome Engliſh Knights, who carried her to London. I have obſerved in the foregoing Reign, that this voluntary Rape was not unknown to King Henry V. Very probably, this Monarch had then thoughts of marrying Jaquelina to the Duke of Gloceſter.

Upon this Princeſs's Arrival in England, ſhe began to think of annulling her Marriage with the Duke of Brabant. To that end, ſhe applied to the Anti-pope Benedict XIII. who, though depoſed by the Council of Piſa, perſiſted in keeping his Title and Dignity. The pretended Pope, overjoyed at being addreſſed to, nulled Jaquelina's Marriage, with permiſſion to marry again. But whether Henry V was afraid of diſobliging the Duke of Burgundy, Couſin-German of the Duke of Brabant, or thought it too irregular to uſe the Diſpenſation of a Pope, whom he himſelf acknowledged not for ſuch, he haſtened not the Concluſion of the projected Marriage.

Henry dying in the mean while, the Duke of Gloceſter believed, he ought not to delay any longer ſo advantagious a Marriage. He eſpouſed Jaquelina, either in the very Year 1422, or at leaſt in the beginning of 1423 (2); for there is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a Petition dated March 7, 1423, and preſented to him under the Title of Earl of Hainault (3). However this be, the Duke had no ſooner conſummated his Marriage, but he thought of means to take poſſeſſion of his Ducheſs's Dominions, now in the hands of the Duke of Brabant. Mean while, the Duke of Burgundy foreſeeing, Jaquelina's third Marriage might create a War between the two Princes her Husbands, had a Conference upon that ſubject with the Duke of Bedford at Amiens, and afterwards another at Paris in December 1423. They agreed, that the Deciſion of this Affair ſhould be left to the Pope, as the proper Judge of ſuch Caſes. The Duke of Brabant approved of the Expedient, becauſe he knew, there was no ſufficient Reaſon to induce the Court of Rome to annul the Marriage. But the Duke of Gloceſter rejected it, proteſting however, he was ready to conſent to a reaſonable Agreement. Mean time, he made Preparations to ſupport his Pretenſions, whilſt the Duke of Bedford his Brother was triumphantly proſecuting the War in France. At laſt, in October 1424, he came to Calais with his Ducheſs, and brought with him a Body of five thouſand Men. He ſtaid there till about the middle of November.

The Duke of Burgundy comes to the Duke of Bedford at Paris.

Though the Duke of Burgundy was intirely in the Duke of Brabant's Intereſt, his good Underſtanding with the Engliſh was not altered. He ſtill hoped, the Duke of Gloceſter would deſiſt from his Pretenſions; and the more, as he ſaw the Duke of Bedford his Brother, uſing his Endeavours to perſuade him. The arrival of the Engliſh Troops at Calais alarmed him not, being yet ignorant, they were deſigned againſt the Duke of Brabant. Nay, very likely, they were ſent from England to ſtrengthen the Regent. And therefore, whilſt the Duke of Gloceſter ſtaid at Calais, Philip was at Paris, partaking of the Diverſions and Entertainments made by the Regent, on account of his glorious Campaign. At his return to Dijon, he celebrated his ſecond Nuptials with Bona of Artois, Widow of Philip Earl of Nevers, his Uncle. Whilſt this Marriage was ſolemnizing at Dijon, the Duke of Gloceſter departed from Calais, and, with Jaquelina his Wife, marched towards Hainault. He paſſed through part of the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions, without ſuffering his Troops to commit any diſorder, and came before Bouchain, which opened her Gates to him. Shortly after, all the other Towns of Hainault ſubmitted and ſwore Fealty to him and the Ducheſs. Whereupon, the Duke of Burgundy ordered Ligny and l'Iſle-Adam, to draw an Army together with all poſſible Speed, and join the Earl of St. Pol, Brother of the Duke of Brabant, who was making Preparations at Bruſſels, for the Aſſiſtance of the Duke his Brother. But, before we proceed in this Affair, it will be neceſſary to cloſe the Account of the Occurrences of the Year 1424, with what paſſed in England. 1424.

Sir John Mortimer, Uncle of Edmund Earl of March, having been ſome time Priſoner in the Tower, was charged with attempting to make his Eſcape, in order to ſtir up an Inſurrection in Wales. It was pretended, his deſign was to proclaim the Earl of March his Nephew, and upon his refuſal, to proclaim himſelf. Whether his Crime was proved, or it was thought proper to make away with a Perſon, who, in caſe he had eſcaped, might have done Miſchief, he was condemned and executed (4). Cotton's Abridg. Hall. Stow.

Death of the Earl of March. The Duke of York his Heir. Hall. Stow.

The Earl of March his Nephew did not long ſurvive him. He died in Ireland, about the latter end of the Year, without any Iſſue. By his death, the Title of Earl of March, and his Right to the Crown of England, from which he was excluded by the Election of Henry IV, deſcended to Richard Duke of York his Nephew, Son of Ann his Siſter, and the Earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton in 1415. All the Engliſh Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, that this Prince, then under Age, bore not yet the Title of Duke of York, which, according to them, was not conferred upon him till the Parliament of Leiceſter in 1426. But we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he is ſtiled Duke of York, in an Act dated February 26, 1425, that is, thirteen Months before the Parliament of Leiceſter, where he was only made Knight (5). Act. Pub. X. p. 342.

1425. Sad State of King Charles's Affairs. P. Daniel.

In the beginning of the Year 1425, the Affairs of King Charles were in a deplorable Condition. The Battles of Crevant and Verneul had deprived him of his Troops, and beſt Generals. He had neither Money nor Credit. His Revenues being all mortgaged, he ſaw himſelf unable to bring an Army into the Field. The Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, the two moſt powerful Vaſſals of the Crown, were in ſtrict Union with the Engliſh. The King of Sicily, his Brother-in-law, had juſt loſt Maine, and could hardly preſerve the reſt of his Dominions. The King of Scotland, antient Ally of France, had made a Truce with the Engliſh, which tied up his Hands, and hindered him from ſending any Succours. Reduced to this wretched ſtate, he ſaw himſelf as it were forced beyond the Loire, without hopes of keeping any longer his Towns about Paris. To this was added, the juſt Apprehenſion of quickly ſeeing the Enemy's Armies in Berry, Languedoc, and Dauphiné. The Engliſh called him only the Earl of Ponthieu, or in deriſion, the King of Bourges.

The Affair of Hainault. Hall.

Certainly, if the Duke of Gloceſter had ſhewn the ſame Zeal for the King his Nephew's Intereſts, as he did for his own, and ſent the Duke of Bedford the Troops and Money, he employed againſt the Duke of Brabant, it may be reaſonably preſumed, France would have been undone. Never would Charles have had it in his Power to wreſt that Conqueſt out of the hands of the Engliſh. This was the critical Minute, which that Nation ſhould not have neglected. They were near the End of a War, which had laſted ten Years, and probably, was going to end according to their Wiſh, in ſecuring the Crown of France to the Kings of England. The Duke of Bedford ſaw it plainly. He never ceaſed to ſollicite his Brother to improve ſo favourable a Juncture, and defer the Execution of his deſigns till a more convenient Seaſon, when he might even employ all the Forces of France and England. But his Remonſtrances were not capable of diverting the ambitious Duke, from an Enterprize which promiſed him the poſſeſſion of four of the fineſt Provinces of the Low-Countries. He was a younger Brother, and the Succeſſion of the Throne of England, ſuppoſing the King his Nephew died without Iſſue, was to come to his Brother before him. For this reaſon, he thought he ſhould not neglect this opportunity, which would raiſe him above the rank of a Subject, and was not likely to offer again. But at the ſame time, he cauſed the Duke his Brother to loſe that, of compleating the Conqueſt of France. The great number of Garriſons requiſite in the Kingdom, where was neither Town nor Caſtle, but what was fortified, drained the Engliſh Army. So, the Regent not receiving any Supplies, becauſe of the unhappy diverſion of Hainault, was no more able than King Charles, to bring an Army into the Field. This is the true Reaſon why,

(1) The Duke of Brabant was an infirm and weak Prince; whereas Jaquelina had a Courage and Genius uncommon to her Sex. P. Daniel Hiſt. Franc. Tom. VI. p. 18.

(4) Holland, Zealand, &c. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. X. p. 279.

(4) Rapin, deceived by the likeneſs of Names, calls Sir John Mortimer, Brother of the Earl of March. The Genealogy ſtands thus. Edmund Mortimer, third Earl of March, married Philippa, Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, and by her had, 1. Roger; 2. Edmund, who married Glendour's Daughter; 3. John, Priſoner in the Tower, and put to death 3 Henry VI. The ſaid Roger dying in Ireland, 22 Richard II. left, 1. Edmund, ſent into Ireland by Henry IV, and kept Priſoner in the Caſtle of Trim, till he died childleſs in 3 Henry VI, 1424. 2. Roger, who died young. 3. Ann, Wife of Richard of Coniſburg, Earl of Cambridge, ſecond Son of Edmund de Langley Duke of York, fifth Son of Edward III, he was beheaded at Southampton, 1415, leaving a Son, Richard Duke of York, and Heir to his Uncle Edmund Mortimer Earl of March. Hence it is plain, Sir John Mortimer was not Brother, as Rapin ſays, but Uncle to Edmund Earl of March, that died this Year 1424 in Ireland.——The Tranſaction, mentioned here by Rapin, happened this Year in February, during the Parliament that was then ſitting. Continuation of the Business of Hainault. Monstrelet. Stow.

I left the Duke of Gloucester Master of Hainault, and the Duke of Burgundy preparing to dispossess him. In Burgundy's Orders to his Generals for levying an Army, he set forth, that having agreed with the Duke of Bedford, upon an Expedient to end the Quarrel, it was accepted by the Duke of Brabant, but rejected by the Duke of Gloucester. The English Prince hearing what the Duke of Burgundy had advanced, sent him a Letter, dated from Mons, January the 12th, 1424-5, taxing him with saying an Un-truth. The Duke of Burgundy, provoked at this Affront, returned him a very abusive Answer. He told him he lied, and offered to make good his Assertion, in single Combat, and to take the Duke of Bedford for Judge (1). The Duke of Gloucester accepted the Challenge, and appointed St. George's day for the Combat. Several other bitter Letters passed between them, but of no consequence to what I have farther to say.

Braine taken by the Brabanders. Monstrelet. Stow.

Whilst these two Princes were thus reviling each other, the Earl of St. Pol, Brother of the Duke of Brabant, besieged the little Town of Braine in Hainault, defended by two hundred English. After a faint Resistance, the Garrison capitulating, the Brabanders violated the Articles, put the English to the Sword, and set Fire to the Town (2).

Truce between the Dukes of Gloucester and Brabant.

Mean while, as the single Combat of the Dukes of Burgundy and Gloucester was of course to decide the principal Quarrel between Gloucester and Brabant, it was thought proper to make a Truce, in expectation of the Success of the Combat. Upon signing the Truce, the Duke of Gloucester returned into England. He would have carried his Dutchess along with him, but the People of Mons were so urgent with him to leave her behind, that he could not deny their Request. He made the Magistrates, however, solemnly swear to defend her, at the Peril of their Lives, against all Persons whatever (3).

Charles takes Advantage of the Hainault Diversion. P. Daniel.

Whilst the War of Hainault suspended that of France, Charles took measures to improve this happy diversion. In a great Council, held to consider the State of his Affairs, it was unanimously agreed, there was but one way to free him from his present Circumstances. And that was, to offer the Duke of Burgundy and Bretagne a Carte Blanche, in order to win them from the English. The first had openly broke with the Duke of Gloucester: The other might be gained by the Earl of Richemont his Brother, who had great Influence over him, and moreover was very angry with the of Duke Bedford. This was a Juncture which was not to be neglected. On the other hand, Bona of Artois, lately married to the Duke of Burgundy, being French, and Half-Sister to the Earl of Clermont, the King's zealous Adherent, it was likely she would readily endeavour to gain the Duke her Spouse.

He gains the Earl of Richemont, and by his means the Duke of Bretagne. Monstrelet.

The Resolution being then taken to try these two means, Charles sent to the Earl of Richemont private Emissaries, who told him, what a great Esteem the King had for him; intimating, that he had often said, he should deem himself invincible, if he could have him at the head of his Army. This was attacking the Prince in the most sensible Part. As he had a high Conceit of his own Merit, it was no small Pleasure to him, to see King Charles offer him a Post, scornfully refused him by the Duke of Bedford. However, knowing the Persons that talked to him thus, were sent only to sound him, he contented himself with returning a civil Answer to their Compliments, and artfully insinuating, he had a great Inclination to serve their Master.

The first Step being taken, Charles sent to him the Queen Dowager of Sicily his Mother-in-law, with Tannegui du Châtel, and empowered them to offer him the Constable's Sword. This Post had been vacant ever since the Death of the Earl of Buchan, slain in the Battle of Verneuil. The Queen of Sicily and du Châtel found the Earl entirely disposed to the change. He was exasperated against the Duke of Bedford, and being extremely proud and vindictive, was pleased to think, he should have an opportunity of revenging his Contempt. So, without much Sollicitation, he accepted the King's Offer, with great Demonstrations of Thankfulness, and promised to engage the Duke his Brother in his Interests. However, he required two Conditions without which, he protested, he could not accept the Honour designed him by the King, or promise any thing, with regard to the Duke his Brother. The first was, that Louvet and d'Avaugour, the principal Authors of the Pontievrian Conspiracy, should be removed from Court. The second, that the Duke of Burgundy should consent to the proposed Affair. His reason was, because he had engaged himself by Oath with the Duke of Burgundy, in the Treaty of Amiens. He had not the same Scruple with respect to the Duke of Bedford, though he was no less engaged with him, than with the Duke of Burgundy. But Passion frequently causes the same thing to appear with two different Faces, according to the Persons with whom we are concerned. The Queen and du Châtel readily assured him, the King would comply with his Demands. Whereupon he came to Tours, where Charles took care to flatter his Vanity with all possible Civilities and Caresses. But however, the Earl stood firm to his previous Demands, and told the King plainly, he could list in his Service, only upon the Terms proposed. The King gave him hopes of the first, without however fixing the time; and as to the second, was pleased, that he should talk with the Duke of Burgundy, to obtain his Consent. He took likewise this opportunity to send to the Duke of Burgundy the Bishops of Puy and Chartres, with orders to sound him, whether there was any way to disengage him from the King of England.

Conditions demanded by the Earl of Richemont.

The Duke of Burgundy less intractable with regard to Charles VII.

Though the Duke of Burgundy was extremely incensed against the Duke of Gloucester, he appeared not so inclinable to an Agreement, as Charles and his Council expected. The Murder of the Duke his Father being still fresh in his Mind, he shewed at first great Aversion to a Reconciliation. Nevertheless, pressed by the King's Envoys, who endeavoured to excuse their Master by casting the Blame on his evil Counsellors, he replied, the King therefore should dismiss those pernicious Counsellors, and then it would be time to talk of an Accommodation. This was a sufficient Intimation, that he was not inexorable, especially as he readily consented, that the Earl of Richemont should accept of the Constable's Sword.

The King's perplexity about his Favourites. P. Daniel. Du. Tillet.

Charles, it seems, had reason to congratulate himself upon his good Fortune. It was in his own Power to gain the Duke of Bretagne; and moreover, he had hopes that the Duke of Burgundy was not Proof against a reasonable Satisfaction. However, the Terms imposed upon him threw him into great Perplexity. To procure these Advantages, he must part with his two principal Ministers, Favorites and Confidents, namely, Tannegui du Châtel, who slew the Duke of Burgundy, and Louvet, President of Provence, whom the Duke of Bretagne considered as Author of the Pontievrian Conspiracy. Du Chatel saved him part of his Trouble to make this Sacrifice. He came and cast himself at his feet, intreating him, in Reward of his Services, to give him leave to retire, since his Presence at Court could not, for the future, but be detrimental to so good a Master. It was with extreme Reluctance that the King granted his Request. It was a long time before he could come to a Resolution. Mean while, pressed by the continual Instances of a faithful Servant, who desired his leave, only to give him a fresh Proof of his Zeal, he suffered him at length to retire. There are few Favorites, who thus prefer their Master's Good to their own. Louvet, who was not so disinterested, did not think himself obliged to follow this Example. He would have kept himself in his Post, at the Expence of all the Advantages the King could expect from an Alliance with the Duke of Bretagne.

Mean while, the Earl of Richemont not doubting in the least, that the King would perform his Promise in relation to Louvet, came to him at Tours, where he received the Constable's Sword (4) the 7th of March, 1425. He had promised to win the Duke of Bretagne from England, but, as he still saw Louvet and d'Avaugour about the King, was not in haste to perform his Engagement. Charles was willing enough to make him a Sacrifice of the last. But Louvet had a surer footing at Court. Besides his being beloved by the King, one of his Daughters, Wife of the Lord de Joyeuse, shared Charles's Heart with Agnes Sorrel, who began to appear at Court as a Favorite. Wherefore, to gain the Duke of Bretagne, Charles saw himself forced to dismiss a beloved Minister, and disoblige a Mistress. This gave him no small Concern. On the other hand, Louvet used his utmost Endeavours to ruin the Constable in his Master's Favour. He represented to him, with what Haughtiness he had imposed Terms on his Sovereign, as if he had been his Equal, and caused it to be considered as a Favour, that he was pleased to accept of the Constable's Sword. In short, he so managed the King, that Charles, who was very obstinate, resolved not to part with his Minister, let what would be the Consequence.

1425. Men at Court, he ſo caballed with them, that a Plot was formed to remove him from the King. When he was ſecure of the Succeſs of his Project, he withdrew from Court without taking leave, and ſent the King word, he would never return ſo long as Louvet was there. Charles little regarding his Retreat, ſtill perſiſted in the Reſolution to keep his Miniſter. But when he ſaw, that by degrees the great Men retired to their Governments, on divers Pretences, that they refuſed to receive his Orders, and that he had but two or three Towns left, which he could call his own, he found he muſt reſolve to part with Louvet, or his Kingdom. He was even apprehenſive, that the Conſtable would deliver the Duke of Bretagne's Places to the Engliſh. So, he was forced, tho' with extreme Indignation, to diſmiſs his Miniſter, who had ſtill Credit enough to cauſe his Creature de Giac to be received in his Room.

Upon this Removal, the Conſtable was willing to return to Court, but Charles was ſo provoked with him, that he could not bear to ſee him. However, the State of his Affairs obliged him at length to admit him again. The Conſtable, content with having accompliſhed his Deſigns, performed his Promiſe concerning the Duke his Brother, and brought him to Saumur, where he did Homage to the King (1).

Quarrel between the Duke of Gloceſter and Biſhop of Wincheſter. Hall.

Whilſt the Earl of Richemont was raiſing diſturbances in the Court of King Charles, Henry enjoyed not greater Tranquillity. I have obſerved, that the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, his Uncle, were not Friends. On which Side ſoever the Fault lay, they loſt no opportunity of plaguing one another. The Hainault Expedition furniſhed the Biſhop with one, which he knew how to improve. When that undertaking was propoſed in Council, he ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and manifeſtly ſhewed, how prejudicial it might be to the King's Affairs. But though, on this occaſion, he was in the right, the Duke of Gloceſter had Intereſt enough to have it approved. He departed with a Mind imbittered againſt his Uncle, and with a reſolution to be revenged, the firſt opportunity.

The Hiſtorians inform us not, how the Government was ſettled during the Duke of Gloceſter's Abſence, which laſted about a Year (2). Very likely, the Biſhop of Wincheſter had the greateſt Share in it, and made uſe of this Advantage to create his Enemy many Vexations. Some even ſay, all his Proceedings tended to deprive him of the Protectorſhip, in order to obtain it for himſelf.

The Duke being returned into England, about October 1425, this Quarrel was kindled afreſh, with great Animoſity on both Sides. One day as he intended to go to the Tower, Sir Richard Woodville the Governor refuſed him Admittance, by the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Advice. The Protector, who was exceeding high-ſpirited, flew into a great Paſſion with the Biſhop, and proceeded even to Threats. In a word, the Quarrel was carried ſo far, that they both began to arm their Friends, either to attack or deſend. The Duke of Coimbra, Prince of Portugal, then in England (3), and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, endeavoured in vain to reconcile them. An Hiſtorian ſays, the Biſhop of Wincheſter was forced to fly for refuge to the Tower, and that eight or ten of his People were killed by the Duke's. But this is unlikely, ſince, in their mutual Complaints, laid before the enſuing Parliament, there is no mention of any ſuch thing.

The Duke of Bedford comes into England. Hall.

The Prelate having no Warriors on his Side, did not find his account in deciding the Quarrel by Arms. The Intrigues of the Cabinet were more within his Province. And therefore, to prevent the Miſchief that might befal him, if things remained in this ſtate, he writ to the Duke of Bedford, deſiring him to come into England. He told him in his Letter, unleſs he made all poſſible Haſte, the Kingdom was in danger of being expoſed to fatal Commotions, by his Brother's violent Temper. The Duke of Bedford perceiving the Importance of this Quarrel, ſet out immediately, leaving in France, Richard de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, to command in his room, and arrived in England December the 20th.

As ſoon as the Duke ſet foot in the Kingdom, he aſſumed the Title of Protector, and was received as ſuch, purſuant to the Act of Parliament in 1422. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, not only that Petitions were preſented to him as Protector, but the Parliament aſſigned him the Salary of eight thouſand Marks, annexed to that Dignity, and which the Duke of Gloceſter till then had enjoyed.

1426. The Duke of Bedford received for Protector. Id. p. 357, 359, 365.

A few days after his Arrival, the Duke of Bedford ſpoke in the Council, of the Treachery of the Duke of Bretagne, and the Earl of Richemont, repreſenting the Prejudice it brought to the King's Affairs. Upon his Remonſtrances, and by his Advice, it was unanimouſly reſolved, to declare War againſt the Duke of Bretagne; which was accordingly done on the 15th of January, by Proclamation. Moreover, to find that Prince Employment in his own Country, and hinder him from aſſiſting King Charles, a reſolution was taken to ſupport the Pontievrians his Enemies, and try, by their means, to raiſe a Civil War in Bretagne. To that end, Safe-Conducts were diſpatched to the two Brothers of Pontievre: But however, nothing came of it. Probably, their Intereſt was not great in that Country.

England proclaims War with Bretagne. Ib. p. 340. Argentre.

This affair being ended, the Duke of Bedford wholly applied himſelf, to procure a ſincere Reconciliation between the Duke his Brother and the Biſhop of Wincheſter. The way to ſucceed, was to favor neither. Had he taken his Brother's Part, as the Ties of Blood ſeemed to require, he would not have been fit to perform the Office of a Mediator. Moreover, beſides the Character of Brother and Nephew, he had another to maintain, in order to anſwer his Duty, and the Expectations of the Publick; I mean that of Protector, chiefly concerned in the Good of the State, independently of the Duties of Nature. So, not to take upon himſelf alone ſo nice an Affair, he aſſembled ſome of the prime Nobility at St. Albans, in hopes of finding, with their Aſſiſtance, ſome expedient, to content theſe two Princes. But their Animoſity was ſo great, that it was not poſſible to ſucceed by this means. After many fruitleſs Endeavours, the Deciſion of the Affair was forced to be referred to a Parliament ſummoned at Leiceſter for March (4). When the Parliament met, the Duke of Gloceſter exhibited ſix Articles againſt the Biſhop.

Articles of Accuſation againſt the Biſhop. Hall.

II. That he would have removed the King from his Palace at Eltham, to Windſor, with deſign to become Maſter of his Perſon.

III. That not being ſatisfied, with cauſing him to be denied Admittance into the Tower, as was ſaid in the firſt Article, he had placed armed Men on London Bridge, and in Southwark, on purpoſe to murder him.

IV. That he had concealed a Villain in the late King's room, when Prince of Wales, in order to murder him.

V. That he had adviſed the ſame Prince, to ſeize the Crown, before the King his Father's Death.

VI. That in his Letter to the Duke of Bedford, it evidently appeared, that his Deſign was to raiſe a Civil War in the Kingdom.

To the ſecond he anſwered, That he never purpoſed to lay Hands on the King, or remove him, without the Advice of the Council: For, the doing of it would have been no Advantage to him, but rather great Peril and Charge. 3. To the third he ſaid, That what armed Men he employed, it was only in his own Defence for he was often warned,

Then they obliged the two Princes to be reconciled. Whereupon they ſhook hands, and ſeemingly parted good Friends, but however were no leſs Enemies to each other.

He is declared innocent. They are made Friends outwardly.

Mean while, as the Times and Circumſtances of Affairs would not allow the Duke of Gloceſter to be entirely ſacrificed to his Enemy, the Protector took care to procure him alſo ſome Satisfaction. In the firſt Place, he took the Great Seal from the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and gave it to the Biſhop of London. Moreover, as it was impoſſible for the two Adverſaries to be together in the Council, without great Prejudice to the King's Affairs, he prevailed with the Biſhop to go with him into France, under colour of performing a Vow. But to repair the Injury his Abſence might do him, he had leave to ſollicite a Cardinal's Cap, which was ſent him ſhortly after.

Expedients to ſatisfy both Parties. Act. Pub. X. p 353

P. 358.

This Affair being thus happily ended, the Protector reſtored John Mowbray, Earl Marſhal, to the Title of Duke of Norfolk, which his Father Thomas, was deprived of by Richard II. At the ſame time (1), he made forty Knights, among whom was the young Duke of York. Hence, doubtleſs, it is, that this Prince is ſaid to receive in this Parliament the Title of Duke of York, though it is certain he bore it before, as has been obſerved.

Mowbray reſtored, and the Duke of York, with forty others knighted, P. 356.

Whilſt the Duke of Bedford was thus employed in England, the Conſtable Richemont levied an Army in Bretagne. He was extremely impatient to ſhow, that he was not unworthy of his Poſt. By his Care and Credit, this Army amounted to twenty thouſand Men. With theſe numerous Forces, which the Earl of Warwick was not in condition to withſtand, he entered Normandy, and took Pontorſon about the end of February. Then he laid Siege to St. James de Beuvron, where the Engliſh had a ſtrong Garriſon. This Siege proved more tedious and difficult than he expected. He had been promiſed a Convoy of Money, which came not. De Giac, who had the Management of the Treaſury, was in no haſte to ſend it, being glad to make him receive ſome Mortification. He was afraid, if the Conſtable gained reputation at this Siege, he would grow more haughty and daring, and pretend to rule the Court as he pleaſed. Mean while, the Army diminiſhed every Day by Deſertions. Theſe Diſappointments exceedingly troubled the Conſtable, in a Dread, that his Reputation would be blaſted in his firſt notable Action. In ſhort, he received falſe Intelligence, that the Engliſh were aſſembling all their Forces to raiſe the Siege. His fear of a Diſgrace, made him reſolve to ſtorm the Town, though the Breach was not yet ſufficiently wide or prepared. Mean while, to ſecure himſelf againſt the dreaded Relief, he detached two thouſand Men, with Orders to poſt themſelves on the Road to Avranche, and oppoſe the firſt Efforts of the Enemies, if they came during the Aſſault. Then he cauſed the Breach to be vigorouſly attacked. But the Garriſon, which was very numerous, made ſo brave a Reſiſtance, as gave the Beſiegers but ſmall hopes of being Maſters of it. Whilſt both Sides were fighting with equal Ardor, the Detachment hearing no News of the Enemies, and imagining it diſhonorable to expect them in vain, whilſt the reſt were engaged, haſtily returned to aſſiſt at the Aſſault. Their coming threw the Beſiegers into a Panick. They fancied, the Detachment being repulſed by the Enemies, were flying for Refuge to the Camp, and in this Belief relinquiſhed the Aſſault. The Conſtable did all he could to undeceive them, but the Diſorder was already ſo great, that it was not poſſible to make them renew the Fight. Mean time, the Beſieged ſeeing the Confuſion that prevailed in the Camp, ſallied out, and ſuddenly falling upon Troops already terrified, eaſily put them to Flight. The Conſtable himſelf was forced to follow them, and leave his Baggage and Artillery in the Power of his Enemies, extremely concerned to ſee all his Projects confounded, by this unfortunate Accident. However, as he had not loſt many Men, he found himſelf ſtill able, after drawing his Army together, to march into Anjou, and take la Fleche and Galerand belonging to the Engliſh.

P. Daniel.

He takes two Towns in Anjou.

The taking of theſe two Places, was not however capable of comforting him for his misfortune before St. James's. He openly accuſed de Giac of being the Cauſe; and regardleſs of the King's Reſentment, reſolved to be revenged. The Moment he returned to Court, after the Campain, which the Deſertion of his Troops obliged him to end ſooner than he would, he cauſed de Giac to be ſeized in his Bed, and by a Sentence, as violent as irregular and raſh, ordered him to be ſtrangled, and then thrown into the Loire. After that, he boldly declared, he would ſerve in the ſame manner, any Perſon whatever, that ſhould endeavour to ingroſs the King's Favour. The Camus of Beaulieu not being terrified with theſe Threats, and accepting de Giac's Place, which was offered him, was, by the Conſtable's means, aſſaſſinated in the King's own Palace, and even before his Eyes. His Pride could not bear any Perſon at Court, that was not his Creature. By the way, this monſtrous Arrogance ill agrees with the exceſſive Commendations beſtowed on this Prince.

and aſſaſſinates Beaulieu.

Charles was ſo provoked at theſe haughty Proceedings, that he would not ſee the Conſtable. Nay, he could not hear him mentioned without horror. But his Diſpleaſure was little regarded by a Man, who had for him both the Nobles and People. In the King's Extremity, every one thought he did him a Favour to ſerve him. Upon the leaſt diſcontent, he was threatned to be left, for the Engliſh, who received with open Arms thoſe that ſubmitted to their King. Beſides, the Earl of Warwick had now inveſted Montargis about a Month, and the King had no other way to relieve that Place, but by the help of the Bretons. So, notwithſtanding the Conſtable's outragious Affronts, he gave leave, at the Inſtance of La Trimouille, that this proud Prince ſhould pay his Reſpects to him. But his Affairs were not more advanced by it.

The King refuſes to ſee him.

But neceſſity obliges him to it.

Whilſt the Duke of Bedford was in England, the Earl of Warwick, who commanded in France, did all that lay in his power, to keep the Affairs of the Engliſh in good State. He found himſelf at firſt too weak to oppoſe the Conſtable's entrance into Normandy; but upon News that the Bretons had disbanded themſelves, becauſe there was no Money to pay them, he thought himſelf able to make ſome Attempt. With a Body of five thouſand Men he entered Maine, and retook ſeveral Caſtles, which the Bretons had ſeized. The ſuprizing of Places was then ſo frequent, that ſometimes the ſame Town changed Maſter twice or thrice in one Year. But there would be no end, if the Circumſtances of every Particular were related. The Earl of Warwick ſeeing, the Conſtable's Defeat before St. James's, the Deſertion of his Troops, and the Broils in Charles's Court, had long diſabled the French from having an Army in the Field, formed a Deſign to become Maſter of Montargis. This Place was neceſſary for the Execution of the Regent's Project, to carry the War beyond the Loire. Indeed, the Engliſh General could not expect, with his few Troops, to take Montargis, by a Siege in Form; but was in hopes, the Place, being cloſely blocked up, would be forced to ſurrender, before it could be relieved. The River Loin parting into three Branches near this Town, there was a neceſſity to ſeparate the Troops into three different Quarters, the principal of which the Earl of Warwick commanded. The ſecond was intruſted with the Earl of Suffolk, and the third with John de la Pole his Brother. Theſe Quarters were joined by Bridges of Communication, and in this Poſture the Engliſh patiently waited, till Hunger ſhould conſtrain the Beſieged to capitulate.

Defeat of the Engliſh at the Blockade of Montargis. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel. Hall.

The Blockade had now laſted three Months, and King Charles had taken no care about relieving the Place. At length, the Beſieged acquainting him that they could no longer reſiſt, without Aſſiſtance, he caſt his Eyes on the Conſtable for that Undertaking. But Richemont, who had now no Army, refuſed the Commiſſion, being unwilling with new-levied Troops to expoſe himſelf to a Diſgrace, like that of St. James. Upon his Refuſal, the Management of this Expedition was committed to the Baſtard of Orleans (2), who was returned from Avignon, where he had retired with Louvet his Father-in-law. This young Lord, then but Twenty-two Years of Age, had already made eight Campains, and on ſeveral occaſions given ſignal Proofs of his Conduct and Courage. He muſt needs have been young, to take ſuch an Enterprize upon him, with only ſixteen hundred Men, againſt the Earl of Warwick (3), whoſe Reputation was equal to that of the greateſt Generals.

To the fifth he ſays, That it is a mere Calumny. 6. As to the words in his Letter, which were----- "By my trouthe if you tary, we ſhall put this Land in Adventure, with a Felde, ſuch a Brother you have here:" He affirms, That he did not thereby mean, he would aſſemble People againſt the King's Peace; but his meaning was, that there were like to be Inſurrections in London, upon occaſion of ſome Orders made by the Mayor and Aldermen, againſt the exceſſive Wages of Maſons, Carpenters, and other Workmen; and the Duke of Gloceſter did not uſe ſo much Diligence, as he ought to have done, in ſuppreſſing thoſe Troubles. Therefore the Duke of Bedford's coming was the more neceſſary. See a full account of this whole Matter in Hall's Chron. fol. 94---99.

1426. The Beſieged having notice that Succours were preparing, let go their Sluices to favour them. The Loin was ſo ſwoln thereby, that the Bridges of Communication between the the Engliſh Quarters were over-flowed. The Baſtard of Orleans arriving in the mean time, thought, as there could not be a more favorable opportunity, he ought immediately to attack the Enemies, before the Waters were fallen. He gave half his Troops to La Hire to attack Pole's Quarter, and with the other half fell upon the Earl of Suffolk. It was a ſtrange ſort of Battle, the Soldiers on both Sides, ſtanding up to their Middle in Water. At laſt, after a long Reſiſtance, the two Quarters attacked, were forced, with the loſs of fifteen hundred Men on the Side of the Engliſh; many of which were drowned in endeavouring to paſs into the other Quarter, by reaſon the Bridges were under Water. Warwick finding it impoſſible to aſſiſt his Men, choſe to retreat in good order. This Action acquired the Baſtard of Orleans a great Reputation, being from that time conſidered as a Perſon, that would one Day become a famous General.

Continuation of the Affair of Hainault. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Since the end of the laſt Year, the Dukes of Burgundy and Gloceſter, had been preparing for their ſingle Combat, which probably, as it was not fought at the time appointed, namely, St. George's Day, was deferred by Conſent. Though theſe two Princes ſeemed to have nothing more to manage, and the Deciſion of the Affairs of Hainault was likely to depend on the Succeſs of their Combat, the Duke of Burgundy did not think himſelf obliged to confound his perſonal Quarrel with the Duke of Brabant's Affairs, or to neglect the Advantages procured him by the Truce, to put that Prince in poſſeſſion of his Wife's Dominions. He no ſooner ſaw the Duke of Gloceſter out of Hainault, but he began by ſecret Emiſſaries, to cabal among the chief Men of the Country, for the delivery of Jaquelina, who continued at Mons. The Counteſs her Mother, ever a Friend to the Houſe of Burgundy, came into the Plot, though ſhe took care to conceal it from her Daughter. When Matters were ripe, the Towns of Hainault ſuddenly declared for the Duke of Brabant, and the Earl of St. Pol his Brother appeared before Mons with an Army. Then the Magiſtrates of the City, pretending a fright, and intimating, they could not alone bear the Brunt of the War, entered into Treaty with him. As every thing had been privately ſettled, they promiſed to deliver Jaquelina to the Duke of Burgundy, till the Pope ſhould decide the Difference in queſtion. All this was tranſacted unknown to Jaquelina, who heard nothing of the Matter till it was too late to help it. She writ to the Duke of Gloceſter, complaining of being baſely betrayed, but her Complaints were in vain. On the 13th of June 1426, ſhe was forced to go from Mons, under the Conduct of the Prince of Orange, who guarded her as far as Gant, where ſhe was to reſide. After that, all Hainault unanimouſly received the Duke of Brabant for Sovereign.

Jaquelina was inraged to ſee herſelf a Priſoner. But perceiving, Reſiſtance would but render her Condition more grievous, ſhe feigned to be pleaſed, that her Affair was left to the Pope's Determination. This Diſſimulation procured her a mild and honorable Treatment, which ſhe knew how to improve. In September, ſhe found means to eſcape in Man's Cloaths, and retire into Holland. She was well received by ſome of her Subjects, whilſt others choſe rather to adhere to the Duke of Burgundy; knowing how difficult it would be to ſupport her againſt ſo potent an Enemy. The Duke, vexed that his Prey had eſcaped him, carried the War into Holland, to hinder her from fortifying herſelf in that Country. This War, which is foreign to our Hiſtory, laſted the Year 1427, and part of 1428. I ſhall hereafter relate the Succeſs, and in the mean time muſt return to what paſſed in France.

1427. Weakneſs of both Parties in France.

The Earl of Warwick's loſs before Montargis, and the Neceſſity of garriſoning ſo many Towns, prevented his keeping the Field. Beſides, the Duke of Bedford had ordered him to ſpare his Troops againſt an important Expedition, which it was not yet proper to diſcover. All this while, Charles was in no better Condition. The Advantage lately gained by his Troops, had not augmented his Forces. Thus both Sides were forced to remain unactive, or at leaſt to content themſelves with Attempts to ſurprize ſome Places.

The Duke of Suffolk is ſurprized in Mans, and relieved by Talbot. P. Daniel.

In the beginning of this Year, the Earl of Foix, who had at length taken part with King Charles, ſent him a Body of Troops, under the Command of Count d' Orval, of the Houſe of Albret. This General approaching Mans, where the Earl of Suffolk was with a few Soldiers, held Intelligence with ſome of the Burghers, who promiſed to deliver the City. Accordingly, he was admitted, and the Earl of Suffolk forced to retire into the Caſtle, where he had but three days Proviſions. In this Extremity, he ſent to Talbot, who was at Alenſon, deſiring him to endeavour to relieve him. Talbot loſt not a Moment. By the next Night, he was with ſome Troops at the foot of the Caſtle, towards the Country, and entered at a Poſtern-Gate, whilſt d' Orval thought himſelf ſafe in the City, not imagining the Beſieged could be ſo ſoon relieved. At Break of day, Suffolk and Talbot ſallied out of the Caſtle, and taking the French unprepared, drove them before them quite out of the City. Thus the Place was almoſt as ſoon recovered as loſt, by the extraordinary Diligence of Talbot, one of the braveſt and moſt experienced Leaders of the Age. 1426.

Suffolk and Talbot take Laval.

After this Expedition, the two Generals marched to Laval, a little Town in Maine, and carried it with Eaſe. Then joining the Earl of Warwick, who was marching to thoſe Parts, they beſieged Pontorſon, taken by the Conſtable Richemont laſt Year. As this Siege was very long, I ſhall leave the Generals there, in order to relate what paſſed elſewhere.

The Duke of Bedford returns to France. The Biſhop of Winchester made a Cardinal. Hall. Stow. Act. Pub. X. p. 413, 414, 417, 423, 432, &c.

The Duke of Bedford was arrived from England the beginning of this Year (1), according to the Engliſh Writers, or ſome Months ſooner, if we believe the French, with a Reinforcement that rendered him formidable. The Biſhop of Wincheſter came with him, who had received at Calais, a Cardinal's Cap, given with great Ceremony. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was generally ſtiled the Cardinal of England, doubtleſs, becauſe he was of the Royal Family. And yet the Engliſh Authors ſeem to have been ignorant of this Circumſtance, ſince they always call him only the Cardinal of Wincheſter. I ſhall give him the ſame Title for the future, in conformity to other Hiſtorians, who mention him only by that Name. Shortly after, the Biſhop was made the Pope's Legate in England, and thereby had opportunity to increaſe his Riches and Credit, to the great Prejudice of the Duke of Gloceſter his Enemy.

Richemont withdraws from Court. P. Daniel. Hall.

The Siege of Pontorſon ſtill coutinued, without King Charles's being able to relieve that Town. He had then much more important Affairs upon his Hands, and which more nearly concerned him. The Conſtable Richemont was retired to Vannes in Bretagne, extremely diſpleaſed at the King's Coldneſs. Since his receiving the Conſtable's Sword, he had done nothing to anſwer the great Expectations he had raiſed of his Valour and Abilities. On the contrary, inſtead of advancing the King's Affairs, he had rendered the Royal Authority ſo contemptible, by his Pride and Oppreſſions, and violent Doings, that Charles was, as I may ſay, leſs a King than before. The Princes and great Men at Court, after his Example, took upon them to give Law to their Sovereign. Since the Death of Beaulieu, la Trimouille was the ſole Favorite, and had ſuch an Aſcendent over the King, that nothing was done but by his Direction. The Conſtable thought at firſt, to have been a great gainer by this Change, becauſe the new Favorite had always profeſſed a Friendſhip for him, but was quickly convinced of the contrary. His Behaviour to the former Miniſters, making this apprehenſive of the ſame Treatment, he uſed his utmoſt Endeavours to inflame the King's Averſion for him. The whole Court quickly perceived it, with extreme Concern. The great Men could expect no Preferments, unleſs the King's Affairs were in a good Situation, and were perſuaded, the Conſtable alone was capable of reſtoring them. For this and ſeveral other Reaſons, la Trimouille grew exceeding odious. This Hatred was carried ſo far, that at laſt a Confederacy was formed againſt him, of which the Earls of Clermont and De la Marche his Couſin, were the Heads. They began with an Attempt upon his Life, after Richemont's Example. Having notice that the King was gone to Loches, and had left la Trimouille at Bourges, they aſſembled ſome Troops, and marched thither to ſeize the Favorite. But they found he was already gone after the King. However, not to loſe their labour entirely, they reſolved to carry away La Borde and De Prie, two of his Creatures, who were retired into the great Tower. De Prie was killed in defending himſelf, but La Borde held out, till the King himſelf came to reſcue him. This Affair turned to a Civil War, which, after laſting ſome Months, was at length ended by the Duke of Alenſon's Mediation. This young Prince, who was taken Priſoner at the Battle of Verneuil, was lately releaſed by the Duke of Burgundy's Interceſſion, who, though an Enemy of King Charles, ſought all occaſions to gain the Friendſhip of the French Princes. But it coſt the Duke of Alenſon two hundred thouſand Crowns, a very conſiderable Sum at all times, but eſpecially at the Time we are ſpeaking of. To procure this Money, he was forced to part with his Jewels, and ſell the Duke of Bretagne the Town of Fougeres, at a very low rate. In return for his late Ser-

The Duke of Bedford marches againſt the Duke of Bretagne. Du Tillet. Argentré.

Whilſt Charles was employed in quelling his Domeſtick Enemies, the Duke of Bedford was intent upon executing a Deſign, formed before he left England; and that was, to reduce the Duke of Bretagne to the Obedience of King Henry. Ever ſince June he had cauſed Pontorſon to be beſieged (1), a ſtrong Town on the Borders of Bretagne, which might have been a great Obſtacle to his Entrance into that Dukedom, had it continued in the Hands of the French. This Siege, which had been very long, being ended (2), the Duke of Bedford repaired to the Army, with a Reinforcement which increaſed it to twenty thouſand Men. With this powerful Body, to which he knew his Enemies had nothing like it to oppoſe, he prepared to enter Bretagne, threatening the Country with utter Deſtruction. Whether the Duke of Bretagne was ſurprized, or, was glad to have an excuſe to abandon King Charles, whom he had joined only out of Condeſcenſion to the Conſtable his Brother, he wiſely prevented the impending Danger. He was very ſenſible, Charles was not able to protect him. Beſides, he was diſpleaſed with him on the Conſtable's account. For theſe Reaſons, he ſent Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Bedford, to ſue for Peace, upon what Terms he pleaſed.

He obliges him to abandon King Charles. Du Tillet. Hall.

Though it was in the Regent's Power to be revenged of the Duke of Bretagne, he thought it his duty, to prefer the Intereſts of the King his Nephew, to his own Satisfaction. Indeed, it was much more advantagious for the King, to make of the Duke of Bretagne a willing Friend, by treating him civilly, than a private Enemy, by uſing him rigorouſly. So, he required nothing more of him, than to ſwear to the Peace of Troye, and cauſe all his States to do the ſame, purſuant to his Engagements with Henry V (3); and to promiſe with an Oath to do Homage to young Henry when required. This Moderation made great Impreſſion on the Duke of Bretagne, who, ever after, proved a Friend to the Engliſh, even in the decline of their Affairs. On the other hand, though the Regent perceived, he could expect no great Aſſiſtance from the Duke of Bretagne, by reaſon of the Influence, the Conſtable his Brother had over him, yet he thought the gaining that Prince from Charles's Party, was no ſmall Advantage to the Engliſh.

Continuation and end of the Affair of Hainault. Monſtrelet.

I left the Duke of Burgundy at War with Jaquelina in Holland, under the ſpecious Pretence of ſupporting the Honour and Intereſt of the Duke of Brabant his Couſin; though, as the Sequel will diſcover, in reality, it was only for his own private Views. This War, as may be imagined, did not turn much to Jaquelina's Advantage. There was too great a Diſproportion between the two Parties. The Duke of Gloceſter was not able of himſelf to give his Ducheſs the Aſſiſtance ſhe wanted. To that end, he muſt have employed the Publick Revenues of England, or procured an extraordinary Subſidy of the Parliament. But that was not eaſily to be obtained, at a time, when the War in France was expenſive to the Nation. However, in the Parliament held this Year, the Duke had Intereſt enough to procure a ſmall Aid. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Parliament petitioned the King, to aſſign the Duke of Gloceſter, the Sum of five thouſand Marks, out of the Subſidy granted him, to enable him to aſſiſt his Ducheſs. To this Sum, the King advanced five thouſand Marks, upon the Salary annexed to the Protectorſhip. With this Aid the Duke ſent a Reinforcement of ſome Engliſh Troops, under the Command of Silvatier (4). But theſe Troops being defeated by the Duke of Burgundy, preſently after their landing, Jaquelina found herſelf reduced to a very ſad Condition. In ſhort, by the Duke of Bedford's Interceſſion, ſhe obtained a Truce, during which the Duke of Gloceſter was brought to conſent, that his Affair with the Duke of Brabant, ſhould be decided by the Pope. It muſt be obſerved, that the Duke of Bedford had now annulled the ſingle Combat, between the Dukes of Burgundy and Gloceſter. Some time after, the Pope publiſhed his Sentence, annulling Jaquelina's Marriage with the Duke of Gloceſter, and confirming her firſt Marriage with the Duke of Brabant (5), who ſurvived but a few Months this Determination, and was ſucceeded by the Earl of St. Pol his Brother. By the death of the Duke her Huſband, Jaquelina ought to have had peaceable poſſeſſion of her Dominions. But the Duke of Burgundy diſcovered on this occaſion, that the Duke of Brabant's Intereſt, was not the Motive of his Proceedings. He ſo ordered it, that Jaquelina's Subjects refuſed to receive her, and made himſelf Mediator between them. The Lion in the Fable was literally practiſed in this Agreement. The Duke obliged Jaquelina, to commit to him the Government of her Dominions, appoint him her Heir, and promiſe never to marry again (6).

The Duke of Burgundy ſecures Jaquelina's Inheritance. Monſtrelet.

All the Hiſtorians generally fix theſe Occurrences to the Year 1427. And yet it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this Affair was not ended May the 18th, 1428. At leaſt the Duke of Gloceſter and Jaquelina had not yet ſubmitted to the Pope's Sentence; for there, Henry VI, ſpeaking of this Princeſs, calls her Jaquette, Ducheſs of Gloceſter and Holland, his well-beloved Aunt. Probably, the Duke of Brabant's Death, had put them in hopes, that their Marriage might be confirmed, or a Diſpenſation obtained to marry again. Accordingly, it was on this account doubtleſs, that the Duke of Burgundy exacted from Jaquelina the forementioned Conditions, in order to deprive the Duke of Gloceſter, of all hopes of ever ſetting foot again in the Low-Countries. Be this as it will, the Duke of Gloceſter, preſſed by his Brother and the Council, who ſaw how prejudicial to the King's Affairs his Obſtinacy was, deſiſted from his Pretenſions. He relinquiſhed Jaquelina, and ſhortly after married Eleanor Cobham (7), whom he had long kept as his Miſtreſs. Thus ended the Quarrel, which had proved ſo fatal to England (8).

Duke of Gloceſter quits Jaquelina, and marries Eleanor Cobham. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Though the Engliſh were no longer concerned in Jaquelina's Affairs, it will not however be improper briefly to relate the Succeſs; and withal, ſhow the Growth of the Houſe of Burgundy's Greatneſs. This Princeſs, notwithſtanding her involuntary Engagement, married afterwards Borſel, a Zelander, which obliged the Duke of Burgundy to make War upon them. Borſel being made Priſoner, Jaquelina was forced, in order to free him, to agree, that her Children by her late Marriage, ſhould be incapable of inheriting her Dominions, and to deliver all her Towns to the Duke of Burgundy. She ſtill lived ten Years, and after her Death, the Duke of Burgundy was acknowledged for Earl of Hainault, Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friſeland. Before Jaquelina's Death, he had taken poſſeſſion of the Earldoms of Zutphen and Namur, of which, he had purchaſed the Reverſion, after the Deceaſe of the Earl of Namur, which happened in 1428. In 1430, he inherited the Duchies of Brabant, Lothier, Limbourg, and the Marquiſate of Anvers, by the Death of Philip Duke of Brabant his Couſin, who left no Iſſue. All theſe Dominions, joined to Flanders, Artois, the two Burgundies, and the Towns on the Somme held of the King of England, put him upon a Level with the crowned Heads. Let us return now to the War in France.

The Engliſh had ſtill a great Superiority over King Charles. Though the Buſineſs of Hainault had ſomething diſordered their Affairs, they were, however, notwithſtanding that Diverſion, in ſo flouriſhing a Condition, as ſeemed to promiſe certain Succeſs. The Duke of Bretagne no longer gave them any Uneaſineſs. The Earl of Richemont his Brother was at Variance with King Charles, without any probability of a Reconciliation. The Duke of Burgundy, freed from the Holland War, could for the future powerfully aſſiſt his Allies. In fine, beſides their numberleſs Garriſons in the Kingdom, the Regent had on foot a Body of twenty thouſand Men, and moreover expected a ſtrong Reinforcement with the Earl of Saliſbury from England.

On the other hand, King Charles was without Allies, and without Refuge. It is true, in order to obtain Succours from Scotland, he was negotiating a Marriage between the Dauphin his Son, and Margaret Daughter of King James, though they were yet both in their Infancy.

In this Parliament it was enacted, That Knights of the Shire, who, in caſe of an undue Election, were, by the 11th of Henry IV, to loſe their Wages; and Sheriffs, who, making a falſe Return, were, by the ſame Statutes, to pay a hundred Pounds; ſhould be admitted to have their Anſwer and Traverſe to Inqueſts and Offices before any Juſtices of Aſſize. Statute-Book.

But

1428. But this was a diſtant Proſpect. Beſides, the King of Scotland had no way ſhown an Inclination to break the Truce with the Engliſh. So, Charles ſeeing no appearance of ſupporting himſelf, ſeemed to have entirely given over all care of preventing the Deſigns of his Enemies. He lived in a ſurprizing Indolence, without loſing any of his uſual Diverſions.

Aſſembly of the chief Men at Paris. Monſtrelet. fol. 37.

The Conſideration of the Poſture of the Affairs of the two Nations, made the Duke of Bedford conclude, the War would ſoon end, and two or three Campains infallibly drive Charles out of the Kingdom. He reſolved therefore to exert his utmoſt, during ſo favorable an Opportunity. But as he had many Troops, it was neceſſary firſt to provide for their Subſiſtence. For that purpoſe, he held an Aſſembly of the chief Men at Paris, to whom, he propoſed revoking all the Grants made to the Church for forty Years paſt. But he met with ſo ſtrong oppoſition from the Clergy, that, not to alienate the Affection of ſo powerful a Body, he was obliged to deſiſt, and to make uſe of other Means for the Maintenance of his Army.

The Earl of Warwick made Governor to the King. Act. Pub. X. p. 399.

Before he began the Execution of his Projects, he loſt the Aſſiſtance of the brave Earl of Warwick, who returned into England, being appointed Governor to the King. He was deſigned for this Place, immediately after the Death of the Duke of Exeter in 1426. But as he was neceſſary in France, his Patent was not drawn up till the 1ſt of June this Year. Probably, it was thought proper to ſtay, till the Earl of Salisbury, who was to lead a ſtrong Reinforcement to the Duke of Bedford, was ready to depart.

The Earl of Salisbury arrives with five thouſand Men. Ib. p. 392. Monſtrelet.

The Earl of Salisbury arrived in France in July, with five thouſand Men (1), raiſed at his own Charge, purſuant to an Agreement with the Council (2). Upon his Arrival at Paris, the Regent gave him the Command of an Army of ſixteen thouſand Men. This was more than ſufficient to be Maſter of the Field, King Charles not being able to ſet on foot any ſuch Body of Troops. The Regent's Deſign was, to drive Charles beyond the Loire, knowing, that when once that Prince was at a Diſtance, all his Towns, on this Side the River, would ſurrender of Courſe for want of Succours. To this end, it was neceſſary to take from him the Places, which preſerved the Communication with the Northern Provinces, in order to deprive him of all hopes of returning.

The Regent's Deſign.

Salisbury marches towards the Loire. Monſtrelet.

It was with this view, that the Earl of Salisbury, aſſiſted by the Earls of Suffolk, Talbot, Faſtolff, and ſeveral other famous Leaders, marched towards the Loire, the beginning of Auguſt. Orleans was the moſt important Place in thoſe Parts. It belonged to the Duke of Orleans, who was Priſoner in England, ever ſince the Battle of Azincourt. The pretended Treaty, as I obſerved, between Henry V, and the Duke of Orleans, concerning the Neutrality of this City, is a meer Chimera. It was invented to render the Siege of Orleans odious, and make it believed, that Heaven interpoſed in favour of France, to puniſh the pretended perfidiouſneſs of the Engliſh. Be this as it will, the Earl of Salisbury holding a great Council of War, it was reſolved to beſiege Orleans. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this Reſolution was taken without the Duke of Bedford's Knowledge, and contrary to his Opinion. To ſucceed in this Undertaking, the neighbouring Places, which might annoy the Beſiegers, were firſt to be ſecured. Accordingly, the Months of Auguſt and September were ſpent in that Work. During that Space, the Engliſh took Jenville, Mehun, Baugenci, Gergeau, Clery, Sully, and ſome other ſmall Towns, and at laſt, appeared before Orleans the 12th of October.

Monſtrelet.

The French lay in Stores. Act. Pub. X. p. 402. Monſtrelet.

The French eaſily perceived, by all the Engliſh General's Proceedings, that he intended to beſiege Orleans. Accordingly, whilſt he was elſewhere employed, they had ſent thither both Men and Amunition (3). Gaucour, a Creature of the Duke of Orleans, commanded there, though he was ſtill a Priſoner of the Engliſh, and releaſed upon his Parole, only to have means to provide his Ranſom. He had even been recalled ever ſince June. The Baſtard of Orleans, d'Orval, La Hire, Xaintrailles, Thouars, Bouſſac, Chabannes, La Fayette, Graville, and ſeveral other Officers of Note, had thrown themſelves into the City, to acquire Reputation in the Service of their Sovereign.

The Engliſh Army not being ſufficiently numerous to inveſt the City on all Sides, the Beſiegers received Succours in the very beginning of the Siege. But the Earl of Salisbury, who conſidered this Enterprize as a deciſive Action for the King his Maſter, and his own Reputation, omitted nothing to deprive the Beſieged of that Advantage. He run up round the City ſixty Forts or Redoubts, called then Baſtilles. How great ſoever this Work might be, nothing could divert him from it, ſince the Succeſs of the Siege entirely depended upon it. In vain would he have puſhed his Attacks, if the Enemies could continually introduce freſh Supplies. Beſides, the Seaſon, now far advanced, ſuggeſted to him, that he would be forced to paſs the Winter in the Camp, and during that time be liable to many Inſults.

1428. The Beſiegers raiſe Forts about the City to prevent Succours. Hall.

Among the ſixty Forts, there were ſix much ſtronger than the reſt, upon the ſix principal Avenues of the City. The French could before with eaſe introduce Convoys into the Place, and had made frequent uſe of that Advantage. But after theſe Forts were built, it was with extreme Difficulty, that they could, now and then, give ſome Aſſiſtance to the Beſieged. Upon theſe ſix great Redoubts the General erected Batteries, which thundered againſt the Walls. But as the Artillery was not then in its preſent Perfection, it muſt not be imagined, the Canons did the ſame Execution as now.

It would be tedious to relate all the Particulars of this Siege, the Attacks, Sallies, and daily Skirmiſhes, either to introduce or repulſe Convoys. It may eaſily be judged, that one of the ſtrongeſt Places of France, defended by a numerous Garriſon, under the Conduct of the braveſt and moſt experienced General Officers then in France; and aſſaulted by Engliſhmen, deemed the moſt undaunted Warriors in the World; furniſhed the Beſiegers and Beſieged with frequent Occaſions to exerciſe their Valour.

Charles comes to Chinon. Monſtrelet.

Charles readily perceived, the taking of Orleans would deprive him of the Advantage, of continuing the War in the northern Provinces of the Kingdom: But, as he had neither Men nor Money, could not raiſe the Siege. However, he approached it, and came to Chinon, where he convened the chief Men, and obtained an Aid of Money. Whilſt he was in this Place, the Conſtable Richemont ſent him an Offer of his Service. But in whatever Diſtreſs he might be, and however great his Want was of a ſpeedy Aſſiſtance, he could not reſolve to forgive him.

The Engliſh become Maſters of the Bulwark,

Mean while, the Siege was vigorouſly proſecuted. The Bulwark of the Tournelles (4) being much ſhaken by the Beſiegers Cannon, and the Beſieged thinking it proper to ſet it on Fire, the Engliſh extinguiſhed the Flames, and lodged themſelves in that Poſt. At the ſame time they became Maſters of the Tower on the Bridge, from whence the whole City could be viewed. The taking of this Tower proved fatal to the Earl of Salisbury. One Day, as he was looking out of a Window, a Cannon-ſhot from the City hit him as it paſſed on the Right Side of his Head, carried away his Cheek, and ſtruck out one of his Eyes. He died a few Days after at Mehun, where he had been removed (5). This Loſs, though very great to the Engliſh, interrupted not the Siege. The Earl of Suffolk taking the Command of the Army, continued the Attacks as vigorouſly as before, aſſiſted by Talbot, one of the braveſt and moſt experienced Captains of his Age.

and of the Tower on the Bridge.

The Earl of Salisbury ſlain. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The Garriſon and Army both increaſed during the Siege.

There was nothing every Day but continual Aſſaults, Sallies, Skirmiſhes, wherein the Beſieged behaved with equal Bravery and Conduct. Notwithſtanding the Precautions uſed by the Engliſh, to prevent Succours from being thrown into the City, Troops and Convoys were, from time to time, introduced, though always by Dint of Sword. Thus the Garriſon, which at firſt conſiſted only of twelve hundred Men, was become three thouſand ſtrong by the end of December. On the other hand, the Army of the Beſiegers was encreaſed to three and twenty thouſand, by the Supplies perpetually ſent by the Regent, ſo that the Siege daily grew more important and difficult.

1429. The Battle of Herrings. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The Engliſh had now been four Months before Orleans, and the Succeſs of their Enterprize was yet doubtful. The Regent, who began to be uneaſy at the length of the Siege, was confirmed more and more in his Opinion, that it was a raſh Undertaking. However to neglect nothing in his Power, he ſent from Paris a Convoy of Salt-Fiſh (6), the Lent Seaſon of the Year 1429 being come. He left the Conduct of it to Faſtolff, one of the braveſt

He commiſſioned the Earl of Clermont for that purpoſe, who at the Head of three thouſand Men, attacked the Convoy on the Road to Orleans. February the 12th, at ſeven in the Morning, Faſtolff having heard of the Approach of the French, had made an Intrenchment with his Carriages, behind which he had ſecured himſelf againſt their firſt Charge. It was indeed very vigorous, but the Engliſh ſuſtained it with ſuch reſolution, that, inſtead of being routed by the firſt Shock, they put their Enemies into extreme Diſorder, by the great Slaughter of their Men. When Faſtolff ſaw their Confuſion, he ordered the Carriages to be removed, and falling upon the French Troops, already diſheartned, entirely defeated them with great Slaughter. Sixſcore Lords or Officers of note fell that day, beſides a great Number of common Soldiers (3). The Baſtard of Orleans, who had ſallied out to aſſiſt the Earl of Clermont in defeating the Convoy, preſerving a Preſence of Mind in this Rout, found means to re-enter the City with four hundred Men. This Action was called The Battle of Herrings.

Offer of ſurrendering Orleans to the Duke of Burgundy. Monſtrelet. Hall.

King Charles was extremely dejected upon News of this Defeat. He ſaw himſelf upon the point of loſing Orleans, and was ſenſible of the Conſequences of the Loſs. The Thoughts of ſeeing the Engliſh ravage the Province beyond the Loire, and thereby diſable him from continuing the War, could not but trouble him exceedingly. This Misfortune would infallibly follow, upon their being Maſters of Orleans. In this Diſtreſs, he deviſed an Expedient, proper, as he thought, to rob them of this Advantage; reckoning, they would be ſo blind as not to ſee through his Artifice. This was, to ſend to the commanding Officers a Power to deliver the Place to the Duke of Burgundy, to be kept in Truſt till the end of the War. Xaintrailles and others, who were appointed to treat of this Affair, going to Paris, made the Duke of Bedford the Offer, who laughed at the Stratagem. He plainly told them, it was a great Miſtake to think, he would beat the Buſh, for another to run away with the Game. Some ſay, the Duke of Burgundy was extremely offended with this Reply, and even withdrew his Troops from the Siege. But this is a mere Invention. The Duke of Burgundy had no reaſon to complain, that the Regent refuſed to deliver a Place of that Importance to him, to pleaſe his Enemies. Beſides, we ſhall ſee preſently, the Regent was all along very well ſatisfied with the Duke of Burgundy, as well during the Siege as after.

It is rejected. Monſtrelet.

Charles thinks of retiring into Dauphiné.

Charles not ſucceeding in his Project, and ſeeing no other way to ſave Orleans, began now to think of retiring into Dauphiné, when a very extraordinary Accident gave a ſudden Turn to the Affairs of the two contending Nations. We are going to ſee the ſtrangeſt and moſt unexpected Revolution, ever mentioned in Hiſtory. The French from vanquiſhed, are going to be on a ſudden victorious; and the Engliſh, hitherto deemed invincible, are going to be every where defeated, and at laſt driven out of the Kingdom. And what is more ſurprizing in this Revolution, is the Inſtrument by which it was cauſed. But before I enter upon Particulars, I muſt warn the Reader, that in what I am going to relate concerning this ſtrange Event, I follow the French Authors, without however warranting the Truth of their Aſſertions.

A ſtrange Accident changes the Face of Affairs.

An Account of the Maid of Orleans. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel. Hall.

About the end of February, 1429, a Country Girl, called Joan of Arc, a Village in Domremy (4) in Lorrain, came to Robert de Baudricourt, Governor of Vaucouleurs, and told him, ſhe had received expreſs Orders from God to raiſe the Siege of Orleans, and crown King Charles at Rheims. Baudricourt at firſt conſidered the Girl as a Viſionary, but afterwards finding ſhe talked very ſenſibly in the reſt of her Diſcourſes, he thought fit to ſend her to the King, who was ſtill at Chinon. Charles being informed that Joan of Arc was coming, declared, that Maria d' Avignon a Nun, had formerly told him, Heaven would arm one of her Sex in Defence of France. Adding, that perhaps this Girl was the Perſon deſigned by Heaven. This was ſufficient to ſatisfy the Court beforehand, that Joan of Arc's Calling was miraculous. The ſupernatural Miſſion perfectly ſquared with the Sentiments of the Queen, of Agnes Sorrel the King's Miſtreſs, and of the principal Courtiers, who uſed all poſſible Endeavours to diſſuade the King from his purpoſe to retire into Dauphiné. So, nothing was more proper to divert him from this Retreat, than the hopes of a Change in his Fortune. However this be, in theſe Diſpoſitions was Joan of Arc expected. The firſt time ſhe appeared at Court, ſhe addeſſed herſelf directly to the King, diſcovering him among all his Courtiers, though ſhe had never ſeen him, and he had taken care to have nothing about him, to diſtinguiſh him. However, he ſeemed at firſt to make no great Account of this Girl. But as ſhe earneſtly preſſed him to credit her Words, which were the ſame ſhe had ſpoken to Baudricourt, he reſolved to have her examined. The Divines, her Examiners, declared, upon what ground I know not, that her Miſſion was divine. Then ſhe was ſent to the Parliament at Poictiers,, who were of the ſame Opinion. Laſtly, to confirm this Belief, the King declared, ſhe had told him Secrets, which no Mortal knew but himſelf.

1429. P. Daniel.

Every one being now prepoſſeſſed, that Joan of Arc, commonly called la Pucelle, [or the Maid] was ſent from God to ſave France, ſhe was looked upon with Eyes of Admiration. All her Actions, Words, and Geſtures were conſtrued to her Advantage. There was diſcovered in her, a fine Genius, ſolid Judgment, Greatneſs of Soul, and a Knowledge very unuſual in one of her Sex and Condition.

P. Daniel.

This was the common Effect of Prejudice. Thus far there is nothing that ſhould ſeem very ſtrange. It is eaſy to conceive, that this might be a Contrivance to revive the Courage of the French, and perhaps the King himſelf, diſmayed at ſo many Loſſes, and beholding the Kingdom juſt going to fall under the Dominion of Foreigners. But that this Invention, if it be one, ſhould ſucceed according to the Deſign of the Authors, is what may indeed be juſt cauſe of Admiration, and afford ample matter for moral and political Reflections.

Joan marches with a Convoy to Orleans. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel.

Mean while, the Siege of Orleans being vigorouſly proſecuted, Charles reſolved to try to throw a Convoy into the City. Joan deſiring to be of the Party, and to have Arms and a Man's Habit, eaſily obtained her Requeſt (5). To render her ſelf more remarkable, ſhe would have a certain Sword ſent for, from the Tomb of a Knight buried in the Church of St. Catherine de Fierbois. The Convoy deſigned for Orleans departed April the 25th. Several French Writers affirm, that Joan commanded the Guard, and conducted the Convoy into the City, but Monſtrelet, a cotemporary Author, ſays the contrary. The Convoy being arrived on the 29th in the Morning, near the Burgundian Gate, the Baſtard of Orleans made a Sally to favour their Paſſage. A fierce and bloody Battle enſued, wherein, after a long reſiſtance, the Engliſh were defeated, and forced to let the Convoy go in (6). Joan made her Entry into Orleans, amidſt the Generals, and Acclamations of the People, who aſcribed to her the good Succeſs of that Day.

She takes four of the Beſiegers Forts. Monſtrelet. Hall.

On the 4th of May, Joan at the head of a Detachment of the Garriſon, attacked, Sword in hand, the Fort of St. Loup, one of the ſix largeſt before-mentioned. After a Conflict of four Hours, the Fort was carried, and of the twelve hundred Engliſh who defended it (7), four hundred were killed on the ſpot. Two days after, ſhe aſſaulted likewiſe the Fort of St. John; but as it was almoſt abandoned by the Engliſh, ſhe met with little Reſiſtance. Preſently after, without giving her Troops any Reſpite, ſhe led them againſt the Fort, called London, the moſt conſiderable of the Six, built upon the Ruins of the Church of the Auguſtines. Notwithſtanding the gallant Reſiſtance of the Engliſh, this was alſo taken, with great Loſs on their Side. Joan's Troops thought of reſting themſelves, after ſo hard Duty, but immediately ſhe marched them to the Fort of the Tournelles. But as ſhe could not attack it that Evening, for want of day-light, ſhe kept it inveſted all Night. On the morrow, at break of Day, the Aſſault began, and laſted fourteen Hours without Intermiſſion. The French were repulſed four ſeveral times, and as often renewed the Charge; Joan animating them by her Words and Actions, though wounded with an Arrow between the Neck and Shoulders. At length, about eight at Night, the Fort was carried like the reſt, and ſix hundred Engliſh cut in pieces. In all theſe Actions, Joan ſhewed a Valour and Reſolution very uncommon in Perſons of her Sex (8).

Act. Pub. X. p. 408. Here is a Fragment of the Duke of Bedford's Letter to the King his Nephew, after the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, which ſhows how much the Engliſh, and the Duke of Bedford himſelf, were diſcouraged by this unexpected Event.

" And alle thing there proſpered for you, till the tyme " of the Siege of Orleans taken in hand, God knoweth " by what Advis. At the whiche Tyme, after the Ad- " venture fallen to the Perſone of my Couſin of Salysbury, " whom God aſſoile, there felle, by the Hand of God as " it ſeemeth, a greet ſtrook upon your Peuple that was " aſſembled there in grete Nombre, cauſed in grete Par- " tie, as y trowe, of lakke of ſadde Beleve, and of un- " leveſulle doubte, that thei hadde of a Diſciple and " Lyme of the Feende, called the Pucelle, that uſed fals " Enchauntements and Sorcerie. (1).

The great Alteration of the French and Engliſh. The raiſing of the Siege of Orleans uſhered in the Decline of the Engliſh Affairs. From that time, the French and Engliſh ſeemed to have mutually changed Tempers and Characters. The Engliſh were ſeized with a Spirit of Fear and Amazement, whilſt the French were filled with a Courage, almoſt entirely loſt ſince the Battles of Azincourt and Vernueil. Though, after the raiſing of the Siege, the French exceeded not ſix thouſand, they fearleſly and briskly purſued the Engliſh, who, though they were ſtill ſuperior in Number, retreated in a ſtrange Diſorder. Their Conſternation was ſuch, that they knew not what they did. Inſtead of keeping together, to withſtand their Enemies, they amuſed themſelves with throwing numerous Garriſons into the Places, conquered before the Siege, about the Loire. By that means they ſo weakned themſelves, that they were no longer able to expect their Enemies who were cloſely purſuing them. As they dreaded a Battle, as much as they were wont to deſire it, they retired at a diſtance, and gave the French time to retake theſe Places one after another. The Earl of Suffolk was made Priſoner in Gergeau, where he had imprudently ſhut himſelf up, with four hundred Men only (2), which muſt have proceeded from his Conſternation at the Defeat of his Troops. Of all the Places in thoſe Parts, Baugenci held out the longeſt, but could not help undergoing the ſame Fate with the reſt. In ſhort, Diſorder and Confuſion had ſo poſſeſſed the Engliſh, that Charles by Joan's Advice, reſolved to be crowned at Rheims. Mean time this City was ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh. Beſides, there was a Neceſſity of traverſing above one hundred and twenty Miles of the Enemies Country, and of taking ſeveral Places, which at any other time he would not have ventured to approach. Strange Effect of the Terror ſtruck into the Engliſh by a Woman, and of the Confidence inſtilled into their Enemies by the ſame!

Charles reſolves to be crowned at Rheims.

The Conſtable brings him Troops. Hall. The Conſtable Richemont, ſeeing the Proſperity of the King's Affairs, began to abate of his haughtineſs. Hitherto he imagined himſelf neceſſary, but the late Events made him ſenſible he might be entirely forgotten, and loſe his Share of the Glory the King was, probably, going to acquire. In this Belief, he aſſembled all his Friends, and forming a Body of twelve hundred Horſe, and twelve thouſand Foot, he marched to join the King who was then before Baugenci. The Duke of Bretagne, doubtleſs connived at this Levy in his Country, the late Revolution cauſing him to alter his meaſures. Whilſt the Conſtable was upon his march, La Trimouille, who deſired not his Company at Court, artfully perſuaded the King, he was coming with a numerous Army, to have his Perſon in his Power. This firſt Impreſſion ſo affected the King, that he was going to raiſe the Siege of Baugenci, and give the Conſtable Battle, but upon better Information, was pleaſed to receive him with his Succours. It was however upon very mortifying Terms to a Prince of his Character. It was required of him, that he ſhould not pretend to govern the King, nor be preſent at the Coronation, where La Trimouille was unwilling to be out-ſhone. 1429.

The Battle of Patay, wherein the Engliſh are defeated, Monſtrelet. Hall. Stow. Baugenci being taken, the King had Intelligence, that the Engliſh were aſſembling in Beauce. Whereupon Charles holding a Council of War, it was unanimouſly reſolved to give them Battle. Indeed, there was no probability of going to Rheims, with the Enemies in the Rear. Charles's Army was then ten thouſand ſtrong (3), including the Bretons, brought by the Conſtable. But of the twenty two thouſand Engliſh, lately before Orleans, there was left but ſix thouſand with Talbot, who had taken the Command of the Army, after Suffolk was Priſoner. By an effect of the great Amazement of the Engliſh, ſince the Affair of Orleans, they ſuffered themſelves to be ſurpriſed near Patay, by the French, who appeared in Sight before they had heard any thing of them. They had ſcarce time to draw up, which was done in ſuch Confuſion, that they made but a very faint Reſiſtance. Talbot alone maintained the Fight, by his Valour and Conduct, but at laſt, the General being taken Priſoner, the Engliſh Army was routed with the Loſs of two thouſand five hundred Men (4). Faſtolff run away with the flying Troops, ſeized by one of thoſe ſudden Terrors, which, for the time, deprive a Man of the uſe of his Reaſon, and may happen to the moſt Couragious (5).

The Duke of Bedford ſhuts himſelf up in Paris. If the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans was a great Check to the Affairs of the Engliſh, the Defeat of Patay was a no leſs grievous and fatal Blow to them. The Regent ſaw himſelf forced to keep within the Walls of Paris, being unable to appear in the Field, to oppoſe the Progreſs of his Enemies. Mean while, Charles improved theſe Advantages. Lewis III, Duke of Anjou, and King of Sicily, his Brother-in-law, being returned from Naples, where he had made a long ſtay, brought him immediately after the Battle of Patay, a Supply of ſeveral brave Officers, who had attended him into Italy, and were come back with him into France.

Charles marches to Rheims. Monſtrelet. Hall. King Charles's Adherents increaſing, as his Affairs became more proſperous, he reviewed his Troops at Gien, and found them augmented to fifteen thouſand Men. He gave a Part to the Conſtable, to make a Diverſion in Normandy, or rather, under that honorable Pretence, to remove him, that he might not aſſiſt at the Coronation, according to Agreement. The Earl of Perdriac had another Part, to carry the War into Guienne. Theſe two Detachments were but five thouſand Men. With the remaining ten thouſand, Charles took the Road to Rheims, knowing there was no Army in the Field to oppoſe him. In paſſing through Burgundy, he ſummoned Auxerre, which promiſed to follow the Example of the principal Towns of Champagne. Troye and Châlon ſurrendered upon the firſt Summons. A few days after, the Inhabitants of Rheims drove the Engliſh Garriſon out of the City, and ſent Deputies to the King, to preſent to him the Keys of their Gates. Thus every thing ſucceeding to his wiſh, Charles entered Rheims (6) in Triumph, and was crowned preſently after (7). The Ceremony being ended, Joan would have retired, affirming, ſhe had nothing more to do, after executing what God had commanded. But the King preſſed her ſo earneſtly, that at laſt he prevailed with her to ſtay.

The Duke of Gloceſter mortifies the Cardinal of Wincheſter. It is now time to ſee what was tranſacting in England, during the late fatal Revolution in France. The Quarrel ſtill ſubſiſted between the Duke of Gloceſter and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who was returned to London. As the Prelate's new Dignity rendered him more haughty than ever, the Duke of Gloceſter took occaſion from this Dignity, to give him a ſenſible Mortification. St. George's Day, Patron of the moſt noble Order of the Garter, being at hand, the Cardinal was to officiate, as Biſhop of Wincheſter. But the Duke of Gloceſter, and his Friends, oppoſed it, affirming, he could not hold the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, with the Dignity of Cardinal (8), without the King's expreſs Licence. The Affair being brought before the Council, it was reſolved, that for this time the Cardinal ſhould not officiate as Biſhop of Wincheſter; and two Lords were ſent to give him notice thereof. 1429. he came himſelf to the Board, and demanded upon what Foundation he was deprived of his Right. He was told, it was for fear of prejudicing the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Council perſiſted in their Reſolution. Hence the Cardinal perceived, his Adverſary's Intereſt to be ſtill much greater than his.

The Cardinal is made General of a Cruſade. Act. Pub. X. p. 422, 423.

Shortly after, the Prelate received the Pope's Bull, appointing him his Legate in Germany, and General of the Cruſade againſt the Bohemian Hereticks. The Pope's View was to draw a Powerful Aid from England, againſt the Huſſites (1). Nay, it is not unlikely, that as he greatly favoured King Charles, his Deſign was to weaken England, by draining the Kingdom of Men and Money, under colour of the Cruſade. However, the Cardinal receiving the Bull the beginning of June this Year, though it was dated March the 18th, 1427-8, preſented to the King and Council a Petition, deſiring leave to publiſh the Cruſade. He prayed likewiſe, that he might have Power to levy in England, five hundred Lances, and five thouſand Archers, and to appoint the Generals and Officers of this Army. His Petition being examined in Council, it was reſolved to grant it in Part, under the following Reſtrictions:

He petitions to publiſh the Cruſade. Act. Pub. X. p. 419. 423.

P. 420.

That no Perſon ſhall be obliged to contribute Money for the Cruſade, but every one give what he pleaſed. That the Sums thus voluntarily furniſhed, ſhould be put into ſuch Hands as the Council ſhould nominate. That the Gold or Silver ſhould not be conveyed beyond Sea, but expended in the Kingdom (2).

That the Cardinal ſhould be empowered to levy only two hundred and fifty Lances, and two thouſand five hundred Archers: That even this ſhould be granted, only on condition, that the Pope, out of regard to the King and Kingdom, ſhould not impoſe any Tax on the Laity or Clergy.

That no Soldiers ſerving in France, ſhould be liſted or received among the Troops of the Cruſade.

That the Cardinal ſhould give the Council ſufficient Security for the return of theſe Troops.

That he ſhould effectually uſe his Intereſt, to induce the King of Scotland to leave England in quiet, and obſerve the Truce.

That in publiſhing the Cruſade, it ſhould expreſsly be ſaid, that it was with the King's Aſſent and Licence.

That the Officers ſhould be nominated by the Cardinal, but commiſſioned by the King.

That it ſhould be the ſame with regard to the Conſtable, or Commander in chief of the Army.

That if the Cruſade did not take place, the Money furniſhed by private Perſons ſhould not be employed without the King's Approbation.

New Levies for France.

By theſe Reſtrictions may be ſeen, how careful the Council was, to hinder the Pope's exerciſing in the Kingdom, an Authority but too much abuſed by his Predeceſſors.

The Cardinal is to ſerve in France till December. July. Act. Pub. X. p. 422. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Mean while, the News of the Battle of Patay flying into England, cauſed a great Conſternation, and made it eaſily judged, that the Regent wanted a ſudden and powerful Aid. And therefore, without loſing a Moment, the Council ordered new Levies, the Command whereof was deſigned for Sir John Ratcliffe. But, as in the preſent Poſture of Affairs in France, it would have been very imprudent to ſend Troops into Bohemia, the Council reſolved to make ſome alteration in what was granted to the Cardinal of Wincheſter. Upon this urgent occaſion, a new Agreement was made (3) with him, whereby he engaged to ſerve in France, under the Duke of Bedford, till the end of December, with the Troops of the Cruſade, provided they were not employed in any Siege.

A few Days after (4), arrived from France, Garter King at Arms (5), with Inſtructions from the Regent, to inform the Council of the State of Affairs in that Kingdom. The Subſtance of his Inſtructions was as follows:

1429. The Duke of Bedford's Inſtructions to Garter. Act. Pub. X. p. 433.

I. That it was neceſſary to haſten the departure of Ratcliffe's and the Cardinal's Troops, and inform the Regent of the preciſe time of their Imbarkation.

II. The Dauphin, (for ſo the Regent called King Charles,) was maſter of Troye, Châlon, and ſeveral other Places, ſome of which had voluntarily ſurrendred. That he was to enter that very Day, July the 16th, the City of Rheims, where he would be crowned; and afterwards intended to exert his utmoſt, to take Paris, but ſhould find it more difficult than he imagined.

III. That the Duke of Burgundy (6) had fully diſcharged his Duty, and the City of Paris, had it not been for him, would have been loſt before now. That he was departed, that very day, for Artois, to haſten his Troops, and join them with the Engliſh Army.

IV. That the Regent was to ſet out within two days for Normandy and Picardy, where he would draw the Garriſons together, and expect the Troops that were to come from England.

V. Laſtly, The Council of France moſt humbly beſought the King, to come and be crowned at Paris.

Upon this laſt Article, it was reſolved, that the young King, now but eight Years old, ſhould go into France, and be crowned, but ſhould firſt be crowned in England (7).

Henry crowned at London. The Protectorſhip ſuppreſſed. Act. Pub. X. p. 434, 435, 436. Cotton's Abridg. Hall.

In purſuance of this Reſolution, the Ceremony of the Coronation was performed on the 6th of November. Six days after, the Parliament, then aſſembled, ordered the Dignity of Protector and Defender of the Church to be ſuppreſſed, but that the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould keep that of firſt Counſellor to the King. This was a very great as well as unexpected Mortification to that Prince. Indeed, as the King's Coronation increaſed not his Capacity, the Kingdom ſeemed ſtill to require a Protector. But it was pretended, the Protectorſhip was inconſiſtent with the Dignity of a crowned Head. We ſhall ſee hereafter, this Rule was not always obſerved. The Duke however, handſomly ſubmitted to the Ordinance, as far as it concerned him, the Rights of his Brother the Duke of Bedford remaining entire.

Charles continues his Conqueſts. Hall.

Whilſt the Preparations were making in England for the Coronation, Charles had continued his Conqueſts with great rapidity. However, his Coronation had detained him eleven days at Rheims. If the Regent had then been provided with an Army, he might eaſily have incloſed him in that Corner of France, where he had but few Places, ſurrounded with the Enemies Garriſons. But the Duke was then in Picardy, with few Troops, expecting thoſe that were to come from England. Charles therefore improved the Advantage, procured by that Prince's Diſtance. The Inhabitants of the Engliſh Towns being, for the moſt part, well inclined to him, nothing hindered them from ſhewing him Marks of their Affection, ſince the Duke of Bedford had been forced to weaken the Garriſons extremely, to compoſe an Army. This was the Cauſe, that, in a very ſhort Space, Charles became maſter of Soiſſons, Provins, Chateau-Thierry, Crepi, and ſome other Places, even before they were attacked; the Engliſh Garriſons not being ſtrong enough to prevent the Burghers from following their Inclination.

(5) There are three Kings at Arms in England; namely, Garter, Clarencieux, and Norroy. Garter is the principal, inſtituted by Henry V, as is related above, p. 531. Note (4). His Buſineſs is to attend Knights of the Garter at their Solemnity, and to marſhal the Funerals of the greater Nobility. Clarencieux was created by Edward IV, who, upon attaining the Dukedom of Clarence by the Death of his Brother, made the Herald belonging to the Duke of Clarence, a King at Arms, and called him Clarentius. His proper Office is to marſhal the Funerals of the leſſer Nobility, or Gentry, on the South-ſide of the Trent. Norroy's Office is the ſame on the North-ſide of Trent, as appears by his Name, The Northern King. The Buſineſs of the Heralds is likewiſe to denounce War, to proclaim Peace, or to be employed in the King's martial Meſſages. They are Judges alſo of Gentlemens Arms, marſhal all the Solemnities at the Coronation of Princes, &c. Verſtegan derives the Word Herald from Here an Army, and Healt a Champion, as much as to ſay, The Champion of the Army. Beſides the three Kings, there are ſix other properly called Heralds, as they were created to attend Dukes, &c. viz. York, Lancaſter, Somerſet, Richmond, Cheſter, and Windſor. There are four more called Marſhal or Purſuivants at Arms, who commonly ſucced in the Places of Heralds; namely, Blue-Mantle, Rouge-Croſs, Rouge-Dragon, and Peter-Cullis.

1429. Charles heard the Duke was advancing to give him Battle. A few days after, the two Armies were very near one another on a large Plain, where nothing hindered their engaging. The number of the Troops on both Sides was much the ſame, but as the King had more Horſe, the Regent was unwilling to attack him. Beſides, the Poſture of his Affairs required that he ſhould not fight without advantage; and therefore, he ordered his Camp to be ſtrongly intrenched. He hoped, the impetuous Humour of the French, would cauſe them to commit the ſame Fault as at Verneuil, and on many other Occaſions; and they would endeavour to force his Intrenchments, in which caſe, he promiſed himſelf certain Victory. But for once, he was deceived in his Expectation. Charles, grown wiſe by ſo many former Inſtances, was content with facing him (1), and trying to draw him out of his Lines, without venturing an attack, the Succeſs whereof appeared very doubtful. At laſt, finding the Engliſh kept their Station, he left his, in order to purſue his Conqueſts, knowing that moſt of the Towns were ready to receive him. The Regent followed him cloſe; but as he would run no hazard, without an apparent Advantage, he had the Mortification to ſee him enter Senlis, Beauvais, Compiegne, Creil, Pont St. Maxence, Lagny, Bray, Gournay, Melun, Sens. All theſe Places opened their Gates to the King, being no longer awed by the Garriſons, the Regent had been forced to draw out.

On the other hand, the Conſtable Richemont, who was in Normandy, having found means to augment his Troops to the number of eight thouſand, had taken Evreux, and threatned the whole Province. The Duke of Bedford, fearing he would make greater Progreſs, haſtened thither; not being able to bear the thoughts of loſing a Country, from whence flowed in a great meaſure his Subſiſtence.

Charles makes an Attempt upon Paris. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Whilſt the Duke of Bedford was employed in Normandy, Charles, Maſter of the Field in the Iſle of France, approached Paris, and encamped at Montmartre. He immediately publiſhed a general Pardon for the Pariſians, imagining, that, terrified at his Conqueſts, they would take Arms, and drive the Engliſh out of the City. But the Regent had ſo ordered matters there, that not a Man ſtirred. At laſt, finding he could expect nothing from the Citizens, he attacked the Suburbs of St. Honorius; but his Troops were repulſed with great Loſs. Joan, who had greatly expoſed herſelf in this Aſſault, was wounded and thrown into the Ditch. She was thought to be dead, but being drawn out in the Night, recovered of her Wounds.

The Seaſon not permitting the two Armies to keep the Field any longer, Charles retired, and paſſed the Winter at Bourges. The Regent likewiſe, after driving the Conſtable out of Normandy, returned to Paris. During the Winter, he carried by Scalade St. Dennis and Lagni, which very much annoyed the Pariſians.

Diſpoſition of the Duke of Burgundy ſince the Turn of Affairs. Monſtrelet.

Before we cloſe the Occurrences of this Year, it muſt not be forgotten to ſhew, how the Duke of Burgundy ſtood affected, ſince the Revolution in the Engliſh Affairs. However proſperous Charles might be, he was ſenſible it was not ſufficient, unleſs he could gain ſo potent an Enemy as the Duke of Burgundy. The truth is, if that Prince had thought fit to aſſiſt the Engliſh with all his Forces, he would have, doubtleſs, prevented this Revolution. Nay, if after the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, he had been willing to aid them in proportion to his Power, he would ſtill have turned the Scale on their Side. But he had been, for ſome time, taking other Meaſures. His Policy ſuggeſted to him, that by too powerfully aſſiſting the Engliſh, he ſhould procure himſelf troubleſome Maſters, as he had already experienced in the Buſineſs of Hainault. And therefore, ſince he was to have a Sovereign, he choſe much rather, to ſee a Prince of his Blood on the Throne of France, than a Foreigner. But he carefully concealed his Sentiments, leſt both Parties ſhould take the advantage of them againſt him. It was manifeſt, that in openly ſhewing his Inclination to abandon the Engliſh, he would have done himſelf great Prejudice. King Charles would become leſs eager to agree with him, and it may be, the Duke of Bedford would have endeavoured to prevent him, by making a ſeparate Peace with the French, excluſive of him. This was, at leaſt, what the Duke of Burgundy had reaſon to fear, conſidering the Poſture of the Affairs of the Engliſh, ſince the Battle of Patay. He reſolved therefore to continue to aſſiſt the Engliſh (2), but ſo as to give Charles ſome hopes, his Reſentment was abated. He rightly judged, that in taking this courſe he ſhould procure better Terms, or at worſt, might remain in his preſent Situation, till what he deſired, was offered. Charles having had ſome Intimation of the Duke of Burgundy's Diſpoſition, diſpatched ſecret Agents to treat with him; but the Duke thought it not yet time to diſcover himſelf. He was apprehenſive, that if the Duke of Bedford ſhould know it, he would, without him, agree with King Charles; whereas his Intent was, to make his own Peace, at the Expence of the Engliſh. The Sequel manifeſtly ſhewed this to be his Deſign. Moſt certain it is, he was now determined, though he did not think fit to begin the Negotiation ſo early. A remarkable Inſtance this, of the Inſtability of ſeemingly the ſtrongeſt Alliances. Sad Effect of Inſincerity too common among Men, and from which, Princes in particular are not free. As, notwithſtanding their Treaties, they cannot truſt one another, they live in continual Fear of being deceived by their Allies. And therefore, taking for granted they may be abandoned, they endeavour to prevent, and, without ſcruple, break their Engagements, upon the Proſpect of any conſiderable Advantage. Let a Man run over all Hiſtories, as well Ancient as Modern, and he will ſcarce find any one conſiderable Alliance, but what was violated by ſome notorious Deceit.

1430. It would be difficult to deſcribe the Concern, Trouble, Complaints and Murmurings in England, upon the turn of Affairs in France. Some blamed the Generals for not diſcharging their Duty. Others, perceiving no natural Cauſe of ſo ſurprizing a Change, affirmed, it muſt have happened by the Malice of the Devil, who had made uſe of Joan for his Inſtrument, and boldly aſſerted ſhe was a Witch. In ſhort, ſome threw all the Blame on the Council, and the Duke of Gloceſter. They juſtly taxed them, with unſeaſonably proſecuting the Affair of Hainault, when, if all the Forces of England had been united againſt France, they would have infallibly finiſhed the Conqueſt of that Kingdom. In a word, nothing but Complaints were heard from all Parts, every one ſeeking in the faults of the Miniſtry, for a Cauſe of this fatal Revolution. Among all the Reflections caſt on the Government, the Council took particular notice of their reaſoning, who ſaid, "it was a very great Error to keep "the French Princes, and particularly the Dukes of Or- "leans and Bourbon, ſo long Priſoners in England. That "none could be ignorant, what great Advantages were "reaped by the late King, from the Diſſenſions of the "French. That conſequently, the Priſoners ſhould have "been ſent home, where, probably, they would have re- "newed their old Quarrels: Whereas detaining them "captive, had procured France a Tranquillity, deſtruc- "tive to England. That at leaſt, if the Dukes of Or- "leans and Bourbon had been in France with King "Charles, the Engliſh would have had more conſider- "able Aids from the Duke of Burgundy, than what he "had hitherto furniſhed. In ſhort, it was not yet too "late to releaſe theſe two Princes, and as England was "drained by the Continuance of ſo tedious a War, their "Ranſoms might ſerve to put things upon a better "foot." Theſe Reaſons ſeemed very plauſible. But, on the other hand, the late King's Orders concerning the Priſoners, were to the Duke of Gloceſter and the Council, a Law which they durſt not pretend to violate (3).

1430. Murmurings in England.

Several find fault that the French Priſoners had not been releaſed.

There were however, as to the Duke of Bourbon in particular, Reaſons, which might have induced the Council to overlook the late King's Orders. In 1421, that Prince made a Treaty with Henry V, promiſing to ſwear to the Peace of Troye, to pay ſuch a Sum for his Ranſom, and deliver two of his Sons, and his fortified Towns, in Hoſtage, till his Engagements were fully performed. Henry V, dying before the Treaty was executed, it was renewed with ſome Alteration in 1428, and young Henry had received, as King of France, the Duke's Homage. There was nothing wanting but the Ratification, which was deferred, only for fear the People would not approve of this Proceeding. In ſhort, this Year 1430, all Difficulties were ſurmounted, and the Treaty was ratified. But ſome Obſtacles occurred in the Execution, which hindered the Duke from being ſet at Liberty. He died at laſt in England, in 1433 (4), after an eighteen Years Captivity.

(3) In the beginning of this Year, namely, on January 12, a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, which continued Tunnage and Poundage for two Years, and ordered, over and above the ſaid Tunnage, a Subſidy of like value of all Merchant-Strangers. They alſo gave one Tenth and one Fifteenth, and a third of both; and moreover granted, that every Lay-perſon, holding by a whole Knight's Fee, ſhould pay to the King twenty Shillings, and ſo according to the Value, under or over; and the Clergy ſhould pay the ſame, for Lands purchaſed ſince the 20th of Edward I. And that all other Perſons having any Hereditaments, to the value of twenty Pounds over all Repriſes, not holden as above, ſhould pay unto the King twenty Shillings. Cotton's Abridg. p. 597, 598. ——In this Parliament it was enacted, That every Wey of Cheeſe ſhould contain thirty Cloves, and every Clove ſeven Pounds. Statut. 9 Hen. VI. c. 8.

1430. Another Reaſon, inducing the Council to treat with the Duke of Bourbon, was, the Hopes, his Ranſom would help to defray the Charges of the King's Journey, who was ready to depart for France. This means failing, there was a neceſſity of having recourſe to Borrowings, which plainly diſcovered the low Condition of the Treaſury (1); and with what difficulty ſufficient Funds, for carrying on the War, were found.

Henry goes to France, p. 452, 455, 456.

Henry departed at length, on the 24th of April, attended by great Numbers of the Nobility, and particularly the Cardinal of Wincheſter, who was appointed Chief Counſellor of the King with a large Salary (2). This honorable Pretence was uſed, to keep him out of the Realm, leſt in the King's Abſence, and under the Duke of Gloceſter's Regency, who was made Guardian, their Diſſenſions might breed Diſturbances. Henry being arrived at Calais, made but a ſhort Stay there. He proceeded immediately to Roan, where he ſpent almoſt all the reſt of the Year, whilſt Preparations were making at Paris for his Coronation, which could not be finiſhed till December. About the middle of the Month, he came to the Metropolis, where he was crowned (3) on the 17th, with all the Solemnity, the Circumſtances of the time would permit.

The Duke of Bedford ſecures the Duke of Burgundy to England. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Whilſt the King was at Roan, the Duke of Bedford uſed all his endeavours to reſtore his Affairs. He had foreſeen the Duke of Burgundy's Deſigns, and, as he was ſenſible of the Conſequences, neglected nothing to prevent them. It coſt him Champagne and la Brie, or at leaſt, the Places he ſtill had in thoſe Provinces, which he was forced to deliver to him, to ſecure him in the Alliance of England. But withal, he was enabled, by this means, to ſtop the Progreſs of Charles, who had carried on his Conqueſts with a wonderful Rapidity.

The Duke of Burgundy's third Marriage. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Another Inducement to keep, for ſome time, the Duke of Burgundy in the Intereſt of the Engliſh, was, his third Marriage with Iſabella of Portugal (4), near Relation to the King of England (5), and who had not the ſame Affinity with King Charles, as Bona of Artois, his former Wife. So, the Duke of Bedford, receiving an Aid from the Duke of Burgundy (6), took the Field, and became Maſter, in the Iſle of France, of ſeveral Places; which though of little Conſequence in themſelves, were of great Importance, as they were incommodious to Paris (7).

The Regent makes ſome Conqueſts.

The Duke of Burgundy beſieges Compiegne.

Shortly after, the Duke of Burgundy himſelf entered France, at the head of a powerful Army. He retook firſt Torſy and Soiſſons, and then beſieged Compiegne. Flavy commanded in that Place, with a numerous Garriſon, and ſix Months Proviſions. Upon the firſt News of this Siege, the Maid of Orleans, and Xaintrailles, threw themſelves into the Town, not without the Governor's ſecret Indignation, who eaſily ſaw, they were come to rob him of the Honour of the Defence.

The Maid goes thither. Monſtrelet.

She makes a Sally, and is taken Priſoner. Monſtrelet. Hall. P. Daniel.

On the 25th of May, Joan made a Sally, and fought with great Conduct and Reſolution. At length being forced to retreat, ſhe put herſelf in the Rear, and now and then made a ſtand, to ſtop the Enemies, by whom ſhe was preſſed. In this manner, ſhe ſecured all her Men; but, when ſhe would have entered the Town, found the Gate ſhut, and the Draw-Bridge up. It is ſaid, this was done by the Governor's Order, who was glad to deſtroy her, pretending he did not know ſhe was ſtill without. But this Circumſtance is not well proved (8). However it be, Joan finding no way to eſcape her Purſuers, ſurrendered herſelf Priſoner to the Baſtard of Vendôme, who immediately delivered her to the Earl of Ligny (9), the Duke of Burgundy's General. The Duke of Bedford over-joyed, that this Prey was in the Hands of his Allies, demanded her ſo earneſtly of the Earl of Ligny, that the General could not deny him. He required, however, a Reward ſuitable to the Importance of ſuch a Priſoner. Some time after, the Town was relieved by the Earl of Vendôme (10), who introduced Troops and Ammunition, when it was almoſt reduced to Extremity. Whereupon, the Earl of Ligny, Commander in Chief, ſeeing no more likelihood of ſucceeding, raiſed the Siege, and the Duke of Burgundy, who had ſtaid all the while at Noyon, retired into Artois.

She is delivered to the Duke of Bedford.

The Siege is raiſed. Hall.

I paſs over in Silence numberleſs Attempts on both Sides, and divers Skirmiſhes, which contributed but little to the Deciſion of the general Affair. It will however be proper to obſerve, that Joan's pretended Inſpiration, had made ſo deep an Impreſſion in the Minds of the French, that Marſhal Bouſſac and Xaintrailles, ſuffered themſelves to be deceived by an Artifice, which, doubtleſs, would not have produced its Effect, had it not been ſupported by this Prepoſſeſſion. A Shepherd living near Roan, came and told the Marſhal, that Heaven had revealed to him a certain private way, by which, he would lead him into the very City of Roan. Bouſſac, imparting the ſecret to Xaintrailles, they were both of opinion, the opportunity ſhould not be neglected. So, perſuaded as they were, that they had God himſelf for their Guide, they marched with a Body of choſen Troops after the Shepherd, who led them into an Ambuſh, where Talbot expected them. Their Troops were cut in pieces, and Xaintrailles remained a Priſoner, in the hands of the Engliſh.
